When a person has bid the highest amount of rent for a ferry franchise, and secured the payment of the same, the county commissioners shall enter into a contract with him, a lease of the ferry franchise, or of the ferry.

The same rule should be applied to the construction of that contract as to any other contract.

Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the defendants from an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint. The plaintiffs, under a claim to an exclusive franchise for establishing a ferry across the Missouri river at Forest City, in Potter county, instituted this action to enjoin the defendant from maintaining and operating an opposition ferry at that place. The demurrer is interposed upon two grounds, namely, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the ferry lease, as alleged in said complaint, is illegal and void, under the laws of this state. The complaint states the facts very fully upon which the plaintiffs rely to maintain their actions, but a brief summary is all that will be necessary to an understanding of the questions presented for our determination.

It is alleged that in April, 1889, the board of county commissioners of Potter county granted to one Francis B. Bullard a lease of an exclusive ferry privilege on the Missouri river, at a point on the east side of said river, known as "Steamboat Landing," for a term of five years from and after April, 1889, with the refusal to said Bullard for a further term of five years, and for a second extension of five years; that a contract was duly entered into between said Bullard and the said board of county commissioners, a copy of which is given in the complaint; that said Bullard thereafter set up, operated, managed, and conducted a ferry, and continued to operate the same until March 27, 1894; that, upon the said last date mentioned, the said Bullard duly assigned and transferred to the plaintiffs all his rights and privileges under said lease, a copy of which assignment is made part of the complaint; that in April, 1894, the plaintiffs applied to the board of county commissioners of said Potter county for an extension of said ferry privilege for an additional term of five years, and for an approval of the transfer of said lease to these plaintiffs; that said board duly passed a resolution approving said assignment and transfer of said franchise to the plaintiffs, and extending said lease for the term of five years, which application and resolution are fully set out in the complaint; that the plaintiffs duly executed a bond as required by law, and since March 27, 1894, have been running, managing, operating, and conducting said ferry, with ample facilities for transacting all such ferry business; that they have paid to the county, as provided in said contract, all rents due thereon; that defendants have combined themselves into an association, calling themselves the "Citizens' Ferry Company," and have caused to be built a ferryboat, and, without right or authority, have been running the same from said Steamboat Landing, in opposition to, and in competition with, said ferry of these plaintiffs; and that said defendants threaten to continue to operate said ferry, to the irreparable damage of the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs pray that an injunction may issue restraining the defendants from continuing to operate said opposition ferry.

The appellants contend: First. That the ferry law of this state was passed in contravention of the organic act of the territory, and is in contravention of the Constitution of this state, and is therefore void. Second. The contract, being for a ferry across the Missouri river opposite an Indian reservation, is in contravention of the laws of the United States relating to intercourse with the Indian tribes, and is therefore illegal and void. Third. That the contract in excess of the five years specified as the first term was unauthorized and void; that, at the time this action was commenced, said lease had expired and terminated. Fourth. That a ferry lease is a franchise, and cannot be assigned or transferred; and that the assignment of said lease by said Bullard to the plaintiffs was void, vesting, no right in the plaintiffs. All these propositions are controverted by the respondents, and they urge that, if all the positions taken by the defendants' counsel are conceded to be correct, yet the defendants cannot attack the proceedings or the franchise, as an action could only have been brought by and in behalf of the state.

Appellants contend that the act of the territorial legislature (being §§ 1361–1369, Comp. Laws) providing for the granting of ferry leases was in conflict with section 1889 of the organic act of the territory, which prohibits the territories from "granting private charters or especial privileges." It might be sufficient to say that the territorial supreme court passed upon this question in Evans v. Hughes County, 6 Dak. 102, and held the law was not in conflict with the organic act. But, as the decision in that case was a memorandum decision, we shall briefly state our reasons for concurring in the views expressed by that court.

The statute relating to the granting of ferry leases was passed substantially in its present form, in 1866. No act of Congress disaffirming it has ever been passed. We may conclude, therefore, that, in the view of Congress, there was nothing in the statute conflicting with the organic act. When an act of the territorial legislature has been in force more than a quarter of a century, and acquiesced in by Congress, it may be safely assumed that the law has received the implied sanction of Congress. In Clinton v. Englebrecht, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 434, 20 L. ed. 659, the Supreme Court of the United States, in speaking of a law of the territory of Utah, says: "In the first place we observe that the law has received the implied sanction of Congress. It was adopted in 1859. It has been upon the statute book for more than twelve years. It must have been transmitted to Congress soon after it was enacted, for it was the duty of the secretary of the territory to transmit to that body copies of all laws, on or before the 1st of the next December in each year. The simple disapproval by Congress as any time would have annulled it. It is no unreasonable inference, therefore, that it was approved by that body." Section 1889 was amended or explained by Congress in several acts, the last, to which we shall refer, being the act of July 30, 1886, in which it was provided that the territories shall "not pass special or local laws in any of the following enumerated cases: . . . Chartering or licensing ferries or toll-bridges." It will be noticed that the terms used are "local or special laws." In our view, the law in controversy is neither local nor special. It is a law applicable to all the counties of the state in which there are rivers or streams of sufficient magnitude to require the establishment of ferries, and the right to bid for the lease is open and free to all. The law, therefore, is neither local nor special, in the sense those words are used in the act. The granting of ferry licenses or leases is peculiarly within the province of state legislation, and not less so of territorial legislation, the territorial legislature being given power to legislate on all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. Guild v. First Nat. Bank, 4 S. D. 566; Territory, McMahon, v. O'Connor, 5 Dak. 405, 3 L. R. A. 355; Conway v. Taylor, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 603, 17 L. ed. 191. In speaking of ferries, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the latter case, says: "There has been now nearly three quarters of a century of practical interpretation of the Constitution. During all that time, as before the Constitution had its birth, the states have exercised the power to establish and regulate ferries; Congress, never. We have sought in vain for any act of Congress which involves the exercise of this power. That the authority lies within the scope of 'that immense mass' of undelegated powers which 'are reserved to the states, respectively,' we think too clear to admit of doubt." In view of the fact, therefore, that the act of the territory relating to leasing ferries has never been disapproved by Congress is general in its character, and does not grant any special privilege, but is open to all who choose to bid for the privilege of establishing a ferry, and that control of ferries is especially within the legislative powers of the state, and equally so within those of territories, we conclude that the claim that the act in question is in conflict with the organic act is untenable. As stated by the supreme court of the territory in Evans v. Hughes County, supra, the power to grant ferry leases or licenses belongs to the police power of the state, and may be exercised upon navigable rivers, subject to the power of Congress to supersede the subordinate control. Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 626; Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23; Conway v. Taylor, supra; Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 419; Parker v. Metropolitan R. Co. 109 Mass. 506; People v. New York, 32 Barb. 102.

The contention that the west bank of the Missouri river, opposite the steamboat landing where the plaintiffs were authorized to establish a ferry, is embraced within an Indian reservation, and that the lease is therefore void, is equally untenable. The place where the ferry is established being within the jurisdiction of the board of county commissioners of Potter county, that board was authorized to grant the license or lease. Whatever rights the lessees might have to land on the opposite side of the river was a matter between them and the United States government. But as the government is not complaining of this lease, and the defendants are not asserting any right under the United States so far as the case is now presented, it is not necessary to pass upon the question as to the rights the plaintiffs have under their license to land upon the opposite bank of the river. This is not a matter, however, that affects the validity of the license to the plaintiffs. This was so decided in the case of People v. Babcock, 11 Wend. 587. In that case, Mr. Justice Nelson, delivering the opinion of the supreme court of New York, says: "The county of Niagara extends westerly to the middle of the Niagara river, and the power of the court of common pleas of that county to license ferries within its limits is without qualification. 1 Rev. Stat. p. 526, § 1. So far as jurisdiction is concerned, it is as complete over this river to the center thereof, as over any other stream within the county. The privilege of the license may not be as valuable to the grantee by not extending across the river; but as far as it does extend, he is entitled to all the provisions of the law, the object of which is to secure the exclusive privilege of maintaining a ferry at a designated place. The prohibition in the 8th section of the act against using a ferry without a license is, in terms, co-extensive with the power given to grant a ferry." This case is cited with approval, and quoted from, in Conway v. Taylor, supra, which was also a similar case, as the ferry extended from Kentucky to the state of Ohio. And see also Tugwell v. Eagle Pass Ferry Co. 74 Tex. 480. That the granting of a ferry license is not a regulation of commerce is too well settled to require further discussion. Gibbons v. Ogden, Conway v. Taylor, and Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, supra; Cardwell v. American River Bridge Co. 113 U. S. 205, 28 L. ed. 959; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. ed. 710; Parkersburg & O. R. Transp. Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S. 691, 27 L. ed. 584; Tugwell v. Eagle Pass Ferry Co. supra.

It is next contended that, while the board was authorized to grant a lease for a term not exceeding fifteen years, it did not possess the power to grant a lease for five years, with a privilege of five or ten more years, at the option of the licensee. We are unable to discover any force in this position. So long as the board kept within the limitation of fifteen years, we can discover no legal objection to the board making such a contract as to time, within the limitation, as it might, in its discretion, deem proper. Again, in the case at bar the board made a new contract with the present plaintiffs, and required a new bond, which was given. The lease was made to them in consideration of their agreement to carry out fully the terms and conditions of said original contract, and to secure which a new bond was given. Unless the assignment was void, we can discover no legal objection to the lease on account of the time fixed.

It is next contended that, this being a franchise, it was not assignable. Whether or not such a franchise is ordinarily assignable, so as to bind the state without its consent, it is not necessary now to decide, as the assignment in the case at bar was made with the consent of the state, by its agents, the board of county commissioners. People v. Duncan, 41 Cal. 507.

It is also contended that the lease or license is not exclusive, and that the defendants had the right to establish and maintain a ferry at the place as alleged in the complaint. But the ferry law provides that no other ferry license shall be granted within a distance of 2 miles thereof across the same stream. As no person is authorized to establish or maintain a ferry without first having obtained a license therefor, the license granted is necessarily exclusive for the 2 miles on either side thereof. Unless the license, when granted was made exclusive by law for the distance specified on either side of the specified point, few persons would be willing to pay a consideration for such license and incur the expense necessary to procure the requisite boats and machinery for the establishment of such a ferry. The evident design and purpose of the ferry law are to afford sufficient inducements to secure proper ferry appliances for the accommodation of the public, and to secure as large a revenue as possible for the county school fund. The whole matter, with certain limitations, is left to the board of county commissioners, as agents of the state (Evans v. Hughes County, 3 S. D. 580), upon the theory that such board will see that the interests of the public are properly provided for, and the largest possible revenue is obtained for the schools of the county.

The system providing for granting ferry licenses in this state seems to be one usually adopted by the states of the Union. The reasons for holding the ferry license law valid under the organic act applies equally to our state Constitution, in which the language used is different, but in meaning substantially the same. The constitutional provision is: "The legislature is prohibited from enacting any private or special laws in the following cases: . . . Authorizing persons to keep ferries across streams wholly in this state."

Upon the facts stated in the complaint, the court committed no error in overruling the demurrer, and the order overruling the same is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

A. M. JARRETT
v.
Jason S. GOODNOW et al., Appts.

(39 W. Va. 602.)

*1. A party entitled to plead in an action at law the defenses specified in § 5, chap. 126, Code 1891, need not plead them in the action, but may avail himself of them in equity without any excuse for not using them at law.

2. In sales of personal property by one in possession, there is an implied warranty of good title.

3. One selling personal property, knowing he has no title, and concealing that fact from the purchaser, is liable for fraud.

*Headnotes by BRANNON, P.

NOTE.—General equitable jurisdiction in regard to injunctions against judgments.

I. In matters of concurrent jurisdiction.
II. Where there is a failure to defend at law.
III. Where there is negligence in not asserting a legal defense.
IV. Where a legal defense was asserted at law.
V. For defenses not available at law.
VI. On a bill of discovery to aid defense.
VII. Where there is a remedy at law.

I. In matters of concurrent jurisdiction.

In the case of JARRETT v. GOODNOW an injunction was granted where the defense of failure of consideration was not made at law, as W. Va. Code, chap. 126, § 5, provided for equity jurisdiction on three grounds,—failure of consideration, fraud in the procurance of a note, and breach of warranty to title of personal property; and § 6 expressly gave the right to make a defense at law or omit that and go to equity as the debtor preferred, without giving excuse for not defending at law. This is in accord with the weight of authority, although in the case of JARRETT v. GOODNOW a statute controlled.

Where the matters set up as grounds for an injunction might have been used as a defense to the action, and of which courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction, the weight of authority is that the failure to use the same at law will not prevent equitable relief of injunction.

So, in Babcock v. McCamant, 53 Ill. 214, an injunction was granted against a judgment that was not defended at law and the grounds were cognizable in law or equity, where the defense was fraudulent alteration of a judgment, although a statute conferred power on the courts of law to quash the execution.

And where the judgment was obtained without notice, and Gantt's (Ark.) Dig. § 2615, provided for quashing an execution, as this was only a concurrent remedy and did not prevent equitable relief. Ryan v. Boyd, 33 Ark. 778.

And where the defense was fraud, as equity could afford more adequate relief. Boyce v. Grundy, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 210, 7 L. ed. 655.

And where the defense was fraud and no objection was made to equitable jurisdiction. Endicott v. Penny, 14 Smedes & M. 144.

And where the defense was set-off and payment, as the plea of set-off was unknown to the common law, and long before it was admitted by the statute courts of chancery retained jurisdiction for the purpose of setting off accounts. Hughes v. M'Coun, 3 Bibb, 254.

And where the same rule applied to "payment after the day." Harlan v. Wingate, 2 J. J. Marsh. 138.

And where good reason existed why an equitable defense of set-off could not be made at law, although Ga. Code, §§ 3081, 3082, provided that an equitable defense may be set up at law. Radcliffe v. Varner, 56 Ga. 222.

The concurrent remedy in a court of law to set off one judgment against another will not prevent the exercise of equitable jurisdiction of injunction where one of the parties is insolvent. Gridley v. Garrison, 4 Paige, 647.

In Hempstead v. Watkins, 6 Ark, 317, 42 Am. Dec. 696, it was held that a surety who was released by delay was entitled to an injunction where he had made no defense at law, under Ark. Const. art. 6, § 6, providing that "until the general assembly shall deem it expedient to establish courts of chancery, the circuit courts shall have jurisdiction in matters of equity, subject to appeal to the supreme court, in such manner as may be prescribed by law," and Ark. Rev. Stat. chap. 43, § 1, providing that the circuit court shall exercise chancery jurisdiction in all cases where adequate relief cannot be had at law. Where the jurisdiction of courts of chancery and law was concurrent, in consequence of courts of law having enlarged their jurisdiction by act of the legislature without prohibitory words, the party may make his election as to the tribunal in which he will make his defense.

And where a surety was discharged and his defense was refused at law. King v. Baldwin, 17 Johns. 384, 8 Am. Dec. 415.

And where Nix. (N. J.) Dig. 669, conferred on a court of law power to administer equitable relief in a case of a judgment recovered against both principal and surety, as this did not abridge the jurisdiction of a court of equity, and the party aggrieved may select his tribunal at his option. Irick v. Black, 17 N. J. Eq. 189.

And where the defense was that the action was for a gambling debt. Clay v. Fry, 3 Bibb, 248, 6 Am. Dec. 654.

In Power v. Reeder, 9 Dana, 6, it was said that courts of equity have jurisdiction, concurrently with courts of law, of matters of account, and a party does not lose his right to be heard in equity in such a case by being sued and submitting to a judgment, without defense at law.

In Bromley v. Holland, 7 Ves. Jr. 3, it was said that the jurisdiction of a court of equity which is original to that court will not be overthrown by law courts assuming concurrent jurisdiction where complainant prays for an accounting of payments made, and a cancelation of an annuity.

In Overton v. Stevens, 8 Mo. 622, it was said that it was generally true that equity has no jurisdiction where the party had a complete defense and failed to make it. But if the defense be of such a character that it might be made either in law or in equity, a court of chancery would afford relief though the party had neglected to make his defense at law.

But there are some cases which have refused an injunction on the ground that the right to defend at law precludes equitable relief.

And an injunction was refused where a set-off was not used at law, relying upon a separate action, although courts of equity have original jurisdiction in cases of set-off. But a party sued at law has his election to set off his claim or resort to his separate action, and if he deliberately elects the last, he cannot come into a court of equity and ask to be allowed to make a different determination

4. Though generally injunction does not lie against a judgment to let in set-offs, yet it will lie where the judgment creditor is insolvent.

(December 8, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Taylor County overruling a motion to dissolve a temporary injunction enjoining the execution of a judgand to resort to a right which he once voluntarily waived. Hendrickson v. Hinckley, 58 U. S. 17 How. 443, 15 L. ed. 123.

And where the defense of an accommodation indorser arose out of a trust and an equitable right to have trust funds applied in discharge of a bill of exchange in suit. Foster v. State Bank, 17 Ala. 672.

And in Glidewell v. Hite, 5 How. (Miss.) 110, and Green v. Robinson, 5 How. (Miss.) 80, it was held that equity will not grant injunctions on the ground that the contract was against public policy, where the defendant through negligence failed to make his defense at law. In all cases of concurrent jurisdiction the court which first exercises it must decide finally. And it will be no exception to the rule that the party neglected to make the defense at law.

In matters of concurrent jurisdiction of law and equity, it seems that an election to assert a defense at law will preclude an injunction for the same cause.

So, an injunction was refused in a case of concurrent jurisdiction after the same grounds had been asserted in the court of law where the defense was release of a surety and was made at law by demurrer to the declaration, as such a defense was an election which precluded equitable interference. Arrington v. Washington, 14 Ark. 218.

And where the defense was that a surety was discharged. Maxwell v. Connor, 1 Hill, Eq. 14.

And where the defense was set-off. Garvin v. Squires, 9 Ark. 533, 50 Am. Dec. 224; Burton v. Hynson, 14 Ark. 32; Harrison v. Nettleship, 2 Myl. & K. 423, 3 L. J. Ch. N. S. 86.

And where the defense was set-off and the motion for new trial was withdrawn, and there was concurrent jurisdiction in the appellate court, but which was not resorted to. Miller v. Duvall, 26 Md. 47.

And where the judgment was on an award. Emerson v. Udall, 13 Vt. 477, 37 Am. Dec. 604.

And where the defense of fraud was made, as the whole defense must be made at law. Le Guen v. Gouverneur, 1 Johns. Cas. 436, 1 Am. Dec. 121; Smith v. McIver, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 532, 6 L. ed. 152.

And where the defense at law was that the action was a gambling debt. Moffett v. White, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 325; Davidson v. Givins, 2 Bibb, 200, 4 Am. Dec. 695.

In Timberlake v. Cobbs, 2 J. J. Marsh. 136, an injunction was refused where the defense that the action was on a gambling debt was not established by the evidence. It was said that chancery courts have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law in that class of cases.

In Dilly v. Barnard, 8 Gill & J. 170, it was said that "in cases where the court of equity has concurrent jurisdiction with a court of law, as in matters of account, it seems that equity will not relieve on the mere ground of the difficulty of the defense in a court of law; but it must be a case where it is impossible for the party to make an effectual defense before that jurisdiction."

In Overton v. Searcy, Cooke (Tenn.) 36, 5 Am. Dec. 665, it was said that where the jurisdiction of the court is concurrent a fair determination of the question in either court concludes the parties on the point.

In Saunders v. Jennings, 2 J. J. Marsh. 513, it was said that it is a general rule that a party who relies, in a court of law, on a matter of defense (for instance fraud), which is triable either in law or in chancery, will not be allowed again to urge the same ground for relief in equity.

And in Russell v. Stinson, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.) 1, the same was said to be the rule if the judgment was final.

In Harlan v. Wingate, 2 J. J. Marsh. 138, it was said that in matters of concurrent jurisdiction after a defense at law an injunction will not be granted.

In Turney v. Young, 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 266, it was said that equity will take cognizance of a case equitable in its nature originally, though the same matter may have been before a court of law, but this is subject to modification. Where the plaintiff seeks the aid of a court of law and a matter of concurrent jurisdiction is there tried, relief will be denied to him in equity. But where courts of law have taken jurisdiction of a defense equitable in its nature, and it was unavailable at law, no matter for what cause, the defendant is entitled to relief in equity. So in complicated matters of account or investigations of land titles or inheritances.

In Conway v. Ellison, 14 Ark. 360, Bently v. Dillard, 6 Ark. 79, and Howell v. Motes, 54 Ala. 1, it was said that where courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction, a party may make his election as to the tribunal in which he will bring forward his defense, and if he defends at law he will be precluded from coming into chancery. But this rule does not apply where the defense is of an equitable nature.

An injunction was granted where the defense was that a surety was released and complainants in the injunction suit called for an accounting, although a defense was made at law. But it was doubtful if the court of law could grant relief. Rathbone v. Warren, 10 Johns. 587.

For equitable jurisdiction in matters of sureties, see Michener v. Springfield Engine & T. Co. (Ind.) 31 L. R. A. 59, note, "Enjoining judgments against or in favor of sureties."

II. Where there is a failure to defend at law.

Courts of equity have generally refused to interfere with a judgment at law, where the matters set up as a cause for injunction could have been used as a legal defense, and a good excuse is not given for not asserting the same at law. Williams v. Jones, 10 Smedes & M. 108; Megget v. Lynch, 8 La. Ann. 6; Brooks v. Whitson, 7 Smedes & M. 513; Miller v. M'Guire, Morris (Iowa) 150; Garrison v. Cobb, 106 Ind. 245; Minor v. Stone, 1 La. IV. Where a legal defense was asserted at law.

Hearn, 2 Port. (Ala.) 262; Moore v. Hill, 59 Ga. 760; Shields v. McClung, 6 W. Va. 79; Hendrickson v. Hinckley, 58 U. S. 17 How. 443, 15 L. ed. 123; Phillips v. Pullen, 45 N. J. Eq. 5; Johnson v. Dec. 714.

For the above cases, see note to Norwegian Plow Co. v. Bollman, 31 L. R. A. 747, "Injunctions against judgments for defenses existing prior to their rendition."

In Brick v. Burr, 47 N. J. Eq. 189, it was said that where the ground for the injunciton was litigated at law, and the question was within the jurisdiction of that court, an injunction will not be granted.

V. For defenses not available at law.

An injunction against a judgment will be granted if the grounds for the injunction are not available at law as a defense in the action where the judgment is obtained. Smith v. Coble, Phill. Eq. 332; Ferriday v. Selcer, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 258; Hager v. Buechler, 6 Ill. App. 462; Harlan v. Wingate, 2 J. J. Marsh. 138; Breeden v. Grigg, 8 Baxt. 163; Perry v. Stiter, 37 Mo. 273; Stark v. Thompson, 3 T. B. Mon. 296; Greames v. Stritho, 2 Dick. 469; Fields v. Carney, 4 Baxt. 137; Scott v. Shreeve, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 605, 6 L. ed. 744; Marshall v. Cooper, 43 Md. 46; Merrill v. Souther, 6 Dana, 305; Ellis v. Kerr (Tex.) 23 S. W. 1050; O'Neill v. Perryman, 102 Ala. 522; Markham v. Angier, 57 Ga. 43.

For the above cases, see note to Norwegian Plow Co. v. Bollman (Neb.) 31 L. R. A. 747, "Injunctions against judgments for defenses existing prior to their rendition."

And the same rule applies in case of injunctions in favor of sureties. Cornelius v. Thomas, 1 Tenn. Ch. 283; Simmons v. Camp, 65 Ga. 673; Tuscumbia, C. & D. R. Co. v. Rhodes, 8 Ala. 206; Hobbs v. Duff, 23 Cal. 596; King v. Baldwin, 17 Johns. 384, 8 Am. Dec. 415, Reversing 2 Johns. Ch. 554; M'Haney v. Crabtree, 6 T. B. Mon. 104.

So, an injunction was allowed against a judgment in ejectment where the defendants held a superior equitable title of which they could not avail themselves at law. Johnson v. Christian, 128 U. S. 374, 32 L. ed. 412; Gaines v. Hale, 26 Ark. 168.

And where the defense in ejectment was an equitable title which could not be used at law, and the injunction suit was also a bill for specific performance. McCurry v. Robinson, 23 Ga. 321.

And where the defense in ejectment was equitable and could not by any possibility have been made available as a legal defense, and the complainant was not required to resort to equity before a trial was had at law in a case where he did not know that his defense could not be made available at law. Pollock v. Gilbert, 16 Ga. 398, 60 Am. Dec. 732.

And where in ejectment the boundaries of the land were so confused that a defense could not be made at law. Hardcastle v. Shafto, 1 Anstr. 77, and 184.

And where the boundary line was not in issue in ejectment, and the officer threatened to execute the writ of ha. fa. invading the house and running the line through the building, as such damage would be irreparable, and a survey was necessary to determine the line. Jones v. Brandon, 60 Miss. 556.

The refusal to try an equitable set-off by the court in an action at law will entitle the defendant to an injunction against the judgment. Farquharson v. Pitcher, 2 Russ. Ch. 81.

An injunction was granted where the defense was a specific agreement to allow as set-off a note held by complainant, as this could only be enforced in equity. French v. Garner, 7 Port. (Ala.) 549.

And where the defense was that a surety to a sealed note was discharged by the payee by an unsealed writing, and induced to believe he was discharged until the principal became insolvent, as this was an equitable defense and amounted to a fraud. Teague v. Russell, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 420.

And where the ground of defense in behalf of a surety was that his principal had been released by an agreement of all his creditors, but that only one of the plaintiffs at law, who were partners, had executed the release, which would not be a legal defense, and complainant asked for a cancelation of the bond. It was also said that if it was a legal defense it would not prevent a suit in equity, as jurisdiction in equity prevailed in matters of discharge of a surety before that doctrine prevailed at law. Hawkshaw v. Parkins, 2 Swanst. 539.

And where a defense of sureties on an appeal bond on a trial of right of property was that the property was taken out of the hands of the principal by an older execution than that of the prevailing party, who claimed the property by a junior levy as against a trustee, and was not made at law, and it was an equitable defense. Ferriday v. Selcer, Freem. Ch. (Miss.) 258.

And where the defense on a bond for the benefit of a trustee was that the deed was fraudulent, notwithstanding an unsuccessful attempt to defeat the same at law where complainant called for an account of the trust. Billups v. Sears, 5 Gratt. 31, 50 Am. Dec. 105.

One of the grounds on which the injunction rests is that the note on which the judgment was recovered was given for an engine, boiler, and burrs, and that the consideration has wholly failed, inasmuch as Newlon had conveyed them to Durbin, trustee, to secure Newlon's creditors. Goodnow's counsel, in answer to this, contends that this defense ought to

And where the defense at law was a modification of a written agreement by parol, and it did not clearly appear that relief could have been had at law, and defense was not made at law. Newborn v. Glass, 5 Humph. 520.

And where the defense was a conditional acceptance of the draft in suit, which could not be made at law. Lamb v. Anderson, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 224.

And where adequate relief could only be had in equity on the ground of fraud in the consideration of the debt sued upon, although the court at law erroneously allowed the defense to be made which was unavailing. Appleton v. Harwell, Cooke (Tenn.) 242.

And where the defense was for a rescission of purchase of land on the ground of fraud, as this was an independent ground of equitable relief, although it may have failed at law. Greenlee v. Gaines, 13 Ala. 198, 48 Am. Dec. 49.

And where the judgment was in assumpsit on an oil contract, and another action had also been brought, and the defense was that the oil was partnership property between the parties. The question of partnership was a controverted fact arising but not conclusive on the matters in the suit, and in an action to settle the partnership an injunction was granted on the ground of preventing multiplicity of suits. Coville v. Gilman, 13 W. Va. 314.

And where the suit was a mortgage foreclosure and there were grave doubts as to whether the mortgagor upon a rule to foreclose was entitled to make any other defense that that specified in the Georgia judiciary act of 1799, which is "that he is entitled to payments which have not been credited upon the mortgage, or to set-off which in equity ought to be allowed," and the injunction suit was also for cancelation of the notes sued upon, which were void. Clifton v. Livor, 24 Ga. 91.

In Young v. Reynolds, 4 Md. 375, it was said that an injunction will be granted where there are equities cognizable in a court of equity which could not be availed of in a court of law.

In Medart v. Fasnatch, 15 La. Ann. 621, it was held that the rule that a failure to make a legal defense prevents an injunction against the judgment does not apply to married women who are under a disability, and it is a good ground for injunction that the defendant as law was a married woman and the debt was a note on which she was surety for her husband. and which was void at law.

In Howell v. Motes, 54 Ala. 1, it was said that an unsuccessful attempt or an entire omission to assert in a court of law a prior equitable defense does not change the right to relief in equity.

VI. On a bill of discovery to aid defense.

A bill of discovery in aid of a defense at law is recognized as belonging to equity jurisdiction. But an injunction will be refused on a bill for a discovery if the same is not filed until after judgment, and the delay in filing the same is not excused. Powell v. Stewart, 17 Ala. 719; Jones v. Kirksey, 10 Ala. 579; Kinney v. Ogden, 3 N. J. Eq. 168; Thompson v. Berry, 3 Johns. Ch. 395, Affirmed, Berry v. Thompson, 17 Johns. 436; Whitmore v. Thornton, 3 Price, 241; Brown v. Swann, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 497, 9 L. ed. 508.

So, an injunction was refused on a bill of discovery filed after a judgment at law, in aid of a defense to that action, where the discovery was in regard to release and indemnity. Wright v. King, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 12.

And where the defense was fraud and partial failure of consideration. Marsh v. Edgerton, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 198.

And where the discovery was in regard to payment. Hinrichsen v. Van Winkle, 27 Ill. 334.

And where the discovery was in regard to set-off. Hill v. McNeill, 8 Port. (Ala.) 432.

And where the discovery was in regard to an accounting, and the defense in an action of covenant was performance, Dilly v. Barnard, 8 Gill & J. 170.

And where the discovery was in regard to usury. Mallory v. Matlock, 10 Ala. 595; McCollum v. Prewitt, 37 Ala. 573, 1 Ala. Sel. Cas. 498.

And where the discovery was in regard to a breach of warranty. Faulkner v. Harwood, 6 Rand. (Va.) 125.

And where the discovery was in regard to the title on a trial of the right of property. Donaldson v. Kendall, 2 Ga. Dec. 227.

And where the discovery was in regard to a defense of a surety on a sheriff's bond, that the plaintiff at law had loaned the money to the sheriff after it was collected. Alley v. Ledbetter, 1 Dev. Eq. 449.

And where the discovery was in regard to a defense of an accommodation indorser, that the notes in suit were signed in blank and not filled up until after the death of the principal and without any authority, and were renewals of other notes in judgment. Green v. Massie, 21 Gratt. 356.

And where it was claimed that the defense could only be established by a bill of discovery and the matters in the bill were denied. Overton v. Searcy, Cooke (Tenn.) 36, 5 Am. Dec. 665; Cammann v. Traphagan, 1 N. J. Eq. 28; Fowler v. Roe, 11 N. J. Eq. 367; Vaughn v. Fuller, 23 Ga. 366.

And where the defendant claimed a rescission but did not file a bill for discovery until after judgment, and the nature of the pleas at law were not disclosed by the record. Moore v. Dial, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 155.

And where the bill of discovery against plaintiff or interrogatories could have been and were not filed at law. Drew v. Hayne, 8 Ala. 438.

And where defendant was negligent in not utilizing evidence attainable to prove payment, and sought relief by injunction and bill of discovery. Tapp v. Rankin, 9 Leigh, 478.

And where a defense was not made of a release of a surety, and that the debt was not due, and that there was a usurious extension, as a bill of discovery would have established the defense before judgment if such defense existed. Cheyney v. Wright, 7 Phila. 431.

And where the bill for discovery did not state the matter sought to be discovered or show that it was material, or the nature of the defense at law. Lucas v. Bank of Darien, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 280.

A bill of discovery which is fruitless should be dismissed and not held over as an original bill, where there has been a trial at law. Peace v. Nailing, 1 Dev. Eq. 289.

In Martin v. Spier, 1 Hayw. (N.C.) 369, Robinson v. Wheeler, 51 N. H. 386, and Dilly v. Barnard, 8 Gill & J. 170, it was said that if a discovery was needed to enable a defendant to plead his defense he will be required ordinarily to seek it while the suit is pending, or he cannot obtain relief in equity.

In Paterson v. Bangs, 9 Paige, 627, it was said that where a party has the means of defense within his power, whether those means are available at law, or only available in the court of equity by bill of discovery and relief, and the party knows of the existence of these means before the trial at law and neglects to use them, and goes to trial at law have been pleaded at law to defeat the recovery of the judgment, and that it cannot be made the subject of equity jurisdiction. This position is not tenable, as § 5, chap. 126, Code, would give jurisdiction to equity on the three grounds of failure of consideration, fraud in the procurance of the note, and that of breach of warranty of title to personal property, and upon other proofs and other questions, and fails, the court will not afterwards give him relief.

But in Pollock v. Gilbert, 16 Ga. 398, 60 Am. Dec. 732, it was said that the case of Paterson v. Bangs, supra, was overruled, and was qualified by the fact that the complainant must know that his defense is not available at law.

If the delay in filing a bill for discovery is excused, or there are peculiar equitable grounds for injunction, the same will be granted.

So, an injunction was granted where it was disclosed on a bill of discovery that complainant had an equitable mortgage by virtue of a bill of sale executed before the bankruptcy of the grantor and surrendered thereafter on delivery of an assignment of the property, but which assignment was held void at law. Hankey v. Vernon, 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 12.

And where the defense was that the consideration was a gambling debt, and the bill was for a discovery, as equity has complete original jurisdiction in regard to a gaming promise. This is an exception to the general rule, although the judgment and verdict were rendered upon a full and fair trial. The complainant was entitled to relief, under Va. act 1748, pursuing the statute of Anne, chap. 14, giving an action for the recovery of money and allowing a bill for discovery with a provision remitting the penalties and forfeitures incurred. White v. Washington, 5 Gratt. 645.

And where the judgment was against a sheriff for not returning an execution, and it was disclosed on a bill for a discovery that the judgment had been satisfied by a fraudulent arrangement between the creditor and the debtor. Harrison v. Harrison, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 137.

And where the defense to an action on an indemnifying bond for the appointment of a trustee in a deed of trust was that the debt was fraudulent notwithstanding a defense at law, where the bill asked for an accounting and for a discovery, as adequate relief could not be had at law. Billups v. Sears, 5 Gratt. 31, 50 Am. Dec. 105.

In Norton v. Woods, 5 Paige, 249, an injunction was granted after judgment, on complainant filing a bill for discovery, where excuse was given for not filing it before. In this case a court of law had refused to allow complainant to use the evidence of the nominal plaintiffs although they had no interest in the suit, and the only remedy was by a bill for relief where in equity feigned issues could be awarded to determine the real parties in the controversy. And this bill was sufficient to constitute a case for equitable relief.

In Gainsborough v. Gifford, 2 P. Wms. 424, where the answer of the defendant in the injunction suit admitted the equity of plaintiff's claim, showing that she was not liable under a contract for purchase of stock on which a judgment had been obtained, and no defense had been made, the judgment was enjoined. But on affidavits showing that the answer was a mistake leave was given to amend the same though no precedent for such action could be found. This case is usually cited as deciding that the finding of a lost receipt will authorize an injunction, but that is a dictum.

In Quackenbush v. Van Riper, 1 N. J. Eq. 476, it was said that equity will relieve against a judgment, on a bill for discovery on equitable defenses that were not known at the time of the trial.

VII. Where there is a remedy at law.

It is a well-settled principle in regard to injunctions that a court of equity will not interfere with a judgment at law where there is an adequate and ample remedy at law, although there are some exceptions to this rule; but it is regarded as indispensable that the bill of complaint should allege that there is no adequate remedy at law.

So, an injunction will not be granted where there is a remedy at law. Trieste v. Enslen (Ala.) 17 So. 356; Martin v. Orr, 96 Ind. 27; Armsworthy v. Cheshire, 2 Dev. Eq. 234, 34 Am. But in Babcock v. McCamant, 53 Ill. 214, it was held that the remedy by motion to quash an execution where the record has been fraudulently obtained and the judgment increased, will not prevent an injunction against a judgment on account of such fraud as the relief is more complete in equity as it is directed against the judgment itself.

And the remedy by motion will not prevent an injunction where equity can grant more adequate relief. Newman v. Taylor, 69 Miss. 671.

And the remedy by writ of error coram nobis will not prevent an injunction against an execution issued on the judgment obtained without notice on a forged note where the defendant was not liable, and the judgment was rendered in a county where he did not reside. Douglass v. Joyner, 1 Baxt. 32.

And the remedy at law of motion for new trial, writ of error, or error coram nobis, will not prevent enjoining proceedings upon a judgment, obtained without notice or process, where the time had elapsed for using such remedies before the judgment was discovered. Jeffery v. Fitch, 46 Conn. 601.

If the remedy at law is inadequate to afford relief for fraud in the consideration, equity will grant an injunction. Boyce v. Grundy, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 210, 7 L. ed. 655.

And the remedy at law under Conn. Stat. 60, ed. 1838, § 63, providing for granting new trials, does not prevent a court of chancery from granting relief by injunction against execution sale when necessary to prevent a sacrifice of complainant's goods. The stay of execution in such a case is a call for extraordinary powers of the court of equity. Carrington v. Holabird, 19 Conn. 84.

Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing for a motion in the same court to set aside a judgment, does not apply where there has been no service of process or authorized appearance, and the judgment was obtained by fraud. Baker v. O'Riordan, 65 Cal. 368.

The finding of fact by the court, that there is no adequate remedy at law, is sufficient to retain jurisdiction in chancery to enjoin proceedings on the judgment fraudulently obtained, even if relief at law might be obtained after the levy of an execution. Gainty v. Russell, 40 Conn. 450.

Where the remedy at law was doubtful, an injunction was granted against a judgment, on the ground that a bail was released by indulgence. Rathbone v. Warren, 10 Johns. 587.

The remedy under Gantt's (Ark.) Dig. § 2619, for quashing an execution is only cumulative and concurrent, and will not prevent enjoining a judgment that is void. Ryan v. Boyd, 33 Ark. 778.

The remedy of certiorari will not prevent an injunction against a judgment obtained by fraud, where the court in which it was rendered refuses to grant relief. Merriman v. Walton, 105 Cal. 403, 30 L. R. A. 786.

away," as Lord Campbell well said; and now it is settled in England that there is such implied warranty, and it is universally admitted in America. But there is no implied warranty of soundness or quality of goods sold. Mason v. Chappell, 15 Gratt. 572; Benjamin, Sales, § 644, and note 13, p. 640. In this case the vendor, at the date of sale, had given a deed of trust on the property, and his warranty was broken at once. He was also guilty of fraud in the sale. Benjamin, Sales, § 628 says: "If the vendor knew he had no title, and concealed that fact from the buyer, he would be liable on the ground of fraud."

A second ground on which the injunction rests is that Newlon once sold to Jarrett a house and lot, with general warranty, and that a lien was found and adjudged to exist against the property, which Jarrett was compelled to pay, and did pay, long after the judgment, and Jarrett asked that what he paid to remove this lien be set off against the judgment. The amount of this lien was ascertained by decree. Equity will not enjoin a judgment to let in a defense pleadable in the action, where the party has had opportunity to do so, unless prevented by fraud, accident, surprise, or some adventitious circumstance beyond the party's control. Shields v. McClung, 6 W. Va. 79; Harner v. Price, 17 W. Va. 523, 548. And as set-offs may be pleaded in defense, or made the subject of another action, equity generally will not enjoin a judgment to let them in. But it will do so where the party owing them is insolvent. Beard v. Beard, 25 W. Va. 486, 52 Am. Rep. 219; McClellan v. Kinnaird, 6 Gratt. 352; Marshall v. Cooper, 43 Md. 46, Levy v. Steinbach, Id. 212; Lindsay v. Jackson, 2 Paige, 581; 2 High, Inj. § 243. The bill alleged the utter insolvency of Newlon, and the answer does not deny it.

It is assigned as error that the process on the amended bill did not make Goodnow a party to it. It contained no new matter. It only repeats the original bill, and made Durbin, trustee, a party, and he not a necessary party. It contained nothing against Goodnow not in the original bill, and it was dismissed as to the trustee, thus leaving it out of the case, in a legal view, as the decree can be predicated on the original bill alone.

We affirm order and decree.

Dent, J., did not sit.

As to whether or not the proper remedy is to appeal from a judgment rendered without process or appearance, and of which the defendant had knowledge soon after its rendition, was not decided. Taggart v. Wood, 20 Iowa, 236.

As to whether a remedy of motion to quash an execution issued on a transcript filed in the county court from a justice of the peace can be made, was not decided where the complainant did not show the condition of the judgment in the justice court. Gates v. Lane, 44 Cal. 392.

As to whether a remedy by motion will prevent an injunction was not decided. Gillam v. Arnold, 32 S. C. 503.

In Clay County Comrs. v. Markle, 46 Ind. 96, it was said that the fact that there could be no appeal from the decision affords no ground for an injunction to restrain proceedings on a judgment.

The mere fact that the law prohibits an appeal on account of the amount does not of itself afford grounds for an injunction against a judgment or its enforcement. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Henderson, 83 Tex. 70.

For cases on the general rule that a court of equity does not interfere with a judgment at law, unless the complainant has an equitable defense, of which he could not avail himself at law, because it did not amount to a legal defense, or had a good defense at law, which he was prevented from availing himself of by fraud or accident unmixed with negligence of himself or agent, see note to Merriman v. Walton (Cal.) 30 L. R. A. 786, subd. I., "Injunctions against judgments obtained by fraud, accident, mistake, surprise, and duress."

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

COLUMBUS, HOCKING VALLEY, & TOLEDO RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

Stevenson BURKE et al.

(.....Ohio.....)

1. No action can be maintained on an injunction undertaking except in accordance with its terms; and this is true with respect to the principal as well as the sureties.

2. Where in a suit for specific relief a temporary injunction is allowed on the giving of an undertaking as required by statute (Rev. Stat. § 5576), and subsequently the parties submit the issues of law and fact in the case to arbitrators selected by themselves, and bind themselves to abide the award, it being in no way made subject to the approval of the court; and the arbitrators make an award in pursuance of the submission, that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief asked in his petition, and award that he dismiss his action; and afterward the action is so dismissed by consent of the parties and the injunction dissolved,—such award is not a judicial determination that the injunction ought not to have been granted, and will not support an action on the undertaking; nor will such dismissal by consent estop the defendants from making such defense.

3. Where, in such case, the submission

*Headnotes by the COURT.

NOTE.—The above case is a peculiar one in respect to the termination of an action for an injunction on which is based a claim on the injunction undertaking. The voluntary dismissal of the action pursuant to an award of arbitrators upon the merits of the case presents a novel question.

As to the right to recover damages caused by an injunction generally, see note to Mark v. Hyatt (N. Y.) 18 L. R. A. 275.

to arbitration stipulates that its execution should not impair the liability of the obligors on the undertaking, the obligors are not, in an action on the undertaking, precluded from claiming that the award does not furnish a predicate for the action.

4. Where an action is dismissed by consent, and a temporary injunction pending in it dissolved without any judicial action of the court, but as a consequence of the dismissal, such dissolution is of no avail in an action on the injunction undertaking.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lucas County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce certain injunction bonds. Reversed.

Statement by Minshall, Ch. J.:

The action below was commenced in the court of common pleas of Lucas county upon two injunction undertakings. The undertakings were given in a suit brought by the Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company against Stevenson Burke et al. in the court of common pleas of Franklin county, claiming to be the owner of certain stocks and bonds as against the defendants; and asking that the defendants be restrained from disposing of them until the further order of the court. A temporary injunction was allowed on the giving of one of the undertakings mentioned, which, after reciting the making of the order and its terms, is as follows:

"Now, therefore, we, the Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company, by J. W. Shaw, president, P. W. Huntington, and Walter Crafts hereby undertake to the said Stevenson Burke, Charles Hickox, and others in the sum of $100,000 that the said plaintiff, the said the Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company, shall pay to the said Stevenson Burke, Charles Hickox, and others all damages which they, the said defendants, may sustain by reason of the issuing of said injunction if it should be finally decided that the said injunction ought not to have been granted.

"(Signed) The Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company, by J. W. Shaw, President.

"P. W. Huntington,
"Walter Crafts."

On motion of the defendants the venue of the action was changed to Licking county, where, upon their application, an additional undertaking in the sum of $100,000, was required and given. Its terms are similar to the first, being conditioned for the payment of all damages the defendants may have sustained, "in case it be finally decided that the injunction ought not to have been granted." Afterwards, as appears from the petition, the parties on July 11, 1888, entered into a written agreement whereby they referred all the issues of law and fact between them in the action to the arbitrament of certain persons. The agreement is as follows:

"Whereas, the said plaintiff (the railway company) and said defendants have each and all agreed to submit and refer all the issues of law and of fact joined between the parties in said action to the award and determination of James C. Carter, of New York, Lawrence Maxwell and E. W. Kittredge, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Now, therefore, we, the said Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company and Stevenson Burke, Charles Hickox, Charles G. Hickox, William J. McKinnie, Chauncey H. Andrews, Wm. M. Greene, as administrator of M. M. Greene, deceased, and the Toledo & Ohio Central Railway Company, have nominated and appointed and do hereby nominate and appoint James C. Carter, of New York; E. W. Kittredge and Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., of Cincinnati, Ohio, to be arbitrators between us, to whom we refer all the issues of law and of fact joined by the pleadings in said action, to hear and determine the same, and we severally agree that we will each, so far as the same concerns itself or himself respectively, stand to, abide by, and perform the award and determination of the said arbitrators concerning the premises, so as said award be made in writing under the hands of the said arbitrators, and to be ready to be delivered to the parties, or to such of them as shall desire the same, on or before the 1st day of November, 1888. We further agree that the hearing before the said arbitrators shall be conducted under the pleadings and proofs in all respects in the said manner as though said issues were regularly tried in the court of common pleas of the state of Ohio, and that said arbitrators shall hear and determine said issues as a judicial court, with the same powers to permit amendments to said pleadings as might be done in the court wherein said action is now pending, providing that no amendment shall be allowed which shall substantially change cause of action now alleged in said petition; that the said parties, respectively, shall and will produce before said arbitrators all such books, papers, writings, and accounts relating to the matters in issue as shall be in their power or custody respectively, and they shall be notified by any party to produce; that the evidence already taken or that may be taken hereafter by deposition in said action may be used at the hearing before said arbitrators, subject to all objections for incompetency or irrelevancy, and either party shall be at liberty to offer further evidence at said hearing; that such hearing shall be commenced at such time not earlier than the 15th day of August, 1888, and at such place in the town of Saratoga, N. Y., as said arbitrators may appoint, they giving five days' notice thereof to the several parties or their counsel, which notice and all others which may become necessary to give during said arbitration may be given by letter addressed to said counsel or parties at their postoffice addresses, namely, . . . and that said arbitrators shall have the right and authority to adjourn such hearing from time to time, or place to place, until the final conclusion thereof. We do now further agree that said action now pending in said court of common pleas of Licking county, Ohio, shall remain on the docket of said court, and in case said submission should on any account not proceed or said award of said arbitrators shall not be made on or before the 1st day of November, 1888, then said action may proceed to trial. And we do further agree that if for any cause said arbitrators shall fail and not proceed to final award, then and in that case the cause now pending in the court of common pleas of Licking county shall have precedence and be tried before the cause now pending in the circuit court of Franklin county in which the parties hereto are litigants. We do further agree that no proceeding for the vacation of the preliminary injunction granted in said action shall be pressed for hearing until said award shall be made or this submission shall expire or be vacated. And the said the Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company hereby agrees that upon the making of said award, or the expiration or vacation of this submission, the parties enjoined by said preliminary injunction may apply to said court for such adjudication or order concerning said injunction as they may be entitled to; provided, however, that if the award shall be in favor of the plaintiff, and shall adjudge to it an interest in or lien upon the stock and bonds covered by the pending injunction or any of the same, the pending injunction shall continue, except as to stock not affected by said award, until the award shall have been fully performed. And we further agree that neither this submission nor the execution thereof, shall in any wise impair the liability of the said railway company or of P. W. Huntington or Walter C. Crafts upon the undertaking given by them upon the granting of said injunction, nor the liability of said railway company or of P. W. Huntington or E. L. Hinman upon the undertaking given by them as additional security against damages by reason of the granting of said injunction. And we further stipulate and agree that the award so to be made by said arbitrators must be made by them unanimously, and that when so made in accordance with this submission their award shall be final and conclusive upon the parties."

The hearing was had at Saratoga, and on September 17, 1888, the arbitrators made their award in writing as follows:

"We, James C. Carter, E. W. Kittridge, and Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., arbitrators by reason of the agreement of arbitration entered into by and between the Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company and Stevenson Burke, Charles Hickox, Charles G. Hickox, Wm. J. McKinnie, Chauncey H. Andrews, Wm. M. Greene, as administrator of the estate of M. M. Greene, deceased, and the Toledo & Ohio Central Railway Company, dated July 11, 1888, after due notice to all the parties as provided in the said agreement, and their attendance before us at Saratoga, N. Y., in pursuance thereof, and having heard the evidence adduced and the arguments of counsel of all of the said parties, and having duly considered the same, do find the issues joined by the pleadings in the action between the said parties in said agreement mentioned in the court of common pleas of Licking county, Ohio, in favor of the defendants in said action, and we do hereby decide, award, and direct that the said the Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company is not entitled to and shall not recover in any wise, and shall not have, any moneys, damages, account, or other relief from the said Stevenson Burke, Charles Hickox, Charles G. Hickox, William J. McKinnie, Chauncey H. Andrews, Wm. M. Greene, administrator of the estate of M. M. Greene, deceased, or the Toledo & Ohio Central Railway Company, or either of them, for or on account of any of the matter and things alleged in the pleadings in said action and submitted to us for award by said agreement. And we award that the said Columbus, Hocking Valley, & Toledo Railway Company shall be forever barred from prosecuting said action in the court of common pleas of Licking county, Ohio, or any action whatsoever against the said Stevenson Burke, Charles Hickox, Charles G. Hickox, William J. McKinnie, Chauncey H. Andrews, Wm. M. Greene, administrator of the estate of M. M. Greene, deceased, or the Toledo & Ohio Central Railway Company, or either of them, for or on account of any of the matters and things alleged for cause of action in the pleadings in said action. We further award that the plaintiff therein dismiss said action at its costs." Signed by the arbitrators.

Afterward, on November 13, 1888, the following entry in the action was made on the journal of the court:

"This day came the parties by their attorneys and, by consent, showed to the court that on the 11th day of July, 1888, the parties submitted all the facts and issues joined in the pleadings in this case to the arbitrament and award of James C. Carter, Esq., of New York, and E. W. Kittredge and Lawrence Maxwell, Esqs., of Cincinnati, Ohio, and that said arbitrators have heard the parties and their counsel and all the evidence that they had to submit in the case, and carefully and fully considered the same, did on the 17th day of September, 1888, award and decide that the plaintiff has no right to any relief from the defendants or either of them; that this suit be dismissed at plaintiff's costs, and the plaintiff be forever barred from hereafter prosecuting any other action against the defendants or either of them for any of the same causes of action.

"Thereupon the plaintiff in pursuance of said submission and award duly dismissed its said petition and action.

"By the agreement of the parties, no record shall be made in said action except at the request of some one of the parties, and at the cost of the party requesting it, and by like agreement, reference may be had and use made of the pleadings and journal entries and all other documents in said action properly matter of record, the same as if the said proceedings were duly recorded.

"And thereupon upon motion it is ordered and adjudged that the injunction that was granted in this action while the same was pending in the court of common pleas of Franklin county be vacated, dissolved, and dismissed, and that the plaintiff pay the costs of this action and of all the proceedings in this action in this court and in the court of common pleas of Franklin county, and in default of payment execution issued."

And the plaintiffs then allege "that it was then and there decided by said court of common pleas of Licking county, Ohio, that said injunction ought not to have been granted, and that said injunction was wrongfully obtained." Averments are then made as to the damages sustained by the plaintiffs.

The defendant, the railroad company, in its answer averred, that the order entered on the journal of the court after the arbitration had been had "was made and entered by the agreement of the parties, and at the instance of the plaintiffs and solely in consequence of said award, and only for the purpose of carrying into effect the decision thereof that said plaintiffs should dismiss said action, which was all that said award decided as to the disposition of said action; and that said part of said order dissolving and dismissing said injunction was added merely for the formal dissolution of said injunction, which dissolution necessarily resulted from said dismissal of the action by the plaintiffs as incidental thereto." In reply the plaintiff's admitted, "that no special motion for the dissolution of said injunction was ever submitted to the court of common pleas of Licking county, and that there has been no adjudication of said court concerning said injunction since the making of said award except as set out in said answer." And also admitted "that said injunction was not submitted to said arbitrators, nor the question whether or not it was properly allowed, and admit that said arbitrators did not consider the same, but considered and passed upon only the issues of law and fact joined by the pleadings in said action." There is no denial of the averment that the entry was made by agreement of the parties and at the instance of the plaintiff.

The issues in this action were tried to the court, which found for the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment for the full amount of both undertakings, which, on error, was affirmed by the circuit court.

A number of questions have been raised and argued on the question of damages; but from the view taken of the case, their statement is unnecessary.

Messrs. J. B. Foraker and J. K. Richards, for plaintiffs in error:

The suit is on the bond and can be sustained only by showing that the terms of the bond have been fulfilled.

The only question is whether in view of the facts stated it has been "finally decided that the injunction ought not to have been granted."

The decision required by the bond is the decision of the court—a tribunal created by and acting under sanction of the law, and it must be final, terminating the action.

Shearman v. New York Central Mills, 11 How. Pr. 269; Ninth Ave. R. Co. v. New York Elev. R. Co. 3 Abb. N. C. 22; Musgrave v. Sherwood, 76 N. Y. 194.

The decision must be that the injunction "ought not to have been granted" at the time it was granted; in other words, must look to and turn upon the facts as they were when the suit was brought, and not upon facts intervening since.

Palmer v. Foley, 71 N. Y. 106; Neugent v. Swan, 61 How. Pr. 40; Shearman v. New York Central Mills, supra.

The award and determination did not amount to the decision of a court because it was made in a common-law arbitration purposely entered into by the parties to put a speedy end to the suit without judicial determination, by settling the controversy outside of court and according to the opinion of the arbitrators whether right or wrong.

In order that the parties may secure the benefits of a statutory arbitration the submission and the proceedings of the arbitrators must comply with the statute in every essential particular.

Strum v. Cunningham, 3 Ohio, 287; Western Female Seminary v. Blair, 1 Disney (Ohio) 370; Estes v. Phillips, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 3.

Common law arbitration obtains in Ohio. This was a common-law award and it had no judicial force.

Tullis v. Sewell, 3 Ohio, 511; Brown v. Kincaid, Wright (Ohio), 37; Bradly v. Sneath, 6 Ohio, 490; Ormsby v. Bakewell, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 99; Conner v. Drake, 1 Ohio St. 166; Swasey v. Laycock, 1 Handy (Ohio), 335; Childs v. Updyke, 9 Ohio St. 333; Western Female Seminary v. Blair, and Estes v. Phillips, supra; State v. Jackson, 36 Ohio St. 281; Hassenpflug v. Rice, 11 Week. L. Bull. 200; Daniels v. New London, 58 Conn. 156, 7 L. R. A. 563.

The judgments of dismissal and vacation did not amount to the required decision (1) because they were entered by consent in pursuance of an agreement to comply with the award, and (2) because they were based upon facts (to wit, the submission and award) which occurred long after the injunction was granted and were not in contemplation when the bond was given.

A judgment of dismissal has been held equivalent to a final decision that the injunction ought not to have been granted, but to have that effect it must be made under circumstances amounting to an admission or confession on the part of the plaintiff that his case was bad from the start; that he never had a cause of action.

Such admission may be made:

1. On motion of defendant for want of prosecution the plaintiff having abandoned the case.

Dowling v. Polack, 18 Cal. 625.

2. On ex parte application of the plaintiff, the defendant not consenting.

Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. Toel, 85 N. Y. 646.

3. On motion of the plaintiff against the resistance of the defendant.

Amberg v. Kramer, 32 N. Y. S. R. 177; Wynkoop v. Van Beuren, 63 Hun, 500.

4. By stipulation of parties because of some action of the court in the case upon the merits demonstrating that the plaintiff had and has no cause of action.

New York City Suburban Water Co. v. Bissell, 78 Hun, 176.

There is no case where a dismissal by agreement of parties not predicated on or presumably occasioned by any action of the court upon the merits of the controversy has been held equivalent to the final decision required.

Palmer v. Foley, 71 N. Y. 106; Johnson v. Elwood, 82 N. Y. 362; Prefontaine v. Richards, 47 Hun, 418; Amberg v. Kramer, supra.

By the terms of the submission the status in quo was to be preserved so that in case settlement out of court by arbitration should fail litigation in court might proceed as before.

There was no stipulation as to the effect of the execution of the award either upon the injunction or liability on the bond.

Messrs. Elihu Root, Thomas McDougall, C. O. Hunter, S. B. Clarke, Bissell & Corrill, and E. A. Guthrie also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Stevenson Burke and Doyle, Scott, & Lewis for defendants in error.

Minshall, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case gives rise to the following questions, and, if any of them cannot be answered in the negative, the judgment must be affirmed.

1. Is the award of the arbitrators the decision contemplated by the undertaking?

2. Did the dismissal of the action by the consent of the parties estop the defendants from insisting on the terms of their undertaking?

3. Does the provision in the agreement of submission that its execution should not impair the liability of the defendants on either of the undertakings, preclude them from insisting that it has not been judicially decided that the injunction ought not to have been granted?

4. Was the dissolution of the injunction after the award and the dismissal of the action, such a decision?

We will consider these questions in their order, and shall hereafter, speak of these undertakings as bonds, and for convenience use the singular, as what is true of one is true as to both.

1. No action can be maintained on the bond except in accordance with its terms. The liability of the principal and sureties is the same —it is on the bond; and no action on it will lie against the principal where it would not lie against the sureties. This may be regarded as settled law. In Bein v. Heath, 53 U. S. 12 How. 168, 13 L. ed. 939, it is said by Taney, Ch. J., that, "in a proceeding upon a bond, the liability of the principal cannot be extended beyond that of the sureties," and the bond there under consideration was an injunction bond. This case was followed and approved by this court in Krug v. Bishop, 44 Ohio St. 221. See also, in this connection, the cases of Palmer v. Foley, 71 N. Y. 106, and Johnson v. Elwood, 82 N. Y. 362, 365. As observed by counsel, this is conceded by the form of the present action. It is on the bond and the contention of the plaintiffs is, that the terms of the bond have been complied with. No action can be maintained on the bond without a decision that the injunction ought not to have been granted. And this presents the question whether the award of the arbitrators is the decision required by the terms of the bond, in an action on it for damages. We think it is not. The decision contemplated by the bond, without doubt, had reference to a decision by the court on the merits of the case, in which the action was pending. It was required and given in pursuance of the statute, § 5576, Rev. Stat., and could have had reference to no other decision by any known rule of construction. There is a marked difference, as we shall presently show, between such a decision and the award of the arbitrators in this case. There has been much discussion as to whether the arbitration had, was a common-law or statutory one. If it were material to decide this we should be compelled to hold that it was a common-law arbitration. Western Female Seminary v. Blair, 1 Disney (Ohio), 370; Estes v. Phillips, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 3; Childs v Updyke, 9 Ohio St. 333; Swasey v. Laycock, 1 Handy (Ohio), 335; Brown v. Kincaid, Wright (Ohio), 37.

These cases show that common law arbitration exists in this state, notwithstanding the statute; and if the arbitration had in this instance was not such, it would be difficult to define the difference in the two methods. If there is any, it must be in the fact that one is made under, and substantially conforms to, the statute. But the submission under consideration conformed in no particular to the statute —was as oblivious of the statute as if it had no existence.

This evidently was not a matter of oversight—it was according to the deliberate purpose of the parties—they bound themselves to stand to and abide the award whether right or wrong, the obligation being assumed without qualification. It was not made a rule of court, for it was not the agreement that it should. The cases cited show that, as a statutory award, it would have been of no avail, for want of conformity to the statute; and that the only way effect could be given it, was to treat it as a common-law award, as was done by the parties on the award being made. The principle of common-law awards was preserved to save such as could not be given effect under the statute; and many awards have been sustained by the courts, on the ground that they conform to the liberal principles of the common law, where they could not have been sustained as awards made under the statute. Childs v. Updyke, supra.

But the question here is, not what the arbitration had should be called, but whether the decision by the arbitrators is the decision, or its equivalent, required by the bond in an action on it. In a decision by a court the law requires that it shall conform to the law and the facts of the case, if it do not, by taking the proper steps, its judgment may be reversed by the proper tribunal at the suit of the party aggrieved. But such is not the case as to the award made by the arbitrators in this instance, under the agreement of submission between the parties. It is true that the issues of law and fact between the parties in the case were referred to the arbitrators to be heard and determined as a court. But whether they so heard the case or not, whether they erred both as to the law and the facts, no remedy was provided and none could be had, however erroneous their award might be in point of law and fact. They heard the case as a quasi court at most, not as ministers of justice appointed by the law; and their judgment was to be, and is, final and irreversible by any tribunal. If there had been a provision that the award should be made a rule of court, and subject to be set aside or confirmed by it on a review of the law and facts on which it was made to rest, there would be some ground for the argument that it is the equivalent of the decision required by the bond. But we have shown that such is not the case, that it is simply a common-law award and, as said by Scott, J., in Childs v. Updyke, has no judicial force. We have been cited to what is said in Morse on Arbitration, 487, that an award, as between the parties, has the effect of a final judgment. This may be true in the sense that it concludes the parties on all matters submitted by their agreement. But this is so because it is the result of their agreement, and not because of any judicial character the award may have. The railway company cannot again maintain an action for, or claim, the stocks and bonds in question. This is so because it is bound not to do so by the agreement under which the award to that effect was made, and not because it has been so judicially decided by the court that allowed the injunction. This has not yet been so decided; and, notwithstanding the award, it may be true as a matter of law and fact that the injunction was rightly allowed. If so, the intervention of the arbitration has not, with respect to the bond, changed the rights of the company from what they were at the allowance of the injunction. If, as a matter of law and fact, it was not liable then on the bond, it is not liable now. For there has been no judicial determination conclusive upon that question. The only judicial determination that has been made in the case touching the merits was the ruling of the court of common pleas, in which the action was commenced, on a motion to dissolve the temporary injunction that had been granted. The motion was overruled. Columbus, H. V. & T. R. Co. v. Burke, 19 Week. L. Bull. 27. This holding has never been reversed, nor the injunction dissolved by the judicial action of any court, as will be hereinafter shown.

2. It is, however, claimed that the plaintiff, after obtaining the injunction, voluntarily dismissed its action, and is thereby estopped from insisting on the terms of the bond; and a large number of authorities are cited in support of this proposition. We have carefully examined these cases, and see no reason to question the decision in any of them. When a plaintiff obtains an injunction by giving a bond to answer for such damages as may be caused the defendant by its allowance, and afterward, voluntarily and without the consent of the defendant, dismisses his action, there is much reason for holding that he should be estopped to say, in an action on the bond for the recovery of damages, that it has not been decided that the injunction ought not to have been granted. For, in such case, he, by his own act, has prevented the defendant from having such a decision. And such is the substance of the holding in the various cases cited by counsel for the defendant in error. But none are cited, and we have found none, that the same rule applies, where the dismissal is with the consent of the defendant. And there is not the same reason for holding that it should. In such case the defendant has an opportunity to insist that, before the dismissal is had, the court determine whether the injunction ought to have been granted, so that an action may be prosecuted on the bond, if such is his purpose. If he fail to do this, and consents to the dismissal of the action, his conduct is consistent with the inference that he intends to waive any right he may have on the bond. It may be, and no doubt frequently happens, that in such case the defendant is content to be left with a recognition of his right by the plaintiff to the subject of dispute, without further litigation, and consents to the dismissal for such reason. But whether such be his intention or not, in such case he cannot, for want of a predicate, maintain an action on the bond. For it has not been determined that the injunction was wrongfully granted, and the defendant is not estopped from insisting on the fact. The dismissal in this case, as shown by the record, was by consent of the parties. The effect of the entry so made, is not varied by the fact that the entry shows that the plaintiff dismissed its action because it had been awarded that it had no cause of action, and should dismiss its case; for if the award had not the effect of a judicial determination of that fact, such effect was not imparted to it by stating it as the reason for dismissing the action, unless it may be claimed that, by doing this, the plaintiff admitted that the award is right. There is no such express admission, nor can this be inferred from the entry. All the entry admits is that such award had been made, not that it is right, and that by it he is required to dismiss the action; and, if he does not, the defendant can, by pleading the award in a supplementary answer, cause the suit to be dismissed, because he had made a binding agreement to dismiss it if it should be so awarded. And if the latter course had been pursued it would then be quite clear that the dismissal by the defendants would not have availed them in an action on the bond, unless the award of itself would be a sufficient predicate, which we have shown it is not. The entry only conformed to the agreement, and relieved the defendants from the necessity of filing a supplementary answer, and causing the action to be dismissed on the award made in pursuance of the arbitration agreement. It is the substance of the thing done, and not its form, that is to be considered and have effect. In all the cases with which we are familiar, or that have been cited in argument, the courts have required, as a necessary predicate, in an action on the bond, a judicial determination of the merits of the case in favor of the defendant in the action in which the bond was given, either in a trial on the merits or on a motion to dissolve the injunction, except those where the plaintiff dismisses his action without the consent of the defendant. In the excepted cases, for reasons just given, he is estopped from insisting on the terms of the bond, and in none others. Thus in Krug v. Bishop the suit was dismissed on motion of the defendants because the plaintiffs had failed to make and perfect the appearance of certain new parties in accordance with the order of the court, and it was held that such dismissal did not warrant an action on the bond. It is true that the dismissal was without prejudice, but this was not a controlling circumstance. It was not a part of the ratio decidendi. The reason of the decision is that considering the ground of the dismissal, it was not determined thereby that the injunction ought not to have been granted. In Johnson v. Elwood, 82 N. Y. 362, it appears an action had been brought to restrain the defendants from entering upon certain lands and cutting timber and a temporary injunction was granted. This was dissolved by stipulation on the determination of another suit determining the title to the land; and a motion was then made, under the practice in that state, for a reference to ascertain the damages sustained by reason of the injunction. On appeal it was held that there was no breach of the condition of the undertaking, which provided for the payment of such damages in case the court should finally decide that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction. In the opinion by Miller, J., it is said, "The undertaking provides for the payment of damages in the event, only that the court shall finally decide that the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction. There has been no breach of the condition in this respect, and no final determination which warrants a reference to compute the amount of damage. In Palmer v. Foley, 71 N. Y. 106, the defendant had consented to a discontinuance, and that an order to that effect might be entered, which was done; and it was held that this was not equivalent to a final decision of the court and there was no breach and no right of action, and that an order of reference to ascertain damages was improperly granted. It was laid down that there was no judicial determination or opinion given upon the merits of the action, or the right of the plaintiff in the action to the injunction at the time it was granted, and that it was never finally determined by a judicial decision. An amicable and voluntary agreement to discontinue was not enough. This case," says the judge, "is directly in point, and the granting of the order discontinuing the action because the plaintiff failed to proceed, as required by a prior order, is not sufficient to establish that there was a decision." The injunction had been dissolved by stipulation on the determination of another action involving the title to the land in dispute. Speaking in reference to this, the judge said: "It does not alter the case because the injunction was dissolved, or that in another action the court held that the plaintiff has no title to the premises; and it is a sufficient answer to the application to ascertain the damages, to say that there has been no determination in this case as to the right of the plaintiff to the injunction originally." This being true as to the judgment of a court in another case on the question of title to the subject in dispute, a fortiori it must be true as to an award made by arbitrators on a submission in pais.

In Myres v. Parker, 6 Ohio St. 504, it was held that no action could be maintained on an appeal bond when, by its terms, the liability of the obligors was made to depend on the judgment of the supreme court of the county, that court having been superseded by the district court, and, in which court the case was heard and determined.

In Prefontaine v. Richards, 47 Hun, 418, Prefontaine being about to foreclose a chattel mortgage for $1,000, given him by Richards, the latter secured an injunction claiming that Prefontaine owed him $923. The action came on for trial, when Richards and Prefontaine met and settled the matters in difference, agreeing that Richards was indebted to Prefontaine in the sum of $571, and that judgment might be entered against Richards for that amount and with costs. It was also stipulated that the injunction should be dismissed. Accordingly, judgment for the amount named was entered against Richards and the injunction was dissolved. Held, that there was no decision of a court that Richards was not entitled to the injunction at the time when he obtained it. And the court observed that "the defendants are liable according to the terms of their undertaking, and not otherwise."

Benedict v. Benedict, 15 Hun, 305, was an appeal from an order directing a reference to ascertain damages. The suit had been brought for a reconveyance of lands on the claim of a verbal agreement, that it was to be reconveyed if not paid for, and an injunction had been granted restraining the defendant from encumbering the land or collecting rents. It was referred to a master, who found the fact of the verbal agreement, but held the same void under the statute of frauds, but held the plaintiff had a lien for the purchase money and ordered a sale, but ruled and decided nothing as to the injunction. The court reversed the order because no final decision had been made authorizing a reference; and used this language: "According to the conditions of the undertaking, there must be a final decision,—that is, one made at the determination of the action; and the decision, in order to authorize an action on the undertaking, must be in effect that the plaintiff was not at the time of obtaining the injunction entitled thereto," citing cases. See also Weeks v. Southwick, 12 How. Pr. 170; and, particularly, Palmer v. Foley, 71 N. Y. 106, cited by Miller J., in Johnson v. Elwood, supra.

These cases, and many similar ones, all illustrate the principle heretofore stated, that no recovery can be had on a bond or undertaking except in strict accordance with its terms—there must be a showing that it has been determined by the court that the injunction should not have been granted; and, also, that any agreement between the parties, subsequent to the allowance of the injunction, by which the action is dismissed and the injunction dissolved, is not sufficient in an action on the bond, where there has been no judicial determination that the injunction should not have been allowed; and, consequently, an award made by arbitrators selected by the parties, and in no way subject to the control of the court, cannot have that effect, for it only binds the parties as an agreement, not as a judgment rendered by the court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, upon the case made by the parties and submitted to it. The bond contemplated such a judgment, and none other.

In an application for a rehearing it has been strenuously insisted that there is nothing in the record to show that the case was dismissed by consent; and that the point is a new one, not presented below, and, for the first time, presented here in the opinion of the court. This is certainly a grave mistake of counsel. It is presented in the answer of the company and not denied by the reply. The averment of the answer being "that it," the entry, "was by agreement of said parties and at the instance of said plaintiffs," entered of record in the case. This is not denied by the reply, and could not have been without contradicting the record—the language of the entry being, "This day came the parties by their attorneys and by consent showed to the court" the matters contained in the entry, which include the dismissal of the action and the dissolution of the injunction. We are unable to see how, in the face of this entry, it can be claimed that the dismissal was without the consent of the defendants. And as often as the case has been argued in this court, the point has been made and insisted on by counsel for plaintiffs in error.

3. The defendants in error also rely on the provision in the agreement of submission, that its execution should not "in any wise impair the liability" of the obligors on the bond. But this stipulation cannot be so construed as to impair any of the rights of the obligors. To insist on the terms of the bond is one of their rights, and does not impair their liability. It was wisely inserted, as without this provision it might have been contended, and in fact has been, that the submission to arbitration of itself worked a discontinuance of the action. This has been held by many respectable courts in the case of a common law submission. Morse, Arbitration, 267; Mooers v. Allen, 35 Me. 276, 58 Am. Dec. 700; Bigelow v. Goss, 5 Wis. 421; Larkin v. Robbins, 2 Wend. 505; Green v. Patchen, 13 Wend. 293.

4. As to the dissolution of the injunction, this, we think, is of no avail to the plaintiff, in their action on the bond, for several reasons: (1) It was a useless act and determined nothing. The temporary injunction perished with the dismissal of the action, so that there was nothing to dissolve. It was a mere incident to the action and could not survive it. Krug v. Bishop, supra; Swan Twp. Trustees v. McClannahan, decided at the last term, 53 Ohio St. 403. (2) It is averred in the answer and expressly admitted by the reply, that the court took no judicial action in the dissolution of the injunction. It was done by consent and as a consequence of the award. The dissolution then decided nothing on the important question, whether the injunction ought to have been granted.

Judgments of the Circuit Court and of the Common Pleas reversed; and judgment for the defendants below upon the pleadings and the admitted facts in the case.

Burket, J., dissenting:

I concede that under the conditions of the bonds, it was the right of the railway company to have the question as to whether or not the injunction ought to have been granted, decided by the court, and that this right would continue until waived by agreement of the parties.

The right to have the court decide whether the injunction ought to have been granted or not, is a right which may be waived by the parties and changed by contract. In civil cases any right may usually be waived, unless otherwise provided by statute. A party whose insured property is destroyed by fire has a right to have the value thereof ascertained by a court and jury, yet this right may be waived by agreement of the parties in the policy, to the effect that such value shall be fixed by appraisers or arbitrators, and such agreements are held valid and conclusive. Hamilton v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 242, 34 L. ed. 419.

The right to a trial by jury may be waived, and even the unconstitutionality of statute may be waived. Tone v. Columbus, 39 Ohio St. 281, 48 Am. Rep. 438.

In this case the parties, by their agreement, submitted all the issues of law and fact to the arbitrators for their decision and determination, and bound themselves to stand by and perform their award, and agreed that the submission award and its performance should not in any way impair the liability of the railway company upon the bond, and thereby the parties waived a decision of the merits of the case by the court and agreed that the decision should be by the arbitrators.

A decision of the merits of a case is necessarily a decision as to whether the injunction ought to have been granted or not, because injunctions ought to be granted only in cases wherein the plaintiff succeeds on the merits. A decision on the merits in favor of the defendant is a decision that the injunction ought not to have been granted. An injunction is always granted to remain in force until otherwise ordered, and when the case is decided in favor of the defendant it is by force of the judgment of its own vigor otherwise ordered, without saying anything about the injunction or the dissolution thereof, although the usual and better practice is to dissolve the injunction by specific order in the judgment entry. Such is the effect of the holding by this court in Roberts v. Dust, 4 Ohio St. 502. In that case there was a decision on the merits of the case in favor of the defendant, and nothing was said as to the injunction, and yet this court sustained a recovery on the injunction bond. In Hoyt v. Carter, 7 How. Pr. 140, it was held that a dismissal of the action by the court was of its own force a disposition of the injunction.

So that while the submission says nothing about submitting to the arbitrators the question as to whether or not the injunction ought to have been granted, that question was necessarily included within the merits of the case—"the issues of law and fact"—and was necessarily submitted therewith, and was necessarily passed upon and decided by the award. The rule that the greater includes the less is here applicable. An injunction is one of the provisional remedies provided for in division 6 of the Practice Act in the Revised Statutes, and such provisional remedies are incidents to actions in which they are allowed, and a disposition of the action on its merits necessarily disposes of the merits of the incident, because the incident cannot survive the final disposition of its principal, unless by special order, as is sometimes done, some question of the incident is retained for future disposition and decision, as in the case of the final distribution of funds in the hands of a receiver. But the usual and better practice is to dispose of the merits of the provisional remedy in the same entry with the final judgment on the merits and as a part thereof, as is usually done in cases of attachment. When the incident is disposed of with the principal in the same entry, the judgment as to the incident is of as much binding force as the judgment as to the principal.

The submission was in writing, and the question as to whether thereby the matter of the injunction was submitted to the arbitrators, was a question of law to be determined by a construction of the legal effect of the submission itself, and this construction could not be varied, altered, or changed by the averments or admissions of the parties in their pleadings. Properly construed the submission carried the merits of the whole controversy to the arbitrators, which necessarily included the merits of the injunction; and the award when it decided the merits of the case, necessarily decided the merits of the injunction included therein. And this result was not and could not be changed by the averment on one side, and the admission on the other, that the question as to whether the injunction ought or ought not to have been granted, was not submitted to nor decided by the arbitrators. This averment and admission contradict the legal effect of the submission and award, and cannot be true, and should be disregarded.

A decision by a court having been thus waived, and a final decision procured by a board of arbitrators agreed upon, it cannot be fairly said that the question as to whether the injunction should have been granted or not is still open and undecided. The contracts contained in the bond and in the submission, were as to the principals two written contracts as to the same case and same subject-matter, and should be construed together, and when so construed the submission modified the conditions of the bond, to the extent that the whole merits of the case, including the injunction, should be decided by the arbitrators, and by the award this question was fully decided, and it matters not to this court whether it was decided right or wrong. It was just as competent for the parties to stop with the decision of the question by the arbitrators, as to stop with the decision of the common pleas court. A judgment need not be reviewed and passed upon by a higher court to make it binding. A release of errors and the right of appeal, while it cuts off the right of review in a higher court, does not invalidate or weaken the force of the judgment, even though it should appear upon looking into the judgment in a collateral proceeding, that there was error therein. The conditions of the bond have therefore been broken, and the contingency upon which the damages were to be paid has arisen. By the court agreed upon and selected by the parties —the arbitrators—it has been decided that the plaintiff had no cause of action against the defendant, and therein was included a decision that the injunction ought not to have been granted. This decision the railway company bound itself to stand to and perform, and it cannot now be heard to say, or even suggest, that there was error in that decision. As between the parties that decision is conclusive, and is a final determination of all their rights.

In none of the cases cited was there an agreement that the submission, award, and its performance, should not impair the liability of the plaintiff on the injunction bond, and for that reason those cases are not applicable here.

After the award of the arbitrators was made, the case was disposed of in the court of common pleas by the entry of the following judgment:

"This day came the parties by their attorneys, and by consent showed to the court that on the 11th day of July, 1888, the parties submitted all the facts and issues joined in the pleadings in this case to the arbitrament and award of James C. Carter, Esq., of New York, and E. W. Kittredge and Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., Esqs., of Cincinnati, Ohio, and that said arbitrators having heard the parties and their counsel and all the evidence that they had to submit in the case, and carefully and fully considered the same, did on the 17th day of September, 1888, award and decide that the plaintiff has no right to any relief from the defendants or either of them; that this suit be dismissed at plaintiff's costs, and the plaintiff be forever barred from hereafter prosecuting any other action against the defendants, or either of them, for any of the same causes of action. Thereupon the plaintiff, in pursuance of said submission and award, duly dismissed its said petition and action. By the agreement of the parties no record shall be made in said action, except at the request of some one of the parties and at the cost of the party requesting it, and by like agreement reference may be had and use made of the pleadings and journal entries and all other documents properly matter of record the same as if said proceedings were duly recorded, and thereupon, upon motion, it is ordered and adjudged that the injunction which was granted in this action while the same was pending in the court of common pleas of Franklin county be vacated, dissolved, and dismissed, and that the plaintiff pay the costs of this action and of all the proceedings in this action in this court and in the court of common pleas of Franklin county, and in default of payment execution issue."

It will be noticed by reading this final judgment entry, that the fact of submission and the result of the award were shown to the court by consent of the parties, that there was an agreement as to the final record and the use of the files in the case, that the dismissal of the action was by the plaintiff, in pursuance of the submission and award, that nothing appears in the entry as to whether the defendant consented to the dismissal or not, that the injunction was dissolved by the court on motion of defendant.

There are many cases which hold that if the case is settled or disposed of by agreement of the parties, an action on the injunction bond cannot be sustained, and a dismissal of the action by mutual consent of both parties may be included in the principle of such cases; but I doubt it. By the dismissal, the plaintiff concedes that he has no cause of action against the defendant, and where there is no cause of action there can be no cause for an injunction. The defendant, by consenting, agrees with the plaintiff that there is no cause of action or cause for injunction in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant. The legal effect of such dismissal is therefore the equivalent of a determination by the court, upon the confession of the parties, that there existed no cause of action and that the injunction ought not to have been granted. To shield a plaintiff from an action on the bond, the dismissal must be in the nature of a compromise, and that fact must appear of record.

I think that, when closely examined, none of the cases conflict with this theory, and if any of them do I should refuse to follow them, because they cannot be sustained on principle.

But in the case under consideration it does not even appear that the dismissal was by consent or agreement of the parties. The record of the final judgment entry shows that the railway company itself dismissed the action. The reason that it gives for the dismissal is not that the defendants consented thereto, but it is "in pursuance of said submission and award." This is the only reason disclosed by the record, and we cannot look outside of the record for another or different reason. No consent of defendants to such dismissal is found in the submission or award. The submission is silent as to the dismissal, and the award directs the plaintiff to dismiss its action, and says nothing about the defendants consenting thereto, so that when the plaintiff dismissed its action, it did it, not because the defendants consented, but because the plaintiff had bound itself to stand to and perform said award, and this is expressed in the judgment entry, wherein plaintiff says that the dismissal is in pursuance of said submission and award. If the dismissal had been by reason of the consent of the defendants, that fact should and would have been stated in the judgment.

Suppose that upon a trial of the case to the court upon the merits, the court should find in favor of the defendant, and he should accept such decision in his favor and join with the plaintiff in putting on a journal entry dismissing the case. If the judgment entry in such case should recite that the court found the facts and equities in favor of the defendant, and that thereupon the plaintiff in pursuance of such findings dismissed his action, it could not be said that defendant consented to such dismissal, and that he was thereby precluded from sustaining an action on the injunction bond. Such construction of the record is not sustained by any of the cases cited, and is in conflict with all rules of construction as applied to judgments. The plain words of the judgment entry must be disregarded in order to extort therefrom a mutual consent of the parties to such dismissal.

The record, as well as the submission, shows that proceedings for the vacation of the temporary injunction were pending, and both parties agreed that these proceedings should not be pressed for hearing during the time to be occupied by the arbitration, and that thereafter the defendants might apply to the court for such order concerning said injunction as they might be entitled to. This clearly shows that the defendants were insisting upon the dissolution of the injunction. When a defendant is clamoring for the dissolution of an injunction against him, and the plaintiff seeing defeat staring him in the face, dismisses his action, it cannot in legal reason be said that such dismissal is consented to by defendant, in the sense that it is by mutual agreement of the parties. Such a dismissal, instead of being by consent of parties, is obtained by the force and vigor of defendant's motion, and the concession of the plaintiff that he has no cause of action. If it were otherwise, the defendant instead of clamoring for the dissolution of the injunction on his motion, would be compelled to withdraw his motion the moment that the plaintiff should propose to dismiss his case. The moting being withdrawn, the plaintiff might well refuse to dismiss. The motion being renewed, the proposal to dismiss would be renewed, and thus there would be a see sawing back and forth, ad nauseam. The sensible course would be to allow the defendant, by his motion, to drive the plaintiff to a dismissal of his action, or to a hearing of the motion as he might prefer, and award to the defendant the fruits of his effort, and not deprive him thereof by a strained construction not thought of by either of the parties. So much for the effect of the act of the railway company in dismissing its action "in pursuance of said submission and award."

The latter part of the judgment entry purports on its face to be the action of the court. It is in these words: "And thereupon upon motion, it is ordered and adjudged that the injunction which was granted in this action while the same was pending in the court of common pleas of Franklin county, be vacated, dissolved, and dismissed, and that plaintiff pay the costs of this action."

This is on the face of it, and by its very words and effect, a decision by the court vacating, dissolving, and dismissing the injunction; and by all the authorities this is held to be, in effect, deciding that the injunction ought not to have been granted. Such an order of the court is upon the merits of the injunction, and not as in Krug v. Bishop, 44 Ohio St. 221, cited in the opinion of the majority, where, as shown by the judgment entry, the dismissal was for the reason that the plaintiff refused to obey the order of the court requiring him to bring in new parties. In that case the judgment entry showed on its face that the dismissal was not upon the merits, while in this case the judgment entry shows that it was upon the merits.

The actions taken by the parties and by the court all take place before the judgment entry is prepared, and the judgment stands as a whole, and all therein expressed as having taken place at the same time. It cannot be held in construing judgments that what appears in the beginning or in the middle of the entry took place in point of time anterior to what appears in the latter part of the judgment entry. The judgment for costs at the end of the entry is, in point of time, as early as the appearance of the parties at the beginning, when the whole entry purports to be of the same day, as in this case.

A judgment is a unit. Buckingham v. Commercial Bank, 21 Ohio St. 131. As such unit the whole and every part takes effect at the same instant.

The dismissal by the plaintiff, and the dissolution of the injunction by the court, occurred at one and the same instant, and as a matter of legal construction it cannot be said that the dissolution of the injunction by the court was a useless act and determined nothing, nor that the temporary injunction perished with the dismissal of the action so that there was nothing to dissolve. As the dissolution of the injunction by the court was as early in point of time as the dismissal of the action by the plaintiff, it cannot be said that the dismissal had any effect whatever upon the injunction. The injunction was dissolved by the same act of the court and at the same moment of time that the dismissal by the plaintiff was made effective by leave of the court in permitting the dismissal.

The only dismissal of an action which a plaintiff has power to make, either in vacation or term time, without leave of the court, is a dismissal without prejudice. All other dismissals are required to be upon the merits, and upon the adjudication of the court. Rev. Stat. § 5314. The dismissal in question was not without prejudice, and was therefore upon the merits. The submission and award were upon the merits, and the dismissal was "in pursuance of said submission and award," and was therefore also upon the merits.

That the dismissal in question could not be made by plaintiff without the permission of the court seems to be conceded by the opinion of the majority when in speaking of the dismissal it is said: "In such case the defendant has an opportunity to insist that before the dismissal is had the court determine whether the injunction ought to have been granted, so that an action may be prosecuted on the bond." This may be true in theory, but in real practice, while a defendant might insist upon such a course, no court would stop to hear evidence for a day, an hour, or even a minute, in order to determine such question, upon or after a dismissal of the action by the plaintiff. The court would say in short order, that it would refuse to hear evidence or consider the question, but along with the dismissal by the plaintiff would dissolve the injunction, and that would show that it ought not to have been granted. It is safe to say that this is the universal course pursued by courts in such cases. The dissolution of the injunction in the judgment entry is all that has heretofore been required, and this is always taken as conclusive of the question that the injunction ought not to have been granted.

To depart from the old forms in this regard, and hold that a judgment of a court dissolving an injunction does not decide and determine that the injunction ought not to have been granted, is in the nature of judicial legislation on a vital point of practice. In rendering judgment upon a trial on the merits the usual form has always been to provide for a dissolution of the injunction after that part of the judgment entry which is in favor of the defendant on the merits. As well might it be held in such cases, as in this one, that the temporary injunction perished with the decision of the case on the merits in favor of the defendant, that there was nothing to dissolve, that the temporary injunction could not survive the decision of the merits, and that therefore the question as to whether the injunction ought to have been granted or not was left undetermined.

If a dissolution of an injunction by the court is a determination to the effect that the injunction ought not to have been granted as has heretofore always been held, then the record shows that at, not after, the dismissal by the plaintiff, the defendant "insisted" by his motion upon a dissolution of the injunction, and that the court sustained the defendant in his insisting, and dissolved, vacated, and dismissed the injunction, and thereby determined in the usual form that the injunction ought not to have been granted. And yet the railway company has so far successfully taken refuge behind the point that it has not been determined that the injunction ought not to have been granted; and when the adjudication of the court dissolving the injunction in the usual and ordinary form of adjudging the question is brought forward and insisted upon by the defendants in error, the adjudication and the record thereof are lightly swept aside, and the defendants in error are told that the adjudication, although correct in form, and upon the very point in question, "determined nothing," that the injunction "was a mere incident to the action and could not survive it." The defendants did not ask that the injunction should be held to survive the action, but only that as both the action and the injunction were ended at the same moment, and by the same judgment of the court, the same force and effect should be given to that part of the judgment which dissolved the injunction as to that part which permitted the dismissal of the action. A judgment is a unit, and equal force and effect should be given it as a whole and to every part thereof.

But as a final reason for disregarding the judgment of the court as to the dissolution of the injunction, it is said in the opinion that "it is averred in the answer and expressly admitted by the reply, that the court took no judicial action in the dissolution of the injunction." At first blush this would seem to be so, but a careful consideration of the answer and reply will show that they bear no such construction.

After setting out in its answer the said submission and award, the railway company says "that no proceedings were had upon said award except as follows: That on or about the 13th day of November, 1888, in pursuance of said award and by reason of the same adjudging that said plaintiff should dismiss its said action, as aforesaid, the following order was, by agreement of said parties and at the instance of said plaintiff, duly entered of record in said court of common pleas of Licking county, as and for the final entry in said action, the same being the order partially set forth in the petition in this action, to wit:" Then follows and is set out in full the final judgment entry as the same is hereinbefore set out. Then the answer states in substance that said order was made in consequence of said award and only for the purpose of carrying into effect the decision thereof that plaintiff should dismiss its said action; that the part of said order dissolving said injunction was added merely for the formal dissolution of said injunction, which dissolution necessarily resulted from said dismissal of the action by the plaintiff, as incidental thereto, that said award was not submitted to the court was not passed upon by the court, and that the question as to whether or not said injunction was properly allowed was never in any way submitted to or considered by the court. To this answer thus containing a full copy of the final judgment entry, the plaintiff in that case replied as follows: "For reply to the answer of the railway company the plaintiffs admit that no special motion for the dissolution of the injunction was ever submitted to the court, and that there has been no adjudication of said court concerning said injunction since the making of said award, except as set out in said answer. And plaintiffs deny the other allegations in said answer not herein admitted to be true."

The copy of the judgment set out in the answer, and which could not be varied or changed by averment, admission, or proof, showed that the question as to the dissolution of the injunction was on motion ordered and adjudged, dissolved, vacated, and dismissed. This conclusively shows submission to, and consideration by the court, and that part of the answer which is to the contrary is not admitted by the reply, but is denied by the general denial at the end thereof. The general admissions in the reply are qualified by the words "except as set out in said answer." And in said answer we find set out the full judgment entry which shows that there was both a motion and an adjudication as to the injunction by the court. The judgment entry says that "upon motion it is ordered and adjudged that the injunction be dissolved." It could be ordered and adjudged by the court only. No one else could order and adjudge. Unless the record can be falsified and impeached, it must follow that the said ordering and adjudging was by the court and not by the parties.

The force and effect of such judgment cannot be cut down, enlarged, or in anywise changed by an averment or admission in a pleading, or proof upon the trial. Such is the uniform holding of courts as to the construction of judgments, statutes, and written instruments. Freem. Judgm. § 275, and cases there cited; Black. Judgm. § 276; Kellogg v. Larkin, 3 Pinney, 123, 56 Am. Dec. 164; State, Fay, v. Archibald, 52 Ohio St. 1.

This last case involved the construction of a statute in which it was claimed there was an error and mistake, and that the intention of the legislature was different from what appeared on the face of the statute. Averments to that effect were made in the petition, to which there was a demurrer. In the opinion appears the following: "The demurrer does not admit the truth of the allegation as to the error or mistake, nor as to the intention of the legislature." The syllabus concurred in by the whole court is as follows: "The force and legal effect of a statute cannot be altered or changed by averment in a pleading."

A judgment stands upon the same plane as a statute, and when the whole judgment is set out in a pleading its force and effect cannot be altered or changed by averment or admission in such pleading. In such case no averment or proof can give to a judgment a character which, on its face, it has not, and no admission can take from it the character which, on its face, it has. The force and legal effect must be determined by the judgment and record alone, unaided by averment, admission, or proof.

Again, to destroy the force and effect which this judgment has on its face, by saying that the court took no judicial action in the dissolution of the injunction, is to attack and impeach the judgment in a collateral proceeding, which it is well known cannot be done. The force and effect of the judgment are destroyed and brushed aside, not by a construction of its language, but by a collateral attack founded upon the claim that it is averred in the answer and admitted in the reply that the court took no judicial action on the dissolution of the injunction, while the copy of the judgment set out in the answer conclusively shows the contrary to be true. For these reasons, I think that the judgments of the courts below are right and should be affirmed.

Shauck, J., concurs in this dissenting opinion.

William W. WRIGHT, Admr., etc., of Joseph Wright, Deceased.

*1. Where during the trial of a civil action exceptions are taken to a ruling of the court in respect to its charge to the jury, and such ruling is afterwards embodied in a motion for a new trial, which is overruled, the time (Rev. Stat. § 5301, 90 Ohio Laws, 203) within which a bill of exceptions may be taken, setting forth such action of the court, should be computed from the date when the motion for a new trial was overruled.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of defendant in an action to recover for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

Statement by Bradbury, J.:

Action by William W. Wright against the Cincinnati Street-Railway Company, in the superior court. This action was brought to recover damages sustained by reason of the death of his intestate, which death, he alleged, was caused by the negligence of plaintiff in error. The case was tried to a jury and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff in error, defendant below. Proceedings in error were instituted in the circuit court of Hamilton county, where the judgment was reversed, and a new trial ordered in the superior court, on the ground that the latter court had erred in giving to the jury certain instructions requested by the defendant below, and in refusing to instruct the jury as requested by the plaintiff below; whereupon the cause was brought to this court by the street-railway company to obtain a reversal of the judgment of the circuit court.

Messrs. Paxton, Warrington, & Boutet and Kittredge & Wilby for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John W. Wolf and Thomas L. Michie, for defendant in error:

Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, has been repudiated in England where it originated.

Beach, Contrib. Neg. 2d ed. §§ 105–112; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 66; Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed 652; Covington Transfer Co. v. Kelly, 36 Ohio St. 86; St. Clair Street R. Co. v. Eadie, 43 Ohio St. 91.

It makes no difference whether the injured party was a passenger conveyed by a common carrier or riding in a private vehicle; and whether the intestate was on this truck with or without the permission of its driver could not affect the duty of the plaintiff in error to exercise due care in operating its car at a public street crossing.

Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Corrigan, 46 Ohio St. 283, 3 L. R. A. 385.

Bradbury, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The circuit court reversed the judgment of the superior court, upon the ground that the latter court erred in instructing the jury as requested by the street-railway company, and in refusing to give certain instructions asked to be given by the administrator, plaintiff in that court. The plaintiff in error contends that the bill of exceptions taken to the rulings of the superior court was not perfected within the time prescribed by statute, and therefore, not being warranted by law, was inoperative, and gave no jurisdiction to the circuit court to hear the questions upon which it reversed the judgment of the superior court. It is conceded that this objection was not made in the circuit court, and for that reason contention is made that this court should not listen to it now. The general rule, doubtless, is for this court to disregard questions not made in the court whose judgment is under review. However, if the court whose judgment is under consideration was without jurisdiction over the subject-matter in contention, the rule does not apply, and that question may be raised here, although not brought to the attention of the lower court. Doubtless, an orderly course of procedure, and thorough fairness towards that court, would require the question of its jurisdiction to be made there in the first instance; but a failure to do so is not fatal to the right to contest the question here.

The exceptions to the ruling of the trial court in giving and refusing certain special instructions requested by the parties were made on the 8th day of February, 1894, the day that the jury were instructed. A motion for a new trial was filed February 10, 1894, including, among other grounds of error, the action of the court in giving and refusing to give the jury such special requests, which motion was overruled, and a judgment entered on the verdict on March 3, 1894. On April 17, following a period of forty-five days after the motion for a new trial had been overruled, and sixty-eight days from the day the exceptions were noted, the plaintiff below presented the bill of exceptions to the trial court for allowance; and the court then extended the time therefor ten days beyond the time allowed by statute, which was then fifty days; and on April 24, 1894, within the period of the ten-days extension, the bill of exceptions was signed, sealed, allowed, and ordered to be made a part of the record in the cause. This statement of the dates upon, and the order in, which the several material events occurred, show that the bill of exceptions was presented to the trial judge, for an extension of time for signing it, on the forty-fifth day from the overruling of the motion for a new trial, and the sixty-eighth from the day the charge was made and exceptions thereto noted; and it was signed by the judge seven days later.

The statute by its own force allows fifty days for perfecting a bill of exceptions, and provided it is presented to the trial judge at least five days before the fifty days have expired, he may allow ten days more for the purpose of signing the same. Pugh v. State, 51 Ohio St. 116. It is therefore apparent that the validity of the bill of exceptions in this case depends upon the event from which the computation of time shall be made. If from the overruling of a motion for a new trial, it is valid, because it was presented to the trial judge on the forty fifth day thereafter, that being at least five days before the expiration of the fifty days; the judge then extended for ten days the period for signing the same, which gave for that purpose a total of sixty days. On the seventh day after the extension was granted, or the fifty-second day from that on which the motion for a new trial was overruled, the bill of exceptions was signed by him. If, however, the computation be made from the day on which the charge was given and the exception to it noted, then the application for an extension of time, and the subsequent signing of the bill of exceptions, were both too late; the former having been made sixty-eight days after, and the latter act occurring seventy-five days after, the exceptions had been noted. This court held in Earp v. Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 12 Ohio St. 621, that a party who, on the trial of action, takes exceptions to the decision of the court upon the admission of testimony, and to the charges of the court to the jury, and has those exceptions reduced to writing, and signed by the judge, may allege error in a petition filed in the district court, without filing a motion for a new trial in the trial court upon those grounds. Doubtless, the law is the same now, for in this respect the existing statute is similar to the one then in force. Counsel contend that, because a motion for a new trial is not necessary to preserve the right to review a charge of the court, the time within which a bill of exceptions should be taken for that purpose begins to run from the day the charge was given. This contention would be sound in a case where a motion for a new trial was not made, and the party excepting chose to rely upon the exception taken during the course of the trial. The choice, however, is with him. By the express terms of § 5301, Rev. Stat., he may include these grounds of error in the motion for a new trial. The language of the "section referring to this matter is: Where "the exception is to the decision of the court on a motion . . . for a new trial for misdirection by the court to the jury, . . . the party excepting must reduce his exceptions to writing, and present them to the trial judge or judges for allowance within fifty days after the overruling of the motion for a new trial." The language of this section, we think, fully authorizes a party excepting to a charge of the court to include the alleged error in the motion for a new trial. It is just and reasonable to afford, by that means, an opportunity to the trial judge to review his rulings, which oftentimes must be made without access to authorities or time for deliberation; and, where this ground of error is included in the motion for a new trial, the time within which the bill of exceptions must be taken runs from the overruling of such motion. We are not aware of any holding of this court that can be construed as militating against these views. It follows, therefore, that the bill of exceptions was allowed and filed within the time allowed by law.

The bill of exceptions discloses that the intestate of the plaintiff below was a boy about fourteen years old, who had steady employment in a type foundry in Cincinnati, and was accustomed to go to and from his work unattended; that the deceased and two or three other boys, on the evening of the accident, just at dark, were riding along one of the public streets of Cincinnati on a four-wheeled dray, without the knowledge of the driver; that, while the boys were so riding, a street car of the defendant below collided with the dray, and thereby caused the death of the intestate. There was evidence tending to prove, and other evidence tending to rebut, negligence in running the street car, and in the driver of the dray contributing to the collision. The record, however, discloses no evidence of any act whatever done by deceased that contributed to produce the collision. Nor was there any evidence whatever of negligence on his part that contributed to his injury, unless the simple fact that he was riding in a private vehicle without the knowledge of the driver, along a public street, whereon the electric street railway was operated, and was killed by a collision between such vehicle and a street car, affords grounds from which contributory negligence might be inferred against him.

After the evidence had been introduced, the defendant below requested the court to give, and the court did give, to the jury over the objections of plaintiff below, the following special instructions:

"(I.) If you find that Joseph Wright was fourteen years old and upwards at the time of the accident, and was intrusted with the performance of work, so that he was earning ordinary wages of such a boy, and was accustomed to going without guidance or assistance of his parents to and from his place of business or employment, you may then find that he was chargeable with the responsibility of such age and discretion, and to the observance and performance of ordinary acts of care; that is to say, he was bound to know the danger, if there was danger, in riding upon the dray in the way described by the evidence, and especially the danger, if there was danger, that would be encountered in case of collision between the dray and any other vehicle or car when riding in such a position. And if you find that Joseph Wright, at the time of the accident, was sitting or riding upon the dray in question in a hazardous or dangerous position, then I charge you that it will be your duty to consider and determine whether he was guilty of contributory negligence; and, if you find he was, then the plaintiff cannot recover."

Conceding that the danger to be apprehended from the act of riding upon a dray along a public street of a populous city, upon which an electric railway was being operated, was so great that from such act alone negligence might be inferred against an adult person who should do so in the manner and at the time intestate did, nevertheless the degree of responsibility imposed by the foregoing proposition upon intestate was too high. We know of no rule of law that imposes upon a boy of fourteen who may go out to work, and earn wages, and go about the streets of a city unattended, a higher degree of care concerning his safety, than a boy of the same age and equal intelligence who, unattended, may go to and from school, or roam about the street unemployed. The record does not show any attempt to prove that the intestate was unusually bright and intelligent. There is no presumption that a boy who goes out to work for wages can discern danger more readily than one who does not. He may have been sent out to earn wages for the very reason that he was dull at his books, or from his own necessities or those of his parents. The subject is purely speculative. Doubtless, certain occupations tend to quicken the preceptions and ripen the judgment. Whether any particular occupation has accomplished this end for a boy in any case is a question of fact for the determination of the jury, and not one of law to be decided by the court. The intestate, in the absence of proof that he was specially intelligent, was bound to no higher care respecting his personal safety than other boys of his age were accustomed to exercise under similar circumstances. Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Corrigan, 46 Ohio St. 283, 3 L. R. A. 385.

The plaintiff below requested the trial court to give the following proposition to the jury:

"(II.) If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff's intestate, Joseph Wright, was at the time he lost his life riding in the rear part of a wagon or dray driven by one Albert Kees, and that the said intestate, Joseph Wright, had nothing to do in any way with the driving, control, or management of said wagon or dray by said Kees, that then the negligence of said Kees, if any has been proved, in driving said vehicle across Elm street at the said intersection of Fifteenth street, cannot be imputed to the said intestate, so as to charge him with contributing to his own injury.

"(III.) The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff's intestate, Joseph Wright, while lawfully riding on a wagon or dray driven by Albert Kees across the intersection, was, on his (Joseph Wright's) part, killed by a collision between said wagon or dray on which he was then riding and one of the defendant's street cars, and that such collison was caused by the negligence of the defendant, its agents or servants, in running its street cars at and across the public crossing at the intersection of Elm and Fifteenth streets, then the defendant is liable to the plaintiff in this action. If the jury should find that such collision, under the circumstances stated above, killed the plaintiff's intestate, Joseph Wright, without any negligence on the part of the said intestate, and was caused by the joint and concurring negligence of the defendant, its agents or servants in charge of the street car, and of the driver of the wagon or dray on which the said intestate was then riding, that then the defendant, the Cincinnati Street-Railway Company, is liable to the defendant in this action."

The court declined to submit this proposition to the jury, which ruling the circuit court held to be erroneous.

In Thorogood v. Bryan, 8 C. B. 115, the court held that one who took passage in an omnibus, and was injured by the concurring negligence of the driver of the vehicle in which he was riding and of the driver of another omnibus, could not recover on the ground that by selecting the omnibus in which he made his journey he became identified with it, Coltman, J., saying: "The passenger is so far identified with the carriage in which he is traveling, that want of care on the part of the driver will be a defense" for an injury caused to such passenger by the carelessness of the driver of another carriage. This case was the progenitor of this branch of the doctrine of imputed negligence. It seems impossible to maintain the doctrine as announced by that case except by assuming that the party injured, by selecting the vehicle in which he was riding, made its driver his servant. This notion was expressly repudiated in 1887, by the English court of appeals, and the case of Thorogood v. Bryan overruled in The Bernina, L. R. 12 Prob. Div. 58, Lord Esher saying (Id. 68): "In truth the judgments in Thorogood v. Bryan all amount to saying that by what the plaintiff did [taking passage in an omnibus], he made the driver his agent so as to be liable for his acts, as if he [the plaintiff], had himself done those acts. But if he did make him his agent at all, he must in consistency not only be by reason of such liability deprived of his remedy against third persons, but must be affirmatively liable to third persons. In truth the driver in the case is not the servant or the agent of the passenger, and has not even any one of the attributes which are evidence of being even like a servant or agent." This later view of the doctrine of imputed negligence has been adopted in this state. Covington Transfer Co. v. Kelly, 36 Ohio St. 86; St. Clair Street R. Co. v. Eadie, 43 Ohio St. 91; Davis v. Guarnieri, 45 Ohio St. 470; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Manson, 30 Ohio St. 451; Bellefontaine & I. R. Co. v. Snyder, 18 Ohio St. 399, 98 Am. Dec. 175. The same view of the question was adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 652, and the doctrine of the case of Thorogood v. Bryan repudiated upon the ground that contributory negligence to defeat a recovery must be that of the party injured, or of some one to whom he stood in the relation of master or superior, and that such relation did not exist between the driver of a public hackney coach and one who hired it for driving about a city for recreation and pleasure In the course of his opinion, Justice Field says: "That one cannot recover damages for an injury to the commission of which he has directly contributed is a rule of established law and a principle of common justice. And it matters not whether that contribution consists in his participation in the direct cause of the injury, or in his omission of duties which, if performed, would have prevented it. If his fault, whether of omission or commission, has been the proximate cause of the injury, he is without remedy against one also in the wrong. It would seem that the converse of this doctrine should be accepted as sound—that when one has been injured by the wrongful act of another, to which he has in no respect contributed, he should be entitled to compensation in damages from the wrongdoer. And such is the generally received doctrine, unless a contributory cause of the injury has been the neglience or fault of some person towards whom he sustains the relation of superior or master, in which case the negligence is imputed to him, though he may not have personally participated in or had knowledge of it." This, we think, places the doctrine of contributory negligence upon a sound foundation. In order that it shall operate to defeat a recovery, it should be some act or omission of the party himself, or of some one towards whom he stood in the relation of master or superior. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 66. The driver of a private vehicle, upon which another may be riding, without the driver's knowledge, is in no proper sense the servant or agent of the latter. The relation of the person so riding may be that of a trespasser to the owner of the vehicle, or even to the driver; but he is in no sense of the term the master or superior of the driver. Nor is the act of such character that on account of it he should be denied a remedy for injuries sustained by the negligence of another.

The intestate in this case, even if he was, without the knowledge of the driver, riding upon a wagon or dray along the streets of Cincinnati, did not thereby violate any duty he owed to the street railway company. It was a matter affecting himself, on one side, and the owner or driver of the vehicle, on the other. Whether the latter had some just grounds of complaint or not, did not concern the street-railway company. True, it is possible that the driver might have used greater care than he did had he known the intestate was on the vehicle. That, however, is purely speculative, and therefore too uncertain to become a predicate for affecting the respective rights of the parties. However, if it should be conceded that the driver would have been more careful if he had known the boy was on the dray, no principle is apparent by which the street railway company could be relieved. The basis of its liability is its own wrongful conduct; and in such case we have seen its only way of escaping from the consequences of this wrongful conduct is through some wrongful contributory act or omission of the injured person himself, or by some one to whom he bore the relation of master or superior; and that relation is not created by the simple act of boarding a private vehicle without the knowledge of the driver.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, ex rel. Fred. G. EINSFELD, Appt.,
v.
Joseph MURRAY et al., Commissioners of Excise, Respts.

(149 N. Y. 367.)

1. The restriction on appropriations of public moneys for local purposes without the assent of two thirds of the members elected to each branch of the legislature, made by Const. art. 3, § 20, is not violated by the act of March 3, 1896, giving two thirds of the excise taxes thereby imposed to the towns and cities in which they are raised, since such funds, which never reach the state treasury, have by long course of legislation been treated like revenues levied for local purposes, and not as public moneys of the state within the meaning of that constitutional provision.

2. A statute exacting the payment of a sum called a tax, and also the giving of a bond, as conditions precedent to the right to engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors, is an exercise of the police power, rather than a tax law in the proper sense.

3. A general state excise law, although it graduates excise taxes in cities according to their population, but does not follow the classification of cities in the Constitution, is not a general or special city law, and does not relate to the "property, affairs, or government" of cities, so as to bring it within the provisions of Const. art. 12, § 2, respecting the classification of cities and the reference of special city laws to the mayors of the cities affected thereby.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question involved in this appeal is the constitutionality of the act of the legislature, approved March 23, 1896, entitled "An Act in Relation to the Traffic in Liquors and for the Taxation and Regulation of the Same and to Provide for Local Option." The constitutionality of the act is assailed on three principal grounds: (1) That it appropriates the public moneys or property of the state to private and local purposes, and not having been passed by a two-thirds vote of the legislature, is void under art. 3, § 20, of the state Constitution; (2) that section 11 of the act, which fixes the excise tax upon the business of trafficking in liquors, creates a classification of cities at variance with that created by art. 12, § 2, of the Constitution; (3) that the act is a special city law as to each of the cities of the state, which, under art. 12, § 2, of the Constitution, was required to be submitted to the mayor for acceptance or rejection before final enactment. These questions are considered in the opinion of the appellate division of the first department in the decision from which the appeal is taken. We concur in the conclusions reached, and can add but little to the very cogent and satisfactory opinion of Judge Patterson in the case. We shall, however, in view of the great public interest in the subject, make some observations upon the several questions in the order in which they have been stated.

First. Art. 3, § 20, of the Constitution prescribes: "The assent of two thirds of the members elected to each branch of the legislature shall be requisite to every bill appropriating the public moneys or property for local or private purposes." It is insisted that § 13 of the act of 1896, which provides that one third of the revenues derived under the act, less the amount allowed for collecting the same, shall be paid to the treasurer of the state to the credit of the general fund, as a part of the general tax revenue of the state, and that the "remaining two thirds thereof, less the amount allowed for collecting the same, shall belong to the town or city in which the traffic was carried on from which the revenues were received, and shall be paid by the county treasurer of such county and by the special deputy commissioners to the supervisor of such town or to the treasurer or fiscal officer of such city, and such revenues shall be appropriated and expended by such town or city in such manner as is now or may hereafter be provided by law for the appropriation and expenditure of sums received for excise licenses, or in such other manner as may hereafter be provided by law," is in contravention of this section of the Constitution as respects the disposition made by the act of two thirds of the revenue to town and city purposes. This latter clause, it is insisted, is an appropriation of public money to local purposes within this section of the Constitution, and it being conceded that the act did not receive a two-thirds vote of the members of the legislature, if the claim is well founded the 13th section of the act, so far as relates to two thirds of the revenues, is unconstitutional and void. The appropriation of this part of the excise tax revenues is, without doubt, for a local purpose within art. 3, § 20, of the Constitution. The fact that the purpose for which an appropriation is made is public does not withdraw it from the inhibition of the section if the purpose is also local. An act may be local, although public. Church, Ch. J., Kerrigan v. Force, 68 N. Y. 381; People v. Allen, 42 N. Y. 378. The crucial question, therefore, is whether the act of 1896 is, within the section, an appropriation of public moneys. This provision of the present Constitution was in the Constitution of 1821, and has ever since formed a part of the organic law of the state. Section 13 of the act of 1896, after fixing the rule of distribution of the excise taxes as between the state and the cities and towns, prescribes that the revenues received by the cities and towns shall be appropriated and expended for the purposes to which the excise moneys are applied under existing laws. The excise law of 1892, which was in force up to the passage of the act of 1896, under which all excise moneys were paid over to the several towns or cities in which licenses were granted and in which the license moneys were received, declared in substance that the moneys should be applied towards defraying the expenses of local government therein. Laws 1882, chap. 401, § 15.

Under the act of 1896, which in effect incorporates into the 13th section this provision of the act of 1892, the same application is to be made of the excise taxes received by the cities and towns, as was prescribed by the act of 1892 in respect to license fees collected under that act. Upon the point whether two thirds of the traffic taxes imposed by the act of 1896, and which the 13th section declares shall belong to the town or city where the traffic is carried on, are public moneys within art. 3, § 20, of the Constitution, it is important to notice that although this section has been since 1821 a part of the Constitution of the state, excise moneys collected during that whole period have been appropriated under a general law of the state exclusively to the localities where the licenses were granted to be applied to diminish local taxation or to some purpose of local charity. Indeed, this has been the uniform policy of the state in respect of the disposition of excise moneys derived from the traffic in liquors from the foundation of the state government. By the earliest excise law of the state (Laws 1779, chap. 17) the excise commissioners were directed to pay the excise moneys collected in each county to the county treasurer, to be applied towards defraying the contingent expenses of the county. The system of appointing commissioners of excise has not been uniform. Under the Colonial act (Laws 1775, chap. 54) they were designated by name in each of the localities. The act of 1779 designated certain officials to act as commissioners. Since that time county boards of excise have been created, as under the act of 1857, and subsequently town and city boards were substituted. Under the county system the excise moneys were paid to the counties, and under the system of town and city boards to the towns and cities in which the licenses were issued. But, notwithstanding many changes from time to time have been made in the details of the excise system, there has, for a century of the state government and up to the act of 1896, been one uniform policy recognized by the legislature, namely, that moneys received for licenses for the liquor traffic should be paid over to the localities of the state in which the licenses were granted, to be applied to some object of local government or interest.

Under the former license laws large sums have been collected annually in cities, villages, and towns. In a strict and accurate sense they were public moneys. No exaction can be lawfully made of a citizen by way of tax, impost, or excise, except under the authority of the legislature, and the product of such imposition is public money. But there is a well-settled distinction between the money of the state and money levied under corporate powers conferred upon cities, villages, and towns for local and corporate purposes. In the latter case the money levied and collected is not the money of the state. It is the money of the town, city, or village in which under the exercise of corporate powers it was levied and collected, and to it the state has no title. People v. Ingersoll, 58 N. Y. 1, 17 Am. Rep. 178; Shepherd's Fold v. New York, 96 N. Y. 138. In every city or village charter the power of local taxation for municipal purposes is conferred with authority to appropriate the money raised to purposes of local government. This, in a general sense, is an appropriation of public moneys to local purposes, but it has never been supposed that it was an appropriation within the meaning of art. 3, § 20, of the Constitution, so as to require a two-thirds vote to pass a bill granting a city or village charter. The former excise laws stood upon a different basis from the charter laws of cities and villages. They were general laws applicable to the whole state, establishing a system for the regulation of the traffic in liquors, varying in some respects in their application in cities and towns. The system was administered through boards of excise, sometimes, as we have seen, appointed directly by the legislature, but generally elected in towns, with jurisdiction to grant licenses in the town for which they were elected, and in cities, appointed by local authorities. The excise commissioners, although locally elected or appointed, were state agencies for administering the excise system, and, like assessors, collectors, and highway commissioners, were independent public officers, exercising public powers, and charged with public duties specially prescribed by law. Lorillard v. Monroe, 11 N. Y. 392, 62 Am. Dec. 120; People, Van Keuren, v. Esopus Town Aud- itors, 74 N. Y. 310. In granting licenses they were not exercising a jurisdiction as agents of the corporation within which they acted, for the granting of licenses for the traffic in liquor was not a power vested in towns, villages, or cities. They exercised their functions under the authority of the state, which prescribed their powers and duties, and the mode of their appointment was a convenient method for designating the agencies through which the system should be administered.

We assent to the claim of the counsel for the appellant that the towns, cities, and villages never acquired any irrevocable right to receive the license fees collected. We do not doubt that it would have been competent for the legislature from the first to have required all license fees to be paid into the state treasury for general state purposes, or at any time to have changed the practice which was adopted. The reason for the legislative policy which has hitherto uniformly prevailed, to permit license fees to be applied to the uses of the locality where the traffic was licensed and carried on, is obvious, namely, to furnish some measure of indemnity against the public burdens thrown upon localities by the prosecution of a business therein under state authority, powerfully contributing to disorder, pauperism, and crime. Seventy-five years have elapsed since the constitutional provision now in question first became part of the organic law, and during that long period this practice, under statutes which concededly were enacted without a two thirds vote, has prevailed, and has never hitherto been challenged as a violation of the Constitution. Those statutes as distinctly appropriated public moneys to local purposes as does the statute of 1896, and were even more subject to the constitutional criticism made to the act of 1896, since they appropriated to the use of the cities and towns not a part only, but the whole of the excise moneys collected. This legislative policy which has prevailed for so long a period, sanctioned by numerous statutes, never questioned in the courts and acquiesced in by all departments of the state government, is a practical construction of the constitutional provision now in question, that an appropriation of excise moneys to the use of towns and cities under acts passed by a majority vote, is not an infraction of the Constitution, and this construction ought not now to be disturbed.

We also assent to the proposition that the provisions of the former excise laws under which excise moneys were paid over to localities, constituted appropriations of public moneys. But the public moneys referred to in article 3, § 20, of the Constitution, are the public moneys of the state as contradistinguished from public revenues levied for local purposes by towns, cities, and villages under state authority, or moneys which by a long course of legislation, as in the case of excise moneys, have been treated as standing in the same situation.

The act of 1896, also, we think, appropriates to the towns and cities the two thirds of the excise taxes which may be collected under the act. But it is an appropriation which operates on the fund at the very moment of its collection. The two thirds so appropriated never reaches the treasury of the state and never bears the impress of state money. The statute declares in express terms that two thirds of the fund collected "shall belong to the town or city in which the traffic was carried on, from which the revenues were received." It was competent for the legislature so to declare by a majority bill, unless there is a distinction between excise money under former statutes and excise taxes under the act of 1896, which would justify such an appropriation in the one case but not in the other.

We think no such distinction exists. The claim that the act of 1896 is a tax law, having for its primary purpose the raising of revenue for the support of government, involves the theory that the legislature in enacting it intended to depart from the principle upon which all excise laws have hitherto been founded. That principle has been by exaction and restriction to limit a dangerous traffic in the interests of social order and the public welfare. It is probably competent for the legislature to tax occupations or business as a source of revenue, and it could tax the liquor traffic for this purpose. The selection of the subjects of taxation rests with the legislature, and the imposition of a license fee for revenue on a business or occupation is an exercise of the power of taxation. License Tax Cases, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 462, 18 L. ed. 497; Cooley, Const. Lim. 201. But an exaction imposed as a condition of the right to carry on a business dangerous to public morals, or which may involve public burdens by way of discouragement or regulation, is not in any proper sense a tax. It does not proceed upon the principle upon which taxes are levied, and upon which taxation is justified, viz., the protection afforded by the government to the taxpayer. The imposition is made in such cases generally for a double purpose, to discourage the business and to secure indemnity in part to the public from the losses and burdens which the business is likely to entail. The so-called excise tax is for the protection of the community and not for the protection of the person from whom it is exacted. It is said by Judge Cooley, in his work on Taxation, p. 397, that "custom has much to do in determining whether certain classes of exactions are to be regarded as taxes or as duties imposed for regulation." There can be no doubt that a large revenue will result from excise taxes imposed by the act of 1896, nor that this was contemplated by the legislature. But this will be a consequence of the system, and was not the motive of its adoption. It was manifestly not the intention of the legislature to encourage the traffic, but to control, restrict, and regulate it, and by the local option provision it is rendered possible that it may be wholly prohibited in every town of the state, a provision quite inconsistent with a purpose to encourage the traffic or to make it an ordinary source of revenue. The fact that the exaction is in the act denominated a tax is not conclusive. All exactions imposed upon citizens by public authority are in a general sense taxes, whether imposed for regulation or revenue. The character of the act of 1896, whether a tax law in a proper sense, or a law enacted under the police power, must be determined from its whole scope and tenor, and there can be no reasonable doubt, we think, that it is of the latter character. It is radically different in some respects from the excise laws which it supersedes. But the changes are in the administration of the excise system, and not in its essential character. The most noticeable changes are: (1) state supervision in place of supervision through boards of excise, and (2) the opening of the traffic to all citizens (with certain exceptions) who shall pay the license tax and give the bond required. The payment of the tax and the giving of the bond are conditions precedent to the right to engage in the business, and the imposition of conditions precedent is the distinguishing test of a license law. See Cooley, J., Younyblood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406, 20 Am. Rep. 654; Marshall, J., Adler v. Whitbeck, 44 Ohio St. 539. The analogy between the law of 1896 and the former excise laws is strongly marked. There is the same necessity of a public certification of a right to engage in the traffic; the same restrictions and regulations intended to guard the traffic and reasonably protect the public against its acknowledged evils; the same principle of local option; and the act incorporates the principle of the civil damage law. The new features of the system may prove to be efficient means of repression and regulation, such as the change in the administrative agencies, and the much larger tax upon the right to engage in the traffic.

We do not deem it important to consider how far the legislature may go in alienating the public revenues derived from the exercise of the ordinary power of taxation to local or private purposes, or in barring itself from a resort to the usual sources of taxation. Clearly it cannot appropriate the public moneys of the state for a local though public purpose, except by a two-thirds bill, and this whether the money is actually in the treasury of the state or in process of collection. But the legislative declaration in the act of 1896, that two thirds of the excise taxes shall belong to the towns and cities, is in accordance with an uninterrupted legislative understanding that the legislature may devote excise moneys to the uses of the towns and cities in which they are collected, by majority bill, and it is now too late to question this construction of the Constitution.

Second. We perceive no force in the objection based upon the departure in the act of 1896 from the classification of cities made by art. 12, § 2, of the Constitution. The section is new and its manifest purpose is to give some measure of protection to cities against the evils of special city legislation. It divides the cities of the state into three classes according to population, the first class embracing cities having a population of 250,000 or more; the second, those having a population of 50,000 and less than 250,000; and the third, all other cities. The section then proceeds: "Laws relating to the property, affairs, or government of cities and the several departments thereof are divided into general and special city laws; general city laws are those which relate to all the cities of one or more classes; special city laws are those which relate to a single city or to less than all the cities of a class." Then follow provisions for the transmission of a copy of every special city law after it has passed both branches of the legislature, to the mayor of the city for approval or rejection, before its final enactment and for subsequent action by the legislature in case of disapproval. The law of 1896 in fixing the excise taxes graduates them in cities according to population, but does not follow the classification in this section of the Constitution. More is exacted in New York than in Brooklyn or Buffalo, and more in Brooklyn than in Buffalo, although these cities are cities of the first class in the classification in art. 12, § 2.

The conclusive answer to the constitutional objection based on this section is that the act of 1896 is neither a general nor special city law, nor does it relate to the "property, affairs, or government" of cities. It is a general state excise law, with such special provisions and adaptations to localities as to the legislature seemed proper. Whether the law should be uniform in its application to the cities of the state, or whether a discrimination should be made in the excise tax as between New York and any other city, and the extent of the discrimination, was in the discretion of the legislature. In enacting a general law under the police power, the legislature is not hampered or restrained by the classification of cities in the Constitution. It may adjust details to meet varying conditions. In a health law, regulations which might be suitable and proper for the city of New York, a great seaport, exposed to peculiar dangers from infection and disease, might be unnecessary, burdensome, and oppressive if applied to an inland city like Buffalo. The constitutional limitation relates to city laws, either general or special, and not to general laws for the government of the state, including the cities therein. Nor is the law of 1896 a law relating to the "property, affairs, or government of cities." The granting of licenses for the liquor traffic has never been a corporate function or duty of a city, as such. It is a function which the state in its aggregate capacity has administered. It has made use of local machinery as has been shown, and it has permitted the cities to use excise moneys for local purposes. But excise laws do not relate to the affairs of cities, and still less to their property or government within the section of the Constitution now considered. Cities are affected by the act of 1896, as are all other localities in the state. But this is because, in the framing of general laws, all places are alike subject to the legislative power. The act in question is not special legislation under the disguise of a general law. It will be the duty, and, we have no doubt, the pleasure, of the court, on a proper occasion, to give full effect to this new provision of the Constitution, and to construe it with that liberal spirit which is especially required in the interpretation of a remedial provision of the fundamental law, so that, if possible, it shall be efficient to secure the purpose of its enactment.

Third. The objection that the law of 1896 was a special city law, which under art. 12, § 2, of the Constitution, ought to have been referred to the mayors of the cities affected, has been answered in the consideration of the other objection based on this section. It was not a special city law. It did not relate to the "property, affairs, or government" of any city within the meaning of the section referred to.

We find no ground for questioning the constitutionality of the act of 1896, and we therefore affirm the judgment below.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

OPINION OF THE JUSTICES.

The appointment of women to be notaries public cannot be authorized by the legislature under article 4 of the amendments to the Constitution, providing that they shall be appointed by the governor "in the same manner as judicial officers are appointed."

THE House of Representatives submitted to the supreme judicial court the question whether or not the state legislature had power to authorize the governor and council to appoint women as notaries public.

To the Honorable House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

We, the undersigned, justices of the supreme judicial court, in reply to your order, a copy of which is annexed, respectfully submit the following opinion:

The question upon which our opinion is now required was suggested in the opinion given by the justices to the governor and council on March 18, 1890. Opinion of the Justices, 150 Mass. 586, 6 L. R. A. 842. The first paragraph of article 4 of the amendments to the Constitution is as follows: "Notaries public shall be appointed by the governor in the same manner as judicial officers are appointed, and shall hold their offices during seven years, unless sooner removed by the governor, with the consent of the council, upon the address of both Houses of the legislature." By the Constitution (chap. 2, art. 9, § 1), "all judicial officers . . . shall be nominated and appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the council; and every such nomination shall be made by the governor, and made at least seven days prior to such appointment." In the opinion given to the governor and council on March 18, 1890, the justices advised that, under the Constitution, a woman could not be appointed a notary public in the absence of any legislation authorizing such an appointment. We have carefully considered the question of the power of the legislature to authorize such an appointment, and are of opinion that, if the Constitution does not confer the power upon the governor and council, the legislature cannot confer it. The legislature in this respect cannot enlarge the power given to the governor and council by the Constitution unless the Constitution has authorized the legislature to do this, and we can find no such authority in the Constitution. The power of the general court, with reference to officers and offices, so far as it is expressly conferred by the Constitution, is found in chap. 1, art. 4, § 1, and it is full power and authority "to name and settle annually, or provide by fixed laws for the naming and settling, all civil officers within the said commonwealth, the election and Constitution of whom are not hereafter in this form of government otherwise provided for; and to set forth the several duties, powers, and limits of the several civil and military officers of this commonwealth, and the forms of such oaths or affirmations as shall be respectively administered unto them for the execution of their several offices and places, so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this Constitution."

It is to be noticed that the power of the general court to set forth the several duties, powers, and limits of the several civil and military officers of the commonwealth is not limited to the officers whom the legislature is empowered to name and settle, but includes all civil and military officers of the commonwealth. But the power to name and settle civil officers, or to provide by fixed laws for naming and settling them, is confined to those the election and Constitution of whom are not provided for in the Constitution. The question is not whether the legislature cannot confer upon some officer whose office is created by statute some or all of the powers now exercised by notaries public in the commonwealth. If this were done, such an officer would not be a notary public in the sense in which the words are used in the Constitution. The Constitution did not create the office of notary public. It was an office known to the Roman law, and has existed in all, or nearly all, Christian countries for many centuries. The duties of the office in this commonwealth are in part prescribed by statute, and in part are such as, by usage, notaries public for a long time have been accustomed to perform, and the international character and relations of notaries public are important. The history of the office was briefly given in the opinion hereinbefore cited. The fact that the duties of notaries public in this commonwealth are not strictly judicial does not, in our opinion, necessarily affect the question before us. The question in every case is of the meaning of the Constitution, and, in determining this, the history and nature of the particular office, and the usages of this and other states and countries with regard to the office at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, must be considered. At that time, as well as at the time of the adoption of the Fourth Amendment, so far as we are aware, the usage to appoint only men to be notaries public was as general as to appoint only men to judicial offices.

NOTE.—The ineligibility of women to become notaries public in the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions making them so was decided in Women as Notaries Public (Mass.) 6 L. R. A. 842, and State, Peters, v. Davidson (Tenn.) 20 L. R. A. 311. The present case goes further by denying the power of the legislature to make them eligible.

Where an office is created by statute, the tenure, the mode of appointment, the qualifications required, the duties of the office, and the compensation are wholly within the control of the legislature, unless there is some limitation put upon the legislature by the Constitution, and the statute creating the office may be altered or repealed by the legislature at any time. But, if the tenure of an office and the mode of appointment are prescribed by the Constitution, the legislature cannot change them, unless the Constitution gives the legislature authority to do so. If the qualifications for the office are prescribed by the Constitution, the legislature cannot change them. If the qualifications are not prescribed by the Constitution, although the tenure and mode of appointment are, there has been some question whether the legislature can prescribe the qualifications, but the solution of this question in any particular case depends upon the construction of the particular clauses of the Constitution involved, as well as of the whole frame and purport of the Constitution. But if, by the true construction of the Constitution, persons of a certain description cannot be appointed to an office, the legislature cannot authorize the appointment of such persons to that office. If, for example, the Constitution expressly had provided that only men or male persons should be appointed notaries public, the legislature could not authorize the governor and council to appoint women to that office. The construction which heretofore has been given to the 4th Amendment to the Constitution by the justices of this court is, in effect, that such is the meaning of that amendment. There is nothing in the Constitution which in terms prohibits women from being appointed to judicial offices, any more than from being appointed to military offices, or to executive civil offices, the tenure and mode of appointment of which are provided for in the Constitution. It was the nature of the office of justice of the peace, and the usage that always had prevailed in making appointments to that office, that led the justices to advise that it could not have been the intention of the Constitution that women should be appointed justices of the peace. Opinion of Justices, 107 Mass. 604. In our opinion, the same considerations apply to the office of notary public.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the question proposed should be answered in the negative.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
Edward McMULLEN.

(.....N. J.....)

1. A servant assumes the ordinary risks incident to the employment, and also risks arising in consequence of special features of danger known to him, or which he could have discovered by the exercise of reasonable care, or which should have been observed by one ordinarily skilled in the employment in which he engages.

2. The employer is bound to use reasonable care to protect the servant from unnecessary risk, and is liable for damages occasioned to him through some latent danger of which he should have warned him.

*Headnotes by VAN SYCKEL, J.

NOTE.—Liability of electric company to employee for injury caused by electric shock.

The liability for negligence in respect to electric wires, so far as it relates to such wires in highways, is considered in a note to Denver Consol. Electric Co. v. Simpson (Colo.) 31 L. R. A. 566, and cases following. Police power as to electric lines is the subject of a note to State, Laclede Gaslight Co., v. Murphy (Mo.) 31 L. R. A. 798.

The present note includes merely the few decisions that have been rendered up to the present time respecting liability to employees of electric companies for injuries caused by electricity.

The ordinary principles of law governing the relation of master and servant are plainly applicable to this subject, but the application of these principles must be made with a recognition of the degree of danger to be guarded against in such employment.

Negligence of employer.

The defective stringing of electric-light wires, so that those of another circuit charged with electricity come in contact with dead wires along which an employee is trimming lamps, and because of worn insulation transmit a current to him, renders the electric company liable for the injury. Kraatz v. Brush Electric Light Co. 82 Mich. 457.

An arrangement of dynamo wires in an electric-light plant so that three dynamos are connected to the plug board by two wires part of which run along the floor of the building where they are unprotected and not properly insulated, and where an employee must stand astride of them to get at a dynamo box into which he must put tallow for lubrication, is a dangerous arrangement of the wires which constitutes negligence on the part of the electric company, which renders it liable to an employee who is injured without contributory

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Essex County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. P. Douglass and Rush Taggart for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Samuel Kalisch for defendant in error.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In June, 1893, McMullen, who was plaintiff below, was in the employment of the Western Union Telegraph Company, engaged in helping to set poles, string wires, put up cross-arms, and connect wires. While in the performance of his duty, and as he was about to attach a new wire, he received such a strong current of electricity from the Western Union wire that he was knocked insensible, and received most painful injuries. The writ of error in this case is prosecuted to review the judgment recovered by McMullen below in compensation for the injuries received by him. The pole upon which McMullen was working at the time he was injured was the property of the telegraph company. It appeared in the case that, in the ordinary use of the telegraph wires, the current of electricity was not sufficient to do injury to the person handling the wires. It further appeared that in various parts of Jersey City, and not far from where McMullen was injured, there were poles of the telegraph company to which were attached electric-light wires, heavily and dangerously charged with electricity, and that such electric-light wires were in such close proximity to the wires of the telegraph company as to be dangerous, but no electric light wire was attached to the pole on which McMullen was injured. He had been in the employ of the company but one month and five days when he was injured, and had never worked in Jersey City before. It did not appear that the company gave any warning to McMullen of the danger in stringing its wires by reason of their close proximity to electric-

A recent case showing the degree of care required when the danger is great is McAdam v. Central Railway & E. Co., in the supreme court of Connecticut. In this case the following were the facts: The defendant, the Central Railway & Electric Company, maintained and operated an electrical plant comprising two separate and distinct branches; one for furnishing electric power to operate an electric street railway or trolley road, and the other for furnishing electric lights. The plaintiff was employed in the electric lighting branch of their works. Under the superintendent's order he undertook to remove from a pole opposite the power house of said defendant, a telephone wire which was used in the electric lighting branch or department. Said pole was about 24 feet high and carried wires of both high and low potential; high, such as electric light and railway wires; low, such as telephone and fire-alarm wires. In ascending said pole, and others of similar style, linemen were ordered to make use of ladders. Plaintiff did make use of a ladder about 18 feet long. A man of plaintiff's height could readily and easily remove any wire carried on said pole without leaving the ladder. As plaintiff neared the top of the ladder he laid hold of a projecting eye-bolt, after having first tested it with moistened finger to see if it was charged. As he reached out to touch a second eye-bolt, projecting from the opposite side of the pole, he received a shock of electricity which threw him to the ground, whereby he was injured. Both said eye-bolts were used for the purpose of fastening to said pole certain support and guy wires connected with the trolley; were understood to have no, or an extremely low, potential; were supposed and understood, together with the wires fastened to the same, to be dead, and would have been dead had the trolley wire been properly constructed and the wires properly insulated. Defendant knew that said trolley was improperly constructed and that said wires were not properly insulated, the attention of its superintendent having been called to sparks which were thrown off by said wires or others connected therewith. Of this, however, plaintiff had no knowledge. The court held that the defendant was liable. 67 Conn. 445.

A carpenter hired to assist in taking care of electric-light towers was sent by the superintendent to remove a lamp from an electric-light tower and connect the wires with the circuit. He was inexperienced in that work, which was outside of the scope of his duties, and was not instructed as to its performance or furnished with tools or implements for doing the work. He did not know of the use of a "jumper" to cut off the current between two points on a circuit, and used his hand in making the connection. The superintendent informed him that he would have time to do the work before the current would be turned on at the usual hour, which was about a quarter to five in the afternoon. While he was connecting the wires, after removing the lamp, the current was turned on, giving him a shock which caused him to fall. These facts were held to make a case for the jury and a verdict was rendered against the electric company. It was held on appeal that a motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled, but the judgment was reversed for the improper admission of evidence as to a subsequent warning by placards as to the hour of quitting work. Colorado Electric Co. v. Lubbers, 11 Colo. 505.

Duty to warn.

A master who carries on an imminently dangerous undertaking, such as the generation and distribution of electricity, is bound to know the character and extent of the danger and to notify the same to the servant, specially and unequivocally, so as to be clearly understood by him. Myhan v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. 41 La. Ann. 964, 7 L. R. A. 172.

An employee who stands astride electric wires to get at a dynamo box, as he is obliged to do to put tallow into it in the performance of his duties, without knowing that the wires are dangerous, should be especially warned by his employer of the danger. Ibid.

Injury to an employee from a latent danger of which he should have been warned but was not when engaged in stringing and connecting telegraph wires will render the employer liable. See main case of WESTERN U. TELEG. CO. v. MCMULLEN.

An experienced lineman sent to make a connection of an electric plant with certain premises need not be cautioned in regard to the exposed condition of the ends of the wires which he is to connect, this being not only open and obvious, but something that it was his peculiar business to see and know. Junior v. Missouri Electric Light & P. Co. 127 Mo. 79.

light wires at other points. The trial court charged the jury that McMullen, when he entered the service of the company, assumed the ordinary risks incident to the employment, and he also assumed risks arising in consequence of special features of danger known to him, or which he could have discovered by the exercise of reasonable care. He left it to the jury to say whether the placing of electric-light wires upon some of the poles of the company, near to the telegraph wires, was a special feature of danger known to McMullen, or which should have been observed by one ordinarily skilled in the employment in which he was engaged. If the jury found in favor of McMullen upon these questions, then it was instructed to inquire whether the company had been guilty of actionable negligence. On this part of the case the jury were instructed that the duty imposed on the company by the contract of hiring was not to subject McMullen, without his knowledge or consent, to risks not assumed by him; that an employer contracts with his employee to use reasonable care to protect him from unnecessary risks, and is responsible to the employee for damages resulting to him by reason of the want of such care. The jury were directed to charge the company with negligence if it found that McMullen was injured through some latent danger, of which he should have been warned, and that the injury resulted from the fact that the electric-light wires placed on the poles of the company were the proximate cause of the injury. All these instructions are in accordance with the established rule in this state. Foley v. Jersey City Electric Light Co. 54 N. J. L. 411; Newman v. Fowler, 37 N. J. L. 89; Ingebregtsen v. Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. (N. J.) 31 Atl. 630. Upon each and every of the controlling questions in the case there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and therefore there is no error in law in the trial below.

The judgment should be affirmed.

Assumption of risks.

The rule that the employee assumes all the obvious, incidental, and natural risks of his employment, applies to employees of electric companies as well as to all other employees. Junior v. Missouri Light & P. Co. 127 Mo. 79; Smart v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. 47 La. Ann. 869.

An employee engaged at an electric plant is not required to know latent, but only patent, defects. Myhan v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. 41 La. Ann. 964, 7 L. R. A. 172.

Contributory negligence.

The rule as to contributory negligence also applies in actions by employees, and the employee cannot recover if his injury was caused by his own lack of reasonable care. Dixon v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1147.

Neglect to use rubber gloves provided for the very work of handling electric wires when a lineman is making connection of wires on a high pole, and is killed by touching their exposed ends, constitutes contributory negligence which prevents liability of the employer. Junior v. Missouri Electric Light & P. Co. 127 Mo. 79.

A lineman cannot recover of an electric-light company for injuries received from electric wires occurring by reason of defect in his gloves, which it was his own business to inspect and keep in good condition, and to exchange, when necessary, for new ones, although the gloves were thrown to him from a wagon with directions to put them on, by a foreman, if the latter had no special charge of the gloves and his direction was merely advisory. Smart v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. 47 La. Ann. 869.

Where an employee was sent to look for a break in the circuit while the current was on, and took with him a defective shunt cord which he himself selected from among others which were good, and after he found the break grasped the shunt cord at its defective end, and at the same time with his other hand grasped the naked end of the line wire, which was perfectly insulated a few inches from the end, and thereby received a deadly current which he would not have received by taking hold of the shunt cord if he had not taken hold of the line wire at the extreme end where it was not insulated, it was held that recovery could not be had against his employer. Piedmont Electric Illum. Co. v. Patteson, 84 Va. 747.

The claim that the wires should have been made dead before a lineman began to take them down from their position on one arm of a pole to place them on another, in doing which he was killed, is answered by the court, where the testimony is uncontradicted that the lineman could order the opening of the circuit in case of necessity, by saying the principle announced on this point is that an employee who has the opportunity to avoid the danger will have no recourse for the injury. Smart v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. supra.

Where the night inspector of an electric light and power company undertook to repair a lamp which was out of order because a cut-off screw was burnt out and was killed, it was held on a trial by the court without a jury that his contributory negligence would prevent any liability on the part of the company. In this case his dead body was found lying on the ground near the lamp, which had been lowered to within about 3 feet from the ground and the hood taken off, while the insulating board was on the opposite side of the lamp, showing that when he received the electric shock he must have been standing on the ground, and not on the insulating board. Dixon v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1147.

In cases where it is doubtful whether the special danger was so obvious that it should have been seen by the employee, or whether it was so latent that he should have been told of it, the question has been left to the jury. Thus, where the plaintiff was employed by a telegraph company in setting up its poles, affixing the crossarms, and stringing the wires, and in the course of this occupation received a severe shock which was probably caused by a current escaping from some electric-light wires which had been strung on the telegraph company's poles in neighboring localities by the permission of the telegraph company, it was held that the question whether the plaintiff should have been warned of the nearness of these electric-light wires, he never having worked in the same town before and having only worked for the company one month, might be left to the jury. See main case of WESTERN U. TELEG. CO. v. MCMULLEN.

So in the case of Colorado Electric Co. v. Lubbers, 11 Colo. 505, one of the questions for the jury was that of the employee's contributory negligence.

So in Voyer v. Dispatch Printing Co. (Minn.) 64 N. W. 1138, where an employee was injured by taking hold of a wire attached to an electric lamp while trying to hand the lamp, under a printing press to another employee.

Messrs. E. H. East, C. D. Porter, and J. D. B. DeBow for appellee:

McAlister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question presented for determination upon the record is whether the practice of demurring to the evidence is sanctioned by the Constitution and laws of this state. The suit was brought by W. D. Hopkins, administrator, to recover damages for the unlawful killing of his son, W. O. Hopkins. The plaintiff's intestate, at the time of his death, was employed by the railroad company in the capacity of fireman upon a locomotive. The gravamen of the action, as outlined in the declaration, is that the death of plaintiff's intestate was occasioned by the negligence of the engineer in charge of the train. The more specific allegations of the declaration are: That plaintiff's intestate was employed as a fireman, and as such fireman it was his duty to remain on the engine. That his intestate was a young man without any experience, having made but one trip on a freight train, and that he knew nothing of the duties of a brakeman. That, on the —— day of October, 1889, while one of defendant's freight trains was returning to Nashville, upon which the intestate was serving as brakeman, it was stopped at McEwen's station for the purpose of sidetracking a box car, and leaving it at said station. That, in accomplishing this object, it became necessary to uncouple some box cars in the rear of the car to be sidetracked, and the conductor, not notifying the engineer or plaintiff's intestate that one of the box cars had to be placed on the side track, or that any of the rear cars had been uncoupled, gave orders for the engineer to move forward his train, which the engineer understood as an order to go on to the next station, which order he obeyed, and moved his train on towards Nashville, leaving the conductor and all the brakemen at said station, and having no one on board the train excepting a cub fireman, the engineer, and plaintiff's intestate. That the train was a long one, with many box cars. The engineer, ignorant of what the conductor wanted done, and in obedience to the order, continued to move his train on towards Nashville, and pulled his train 3 miles from said station, before he ascertained that he did not have all his train, and that he was without a conductor and brakemen. That the engineer then took charge and control of said train, and started back to hunt for the lost cars, conductor, and brakemen. That said engineer ordered plaintiff's intestate to brake on the rear car, to keep a lookout for the lost part of his train, and give the signal of danger. That, in order to do this, said engineer knew plaintiff's intestate had to walk upon the top of the box cars. That said engineer knew plaintiff's intestate had never ridden on top of freight trains, that he knew nothing of the duties of brakeman, that he had not been instructed in the duties of a brakeman, or told of the dangers attending such duties, or instructed in the way to give signals or the meaning thereof. And while said intestate was standing at the rear brake, on the rear car, as ordered by said engineer, exercising ordinary care and prudence, and keeping a lookout for the lost cars, and while the train was moving up said steep grade rapidly, a brakeman was seen coming after the train; and said brakeman, wishing to get aboard the train, gave a signal for the train to slow up, and said intestate repeated the signal, as best he could, without instructions, and when the engineer saw the signal, unmindful of the dangerous position occupied by said intestate, and knowing said intestate was without knowledge of the danger, negligently, carelessly, and suddenly reversed his engine, thus jerking the train with great force, whereby intestate was thrown with great violence to the ground and killed by said train passing over his body. The second count of the declaration states the cause of action in substantially the same way, averring that the engineer, without giving plaintiff's intestate any instructions in respect of the performance of his duties, ordered him to the rear brake on the rear car, to keep a lookout for the lost cars, and that the engineer, knowing the dangerous position of intestate, and his want of knowledge and experience as a brakeman, recklessly, carelessly, and with great force checked the speed of the train, thereby throwing intestate to the ground and causing his death. The third count avers that, in an emergency like that which confronted the engineer, it was required of him, by the rules of the company, that the train should not be moved back without sending out a flagman in the direction in which the train is to be backed; and that the train should then be moved back at a rate of speed not exceeding 4 miles an hour; that, in violation of this rule, the engineer did not send out any flagman, but ordered the deceased to take his position on the rear end of the rear car, well knowing the deceased had no experience, and while in this position, the train going at the rate of 15 miles per hour, he was thrown from the car and instantly killed. The fourth count is merely a repetition of the third count, excepting in one particular. It is averred, in the latter count, that the deceased undertook to give a signal to the engineer, and, not having been instructed in the use of signals, and not knowing their meaning, in obedience to said signal the engineer stopped the train suddenly, thereby throwing deceased to the ground and killing him. The defendant pleaded not guilty.

An analysis of the declaration will show that the death of plaintiff's intestate is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the engineer. The engineer is charged to have been negligent in three particulars, viz.: First, in ordering the deceased to leave his place as fireman, and go to the rear brake of the rear car, to keep a lookout for the lost cars; second, in failing to give him warning, advice, and instructions in the use of signals; third, in violating the rules of the company in backing the train at a greater rate of speed than 4 miles per hour, and in failing to send out a flagman in the direction of the detached train. It has been held by this court that an engineer is a fellow servant, and not the superior, of a brakeman on his train, where, being deprived of their conductor, both pursue, independently of each other, the duties prescribed by the rules of the railroad company in such an emergency; the engineer not in fact assuming any control over the brakeman, though having the right to do so. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Martin, 87 Tenn. 398, 3 L. R. A. 282; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wheless, 10 Lea, 741, 43 Am. Rep. 317; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Handman, 13 Lea, 423; East Tennessee & W. N. C. R. Co. v. Collins, 85 Tenn. 227; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lahr, 86 Tenn. 335; Fox v. Sandford, 4 Sneed, 36, 67 Am. Dec. 587. Plaintiff, however, undertakes to remove this case from the general rule by the averment that the deceased had been ordered by the engineer to leave his place as fireman, and repair to the rear brake of the rear car, and keep a lookout for the detached cars. The plaintiff, in support of this charge, introduced the engineer. But this witness testified that deceased went to the rear car and took his position voluntarily and without orders from him; that deceased was performing the duties prescribed in such cases independently of the engineer, and without any orders or instructions from him whatever. This evidence is undisputed. The witness further testified that the deceased understood the signals, and, while the train was backing, gave the engineer a signal to stop immediately; that he accordingly shut off steam, and deceased fell over and was killed. The proof introduced by plaintiff shows that the engineer in charge was a thoroughly competent, careful, and prudent man, and that, in shutting off the steam, he was simply in the performance of his duty to stop the train in obedience to a danger signal from the deceased. There is no proof whatever that the deceased did not understand the signals. The only proof on the subject is that of the engineer, who testifies that he did understand them; and it will be remembered that the engineer is the plaintiff's witness. The engineer also contradicts the charge in the declaration that no notice was given him that a car was to be left at McEwen. He says he had such orders.

The only other ground of negligence averred is that the engineer, while in charge of this backing train, did not send out a flagman, as required by the rules of the company, and also exceeded the rate of speed allowed. The plaintiff offered in evidence rule 31, from the code of rules adopted by the company for the regulation of its employees. This rule provides that "if a train should part while in motion, trainmen must use great care to prevent the detached part from coming in collision. Engineers must give the signal as provided in signal rule 3, and keep the front of the train in motion until the detached portion may stop. The front portion will have the right to go back, regardless of all trains, to recover the detached portion, first sending out a flagman in the direction in which the train is to be backed, and running with great caution, not exceeding 4 miles per hour," etc. It is very obvious that this rule has no application to the facts of this case. This train did not part while in motion, nor was there any danger of the detached portions coming in collision. Hence, there was no occasion for sending out a flagman, or proceeding at a rate of speed not exceeding 4 miles per hour. The detached portion of the train had been left at McEwen, and remained stationary. It was not in motion on the track, following the fugitive train, and therefore presented no such emergency as called for the observance of this particular rule. But, if it be conceded that the rule did apply, and should have been observed on the occasion in question, it is not perceived that the violation of the rule was the proximate cause of the injury, or, indeed, that there was any causal connection between its infraction and the death of plaintiff's intestate. The record discloses that the deceased, in obedience to the rules of the company, had voluntarily taken his position at the rear brake of the rear car; that, with knowledge of the signals, he gave a danger signal to the engineer, and the latter in answer to said signal, immediately shut off steam, producing a jar in the train which threw the plaintiff from his position on the car, violently to the ground. This was the proximate cause of the accident, and the failure of the engineer to send out a flagman, or otherwise to observe rule 31, which was obviously designed to prevent a collision with the detached portion of the same train, had no causal connection whatever with the injury. So that, in any view of the case, upon the plaintiff's own showing, no liability was made out against the company.

It appears from the record that, at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony before the jury, counsel for defendant company interposed a written demurrer to the evidence, as follows, to wit:

"The defendant comes and demurs to the evidence of plaintiff, and offers to admit of record that the following testimony and proof introduced by plaintiff [setting out all the testimony introduced by plaintiff] is true, and further admits as true all proper and legal deductions and inferences therefrom in law. The defendant offers to admit that the facts so stated are the facts in this case, and were proved entirely by plaintiff and his witnesses, and does now aver that the facts so stated present no ground for a recovery against it under the pleadings in this cause; and this it is ready to verify. Wherefore defendant prays the court to allow this demurrer, and direct plaintiff to join therein, and judgment of the court accordingly, and the plaintiff may be barred against having or maintaining his action against it, or further prosecuting the same.

"East & Fogg, C. D. Porter, J. D. B. De Bow, Attys."

It will be observed that the demurrer in this cause was in writing, and set out in full the plaintiff's evidence, which is in accordance with the established practice in such cases. Counsel for plaintiff moved to dismiss the demurrer, because unknown to the forms or practice of law, and because insufficient, which motion was by the court overruled. Thereupon plaintiff joined issue upon the demurrer. Upon argument of counsel and consideration by the court, the demurrer was sustained, and the suit dismissed. Plaintiff appealed, and has assigned errors.

The first assignment is that the trial judge erred in allowing defendant to file a demurrer to the evidence, sustaining the same, and dismissing the suit. It is insisted this action of the court violates art. 1, § 6, of the Constitution of the state, which provides that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, etc., and also art. 6, § 9, which ordains: "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact but may state the testimony and declare the law." It may be well to understand, at the threshold of this investigation, what is meant by the right of trial by jury, as guaranteed by the Constitution. The late Mr. Justice Miller, in his Lectures on Constitutional Law, quotes with approval the following from the Encyclopædia Britannica, in its article Jury, to wit: "The essential features of trial by jury, as practiced in England and countries influenced by English ideas, are the following: The jury are a body of laymen, selected by a lot, to ascertain, under the guidance of a judge, the truth in questions of fact arising either in a civil litigation or a criminal process. . . . Their province is strictly limited to questions of fact, and within that province they are still further restricted to the exclusive consideration of matters that have been proved by evidence in the course of the trial. They must submit to the direction of the judge as to any rule or principle of law that may be applicable to the case," etc. Again, Forsyth, in his History of Trial by Jury, published in 1852, says: "The distinctive characteristic of the system is this: That the jury consists of a body of men taken from the community at large, summoned to find the truth of disputed facts. They are to decide upon the effect of the evidence, and thus to assist the court to pronounce a right judgment; but they have nothing to do with the judgment or sentence which follows the verdict. They are not, like the judges, members of a class charged with the duty of judicial inquiry. They are taken from varied pursuits, to make a special inquiry, and return to their ordinary avocations when the labor is over." It will be observed that, in both of these definitions, the distinctive feature of the jury system is that it is a tribunal erected for the settlement of variant, contested, and disputed facts. If the facts upon which plaintiff relies are uncontroverted, and are expressly admitted by the defendant, together with all legal and reasonable inferences that may be deduced therefrom, it is difficult to perceive what function is to be performed by the jury in the settlement of such agreed facts. The province of the jury is to weigh the evidence; but when there is no disputed fact in the record, there is nothing to be weighed. It was upon this idea that the demurrer to the evidence became an established practice at common law. "It is defined by the best text writers to be a proceeding by which the court in which the action is depending is called upon to decide what the law is upon the facts shown in evidence, and it is regarded in general as analogous to a demurrer upon the facts alleged in the pleading. When a party wishes to withdraw from the jury the application of the law to the facts, he may, by consent of the court, demur in law upon the evidence, the effect of which is to take from the jury and refer to the court, the application of the law to the facts, and thus the evidence is made a part of the record, and is considered by the court as in the case of a special verdict." Suydam v. Williamson, 61 U. S. 20 How. 427, 15 L. ed 978; Van Stone v. Stillwell Mfg. Co. 142 U. S. 134, 35 L. ed. 963. "Where the evidence in a cause is such that the counsel of the other party thinks it insufficient in law to maintain or overthrow the issue, he may demur to it. By so doing he admits the truth of all the facts alleged, withdraws the case from the jury, and submits the application of the law upon the facts to the court. As the province of the jury is to ascertain the truth of facts and the credibility of witnesses, the demurrer must, consequently, admit the truth of all facts which the jury might find in favor of the other party upon the evidence, of whatever kind, whether in writing or parol. Where the evidence is written, and where, though parol, it is certain, the party who offers it must join in the demurrer, or waive the testimony. If the plaintiff refuses to join, except in terms which the court disapproves, his evidence is considered as withdrawn, and the jury must find a verdict for the defendant. Where the evidence is uncertain or circumstantial, the party who offers it may specify the facts to be admitted before he joins in demurrer, and every fact must be admitted which the evidence conduces to prove. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 563. The court will also, on the argument of the demurrer, make every inference of fact in favor of the party offering the evidence, which the evidence warrants, and which the jury, with the least degree of propriety, might have inferred; but they ought not to make forced inferences." 1 Troubat & H. Pr. p. 509; 2 Tidd, Pr. p. 865; Starkie, Ev. pt. 3, p. 435; 2 Elliott, Gen. Pr. §§ 855-858, and notes. "The demurrer not only admits the truth of all the evidence adduced by the party against whose evidence the demurrer is directed, but it also admits all the inferences that may be logically and reasonably drawn from the evidence. The probative force of the evidence is not confined to the direct effect of the evidence but extends to the results reasonably deducible from it by logical and legitimate inference. . . . It follows, therefore, that the facts which the evidence directly or indirectly tends to prove must be taken as admitted." Id. § 858. Again, the same author, at § 863, says: "The evidence must be incorporated in the demurrer. It should be addressed to the whole evidence, and not to part. It should assign for cause that the evidence is insufficient to entitle the party against whose evidence it is filed to a recovery, but, according to the precedents, this may be done in general terms." The party who prevails on the demurrer is entitled to final judgment in his favor. It is not necessary that the damages should be assessed by the jury originally called to try the case, although that jury may assess them, but another jury may be called to assess the damages. If there is a conditional assessment of damages, and the decision upon the demurrer is in favor of the plaintiff, he is entitled to a judgment for the amount conditionally assessed. Where the damages have not been provisionally assessed, then, as already suggested, a jury may be called to make the assessment, and judgment will be entered for the amount assessed by the jury. Id. §§ 869, 870; 2 Troubat & H. Pr. p. 866; Gould, Pl. p. 574, § 73.

We have seen, from the authorities, that the only province of the jury is to settle disputed questions of fact, while the office of the demurrer to the evidence is to admit the facts and invoke the application of the law by the court. Is this practice in any sense an invasion of the constitutional guaranty "that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," or is it subversive of the other provision, "that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law?" We do not so understand it. It is not so understood in other states of the Union with similar constitutional provisions. Says Mr. Elliott: "In some jurisdictions [citing Maine], the courts refuse to recognize the practice of demurring to the evidence, but, as we think, without reason, for the practice is an ancient and well-established one, having a firm support in principle. It is recognized in most of the states, and also by the Federal and the English courts." 2 Elliott, Gen. Pr. § 855. "It is illogical," says the same author, "to assert that there is any encroachment upon the province of the jury where the evidence is conceded to be true and all legitimate and reasonable inferences that may be drawn from it are admitted, for, in such a case, there is no disputed question of fact for the jury to decide. Nor is there any injustice in entertaining a demurrer, for if the law is against the party to whose evidence the demurrer is addressed upon the evidence and the legitimate inferences that may be drawn from it, he can by no possibility be rightfully entitled to a recovery, and it is the duty of the court to so adjudge." Id. § 858.

The practice of demurring to the evidence is in vogue in nearly every state of the Union, as is fully shown in the briefs of counsel, who have diligently and critically explored the whole subject, and who, by their research and intelligent presentation of the question, have greatly lightened the labor of the court. The Constitution of Alabama provides that "the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," yet the practice of demurring to the evidence is recognized and enforced. In 1835, the supreme court of that state in Sawyer v. Fitts, 2 Port. (Ala.) 9, held, viz.: "On demurrer to evidence, the party must admit the facts and conclusions which may be reasonably inferred therefrom, otherwise the adverse party is not bound to join in the demurrer." The practice is also recognized in Gluck v. Cox, 90 Ala. 331. The Constitution of Florida provides, viz.: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate forever." Yet this mode of practice is established. Higgs v. Shehee, 4 Fla. 382; Hinote v. Simpson, 17 Fla. 444. In the latter case the court said: "No demurrer to evidence should be allowed and no judgment thereon given unless the party demurring shall admit upon the record all the facts which the evidence conduces to prove." In Illinois the same constitutional provision is found, but the practice of demurring to the evidence is allowed. In the case of Joliet, A. & N. R. Co. v. Velie, 140 Ill. 61, 62, the supreme court of that state held: "Where the defendant demurs to the plaintiff's evidence, he must be held to admit not only all that the plaintiff's testimony proves, but all that it tends to prove. The demurrer not only admits the truth of the testimony demurred to, but all the conclusions of fact which a jury may fairly draw therefrom. The testimony is to be taken most strongly against the party demurring, and whatever inferences the jury would be entitled to draw the court ought to draw. The object of the demurrer is to refer to the court the law arising from facts. Nothing remains but that the court should apply the law to the admitted facts. The court cannot investigate the facts in dispute or weigh the force of testimony—that is the province of the jury." Crowe v. People, 92 Ill. 231. In the state of Indiana, with similar constitutional provision, the practice of allowing a demurrer to the evidence is well settled. Pennsylvania Co. v. Stegemeier, 118 Ind. 306; Ruff v. Ruff, 85 Ind. 432. In Pennsylvania Co. v. Stegemeier the court held: "The appellant demurred to the evidence. The rules upon the subject of demurrers to the evidence are well settled, and by them this case must be determined. By demurring to the evidence the appellant admitted the truth of all the evidence adduced by the appellee, and all inferences that might reasonably be drawn from it, and withdrew from consideration all favorable evidence, except upon points where there was no conflict." 118 Ind. 306; Palmer v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. 112 Ind. 250; Purcell v. English, 86 Ind. 35, 44 Am. Rep. 255; Hazzard v. Citizens' State Bank, 72 Ind. 130; Steinmetz v. Wingate, 42 Ind. 574; Willcuts v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 81 Ind. 300; Fritz v. Clark, 80 Ind. 591. The Bill of Rights of Kansas (§ 5) also provides that "the right of trial shall be inviolate." In 1892 the case of Burlington Ins. Co. v. Ross, 48 Kan. 228, was tried under this Constitution, and the court held, viz.: "The plaintiff in error . . . demurred to the evidence because no cause of action was proved, and this demurrer was overruled, and judgment rendered for the amount of the loss. The overruling of the demurrer was error for which the cause must be reversed." Id. 234. The Kentucky Constitution (art. 13, § 8) provides, viz.: "The ancient mode of trial by jury shall be held sacred, and the right thereof remain inviolate, subject to such modifications as may be authorized by the Constitution." The former Constitution had ordained, also, that trial by jury shall be as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate. Under both Constitutions the practice of demurring to the evidence prevailed. Ditto v. Ditto, 4 Dana, 503; Shay v. Richmond & L. Turnp. Road Co. 1 Bush, 108. The Constitution of Maryland provides that "the trial by jury in all issues of fact shall be inviolably preserved." Art. 15, § 6. The demurrer to the evidence is also practiced in that state. Forbes v. Perrie, 1 Harr. & J. 110. Massachusetts also recognized the practice under a similar constitutional provision. Copeland v. New England Ins. Co. 22 Pick. 138; Forsyth v. Hooper, 11 Allen, 421; Golden v. Knowles, 120 Mass. 336. Michigan, under a like provision in its Constitution, sustains the practice. See Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 64 Mich. 97. This practice also prevails in the state of Mississippi, under similar conditions. In the case of Mobile & O. R. Co. v. McArthur, the supreme court of that state said, viz.: "A demurrer to evidence is a proceeding by which the judges, whose province it is to determine questions of law, are called upon to declare what the law is upon the facts in evidence," etc. If a party wishes to withdraw from the jury the application of the law to the facts, and the danger or risk of a misapplication, he demurs, in law, to the evidence. The effect is much the same as a special verdict, and perhaps would not be resorted to, if the jury would be compelled to find a special verdict. 43 Miss. 185. Again, the same court held that a party against whom a demurrer has been filed may be compelled to join in the demurrer. Western Assur. Co. v. Mayer, 64 Miss. 795. The practice is also recognized in Missouri under a like Constitution. Witting v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 101 Mo. 631, 10 L. R. A. 602; Walton v. Wabash Western R. Co. 32 Mo. App. 634. In New York the demurrer to the evidence is now superseded by a motion for a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's evidence. This practice is even more radical than the demurrer to the evidence, in that such a motion is allowed where it appears that, by reason of the great preponderance of evidence against the plaintiff, no verdict in his favor would be permitted to stand. Gould, Pl. 5th ed. p. 446. See also Colegrove v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 20 N. Y. 492, 493, 75 Am. Dec. 418; Haring v. New York & E. R. Co. 13 Barb. 15; Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615, 34 Am. Dec. 273; Suydam v. Grand Street & W. R. Co. 41 Barb. 375-380. In New Jersey the practice prevails, although the Constitution preserves inviolate trial by jury. Williams v. Sheppard, 13 N. J. L. 76. The Constitution of North Carolina provides "that in all controversies respecting property the ancient mode of trial by jury is one of the securities of the rights of the people and ought to remain sacred and inviolate." Art. 1, § 19. In the case of Nelson v. Whitfield, 82 N. C. 54, the court held, viz.: "A demurrer to evidence withdraws a case from the jury, and it is laid down in Tidd on Practice, 865, that when the evidence is in writing, or, if parol, is certain, the adverse party will be required to join in the demurrer, but where the parol evidence is loose and indeterminate, or is circumstantial, he will not be required to do so, unless the party demurring will distinctly admit upon the record every fact and every conclusion which the evidence offered conduces to prove. This the plaintiff declines to do, and there was no waiver of the objection on the part of defendant. There was no error in the ruling of the court below upon the evidence." In the late case of Hopkins v. Bowers, 111 N. C. 178, the court held, viz.: "When the defendants demurred to the evidence, the ruling of his honor that thereby the defendants admitted the truth of the testimony, together with such inferences favorable to plaintiffs as could be reasonably drawn therefrom, was unquestionably correct." Bond v. Wool, 107 N. C. 139. In Oregon the practice prevails under a like constitutional provision. In Hawley v. Dawson, 16 Or. 346, the court held, viz.: "In such a case the rule is that the demurrer admits all that the testimony objected to has proved, and all that it tends to prove and hence, if there is testimony tending to prove the issues in favor of the plaintiff the judgment must be in his favor." In Pennsylvania the Constitution provides, viz.: That in all controversies respecting property and in suits between man and man the parties have a right to trial by jury which ought to be held sacred. The demurrer to the evidence is, however, recognized. See McKowen v. McDonald, 43 Pa. 443, 82 Am. Dec. 576. The practice is also recognized in Texas. Hatch v. Garza, 7 Tex. 60; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Templeton, 9 Tex. Civ. App. —; Umscheid v. Scholz, 84 Tex. 265. In the state of Virginia the practice also prevails. Whittington v. Christian, 2 Rand. (Va.) 357; Jones v. Old Dominion Cotton Mills, 82 Va. 140; Trout v. Virginia & T. R. Co. 23 Gratt. 619. In the case of Jones v. Old Dominion Cotton Mills the court said: "It is the settled rule that by demurring to the evidence the demurrer waives all evidence on his part that conflicts with that of the other party, admits the credit of the evidence demurred to, admits all inferences of fact that may be fairly deduced from the evidence, and refers it to the court to deduce all fair inferences from the evidence." 82 Va. 140. In West Virginia the practice of demurring to the evidence is also recognized. Miller v. Franklin Ins. Co. 8 W. Va. 515; Riddle v. Core, 21 W. Va. 530; Williamson v. Newport News & M. Valley Co. 34 W. Va. 657, 12 L. R. A. 297; South West Imp. Co. v. Smith, 85 W. Va. 306.

It will thus be seen, from this review, that the demurrer to the evidence is still preserved in seventeen of the states. The practice has not been repudiated in the other states as obnoxious to their Constitutions; but it has been superseded by a less cumbersome and more radical procedure, to wit, ordering a nonsuit and directing a verdict. In the following states it has been adjudged lawful, under constitutional provisions guaranteeing trial by jury, for the courts to give instructions to the jury directing a verdict. Alabama: Thomasson v. Groce, 42 Ala. 431; Montgomery v. Wright, 72 Ala. 411, 47 Am. Rep. 422; 2 Elliott, Gen. Prac. § 888. Arkansas: In Catlett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 57 Ark. 468, the court held: "Where the plaintiff has adduced evidence tending to prove all the facts obtainable to sustain his complaint and the undisputed evidence is so conclusive that this court would be compelled to reverse the judgment based upon a verdict in his favor, the court should withdraw the case from the jury, and direct a verdict for the defendant." It should be remarked that the Constitution of Arkansas provided that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate" (art. 2, § 7), and "judges shall not charge juries with regard to matters of fact, but shall declare the law" (art. 7, § 23). In Illinois it is held that the court can instruct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant after plaintiff has closed his evidence. Doane v. Lockwood, 115 Ill. 490; People v. People's Ins. Exchange, 126 Ill. 466, 2 L. R. A. 340; 2 Elliott, Gen. Prac. § 887. In Indiana it is held the trial court may withdraw a cause from the jury where there is no dispute as to the facts. Purcell v. English, 86 Ind. 34, 44 Am. Rep. 255; Carver v. Carver, 97 Ind. 497; Rush v. Coal Bluff Min. Co. 131 Ind. 135. In Iowa a verdict may be directed by the court. Miller v. House, 63 Iowa, 82; Poor v. Merrill, 68 Iowa, 436. In Kansas it was held that, if the testimony offered in behalf of the defendant has no tendency to establish or advance the propositions essential to the maintenance of the defense, it is the duty of the court to direct the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff. Stiles v. Steele, 37 Kan. 552. In Kentucky the trial court may direct a verdict when there is no evidence. Gallatin v. Bradford, 1 Bibb, 209; Fightmaster v. Beasly, 7 J. J. Marsh. 411; Gregory v. Nesbit, 5 Dana, 421. In Maine the court may direct a verdict at close of entire case. Cooper v. Waldron, 50 Me. 80; Moore v. McKenney, 83 Me. 80. In respect of the demurrer to the evidence, the supreme court of Maine says it is an unusual and antiquated practice, calculated to suppress truth and justice, and is allowed by the court in the exercise of a sound discretion. State v. Soper, 16 Me. 293. This court held, however, in a later case, decided in 1862 (Cooper v. Waldron, 50 Me. 81), viz.: "When in any case it is clear that upon the evidence a verdict for the plaintiff cannot stand, and that in the end judgment must be rendered for the defendant, what good reason can be assigned for submitting the case to the jury? If their verdict is right, nothing is gained; and if it should happen to be wrong it must be set aside. To withhold a case from the jury is no greater interference than to set aside their verdict. To set aside their verdict impliedly impeaches either their intelligence or their integrity, and tends to lessen public confidence in the usefulness of the institution. . . . If the presiding judge is of the opinion that the facts admitted or clearly established are not sufficient to prove a want of probable cause, he must either nonsuit the plaintiff, or direct the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. The better course is for the judge to nonsuit the plaintiff, for it is idle to submit to the jury a question that can be answered only in one way." The Constitution of Maine also guarantees right to trial by jury. In Maryland the court may direct a verdict when there is no evidence to support the issue. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Stricker, 51 Md. 47, 34 Am. Rep. 291. In Massachusetts the court may direct a verdict. In the case of Reed v. Deerfield, 8 Allen, 522, the court held: "Where the whole evidence introduced by the plaintiff, if believed by the jury, is so insufficient to support a verdict that the court would not permit one to stand, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury, as matter of law, that there is not sufficient evidence to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff." So in the case of Denny v. Williams, 5 Allen, 1, the court held: "If the evidence is such that the court would set aside any number of verdicts rendered upon it, toties quoties, then the cause should be taken from the jury, by instructing them to find a verdict for the defendant." Kingsford v. Hood, 105 Mass. 495. In Michigan it is held that a verdict may be directed by the court in a proper case. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Nichol, 18 Mich. 170; Carver v. Detroit & S. Pl. Road Co. 61 Mich. 592; Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 64 Mich. 93. In Minnesota the court may direct a verdict at close of entire case. "If, when the evidence of both sides is closed, plaintiff is entitled, as a matter of law, to a verdict, the proper practice is to request the court to direct a verdict in his favor." Duluth Chamber of Commerce v. Knowlton, 42 Minn. 229. In Mississippi a verdict may be directed in a proper case. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Chastine, 54 Miss. 503. In Missouri the practice of directing a verdict is allowable. Grube v. Missouri P. R. Co. 98 Mo. 330, 4 L. R. A. 776; Carroll v. Inter-State Rapid Transit Co. 107 Mo. 653; Morgan v. Durfee, 69 Mo. 469, 33 Am. Rep. 508. In Nebraska it is adjudged error for the court not to direct a verdict in a proper case. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Loree, 4 Neb. 446; Union Stock Yards Co. v. Conoyer, 38 Neb. 488; Hakanson v. Brodke, 36 Neb. 42. In New York the jury may be instructed to return a verdict. Williams v. Guile, 117 N. Y. 343, 6 L. R. A. 366; People v. Cook, 8 N. Y. 67, 59 Am. Dec. 451; Linkauf v. Lombard, 137 N. Y. 417. In New Jersey the court may direct a verdict. Rochat v. North Hudson County R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 445; Phillips v. Pullen, 50 N. J. L. 439; Baldwin v. Shannon, 43 N. J. L. 596. It is also the practice in North Carolina for the trial court to direct a verdict. Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451. In Pennsylvania the trial court may direct a verdict. Hyatt v. Johnston, 91 Pa. 196. So in South Carolina the same practice obtains. Carter v. Oliver Oil Co. 34 S. C. 211. In Vermont a verdict may be directed under the practice prevailing in that state. St. Johnsbury v. Thompson, 59 Vt. 300, 59 Am. Rep. 731. In this latter case the court said, viz. "There being no conflict in the evidence nor any dispute as to the facts, there was nothing to be submitted to the jury. The only questions to be determined upon the evidence were questions of law which could be determined only by the court. With the case thus stated, it was proper and lawful for the court to direct the verdict." In West Virginia the practice of directing a verdict prevails. Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. 38 W. Va. 645, 24 L. R. A. 215; Overby v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 37 W. Va. 524; Woolwine v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 36 W. Va. 329. In Wisconsin it is held that a verdict should be directed in a proper case. Dryden v. Britton, 19 Wis. 23; Cutler v. Hurlbut, 29 Wis. 152.

It thus appears from a review of the cases that the practice of directing a verdict prevails in twenty-six states, with constitutional guaranties in respect of inviolability of trial by jury similar to our own. As pertinent to the present investigation, we also cite the different states in which the practice of ordering an involuntary nonsuit prevails, together with the reasons given by some of the courts why such a practice should be observed. In California, with constitutional provisions precisely similar to our own, a compulsory nonsuit may be ordered by the court. In the case of Ringgold v. Haven, 1 Cal. 115, the court said: "If, therefore, upon a given state of facts, a court would be obliged to set aside a verdict of the jury as against the evidence, we see no reason or propriety in submitting such facts to them for their consideration. When their determination will be a nullity, why compel them to deliberate? Such a course is neither creditable to the law, nor complimentary to the jury. Nor, in adopting the practice of nonsuit, is there to be apprehended any danger of encroachment upon the rights of parties, or of abridgment of the prerogatives of juries. . . . We are of the opinion, therefore, that the power of compulsory nonsuit should be upheld." In Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, the court said: "A motion for a nonsuit admits the truth of the testimony introduced, but challenges its sufficiency." Fox v. Southern Pac. Co. 95 Cal. 234; Warner v. Durrow, 91 Cal. 310; Warren v. McGill, 103 Cal. 153. In Connecticut compulsory nonsuits are allowed. In the case of Naugatuck R. Co. v. Waterbury Button Co. 24 Conn. 468, the court said, viz.: "The clause in the Constitution, which provides that the trial by jury shall remain inviolate, presents no obstacle to this legislation [authorizing nonsuits]. Its object is simply to preserve a jury trial in questions of fact, and it does not relate to questions of law with the court. The jury have nothing to do with the relevancy and materiality of evidence; or with inferences of law from facts fully established or not denied. If all the facts, claimed to be proved by the evidence of the plaintiff, cannot, if true, make a prima facie case for him, it would be worse than idle to proceed further with the trial. . . . Besides, this mode of trying a question of law had always been practiced at the common law, and was familiarly known to the men who framed our Constitution; and it is not to be believed that they meant, by this clause in the Constitution, to restrict the courts and the legislature itself, in relation to this ancient practice." 2 Thomp. Trials, § 2228. In Delaware the granting of an involuntary nonsuit is within the discretion of the court. Croasdale v. Bright, 6 Houst. (Del.) 52; Flanagan v.

Wilmington, 4 Houst. (Del.) 548. In Georgia a court can order a nonsuit. In the case of Austin v. Raiford, 68 Ga. 206, the court said: "We would not be understood as holding that, where even a prima facie case is made in behalf of the plaintiff, the court should award a nonsuit at law or dismiss a bill in equity. But if the evidence is such that, admitting all the facts proved and all reasonable deductions from them to be true, the plaintiff, on all the proof, ought not to recover, then the cause should be nonsuited or dismissed." In Iowa a nonsuit may be ordered by the trial court. Eddy v. Wilson, 1 G. Greene, 259; Murphy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 661. In Kentucky nonsuit may be ordered. Shay v. Richmond & L. Turnp. Road Co. 1 Bush, 108; Barrett v. Meek, Sneed (Ky.), 34. In Maine the court has power to order a nonsuit. Perley v. Little, 3 Me. 97; Lyon v. Sibley, 32 Me. 577; Cooper v. Waldron, 50 Me. 80. In Massachusetts an involuntary nonsuit may be ordered by the trial court. Davis v. Fall River, 155 Mass. 96; Atherton v. Brown, 14 Mass. 153. In Michigan the same practice prevails. In Carver v. Detroit & S. Pl. Road Co. 61 Mich. 592, the court said: "'There is, in every case, a preliminary question, which is one of law, viz.: whether there is any evidence on which the jury could properly find a verdict for the party on whom the onus of proof lies. If there is not the judge ought to withdraw the question from the jury, and direct a nonsuit if the onus is on the plaintiff, or direct a verdict for the plaintiff if the onus is on the defendant.' The rule above stated may be considered as that now established in the English courts." In Minnesota a nonsuit may be ordered. Potter v. Mellen, 36 Minn. 122. In Nebraska nonsuit may be ordered. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Loree, 4 Neb. 450; Missouri Valley Land Co. v. Bushnell, 11 Neb. 192; Manzy v. Hardy, 13 Neb. 37. So, also, in Nevada the same practice is allowed. Burns v. Rodefer, 15 Nev. 59; Cooper v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 7 Nev. 121. A nonsuit may be ordered in New Hampshire. Bailey v. Kimball, 26 N. H. 351; Stickney v. Stickney, 21 N. H. 61. In New York a compulsory nonsuit may be ordered by the court. In the case of Haring v. New York & E. R. Co. 13 Barb. 15, the court said: "But when upon the plaintiff's own showing, he has no cause of action, or has defeated his claim by his own misconduct, there can be no propriety in requiring the jury to pass upon the evidence. For if the jury should find a verdict against the law, the court would be bound to set it aside. . . . We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that in certain controversies between the weak and the strong—between an humble individual and a gigantic corporation, the sympathies of the human mind naturally, honestly, and generously, run to the assistance and support of the feeble, and apparently oppressed; and that compassion will sometimes exercise over the deliberations of a jury an influence which, however honorable to them as philanthropists, is wholly inconsistent with the principles of law and the ends of justice. There is, therefore, a manifest propriety in withdrawing from the consideration of the jury those cases in which the plaintiff fails to show a right of recovery." See also Pratt v. Hull, 32 L. R. A. 13 Johns. 334; Deyo v. New York C. R. Co. 34 N. Y. 9; Wilds v. Hudson River R. Co. 24 N. Y. 430. In New Jersey the court is permitted to order an involuntary nonsuit. Aycrigg v. New York & E. R. Co. 30 N. J. L. 460; Central R. Co. v. Moore, 24 N. J. L. 824. So, also, in the state of Ohio, the same practice prevails. Ellis v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. 4 Ohio St. 628, 64 Am. Dec. 610. In this case the court held, viz.: "The law of every case, in whatever form presented, belongs to the court; and it is not only the right of the judge, but a solemn duty, to decide and apply it. He must determine the legal requisites to the right of action, and the admissibility of the evidence offered to sustain it. When all the evidence offered by the plaintiff has been given, and a motion for a nonsuit is interposed, a question of law is presented, whether the evidence before the jury tends to prove all the facts involved in the right of action, and put in issue by the pleadings. . . . All that the evidence in any degree tends to prove must be received as fully proved; every fact that the evidence, and all reasonable inferences from it, conduces to establish, must be taken as fully established. . . . But where he has given no evidence to establish a fact, without which the law does not permit a recovery, he has nothing to submit to the jury; and the determination of the court that the fact constitutes an essential element in the right of action necessarily ends the case." Id. 645, 646. In Oregon a nonsuit may be ordered. Grant v. Baker, 12 Or. 329; Herbert v. Dufur, 23 Or. 462. In the case of Anderson v. North Pac. Lumber Co. it was held that, where there is no evidence to support the plaintiff's case, a nonsuit may be properly ordered. 21 Or. 281. In Pennsylvania a nonsuit may be ordered. The court held in the case of Munn v. Pittsburgh, 40 Pa. 371, viz.: "The court then was right in holding that there was no evidence sufficient in law to maintain the action, and in directing a nonsuit. The complaint that the constitutional right of trial by jury has been violated is made without due consideration. The province of a jury has always been to determine facts. What is the law applicable to those facts has always been a question for the court. In ordering the nonsuit, the court conceded all the facts which the jury could have found, and simply declared that under the law as applicable to them there was no liability on the part of the defendants." The practice in Rhode Island permits a nonsuit. Payton v. Sherburne, 15 R. I. 213. In South Carolina it is held that, whenever there is a total failure of testimony or evidence offered to a jury in support of an action, it is "the duty of the judge to order a nonsuit, because it would be a nugatory act to send such an unsupported cause to a jury. But wherever there was testimony, although of a doubtful nature, or a train of facts which were contradictory in themselves, or which admitted of different interpretations, in all such cases the court ought to send it to the jury." Brown v. Frost, 2 Bay, 131, 132, 1 Am. Dec. 633; Turnbull v. Rivers, 3 McCord, L. 131, 15 Am. Dec. 622; Davis v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 21 S. C. 101. In the last case it was said: "In fine, the rule is, where there is any competent, pertinent, and relevant testimony offered to the facts in dispute, the case passes into the hands of the jury and beyond the judge; but where no such testimony is offered, it is the province and duty of the judge to nonsuit." In Texas the same practice prevails. Foster v. Wells, 4 Tex. 101; West v. Bagby, 12 Tex. 34, 62 Am. Dec. 512. So in Wisconsin a nonsuit may be ordered. Gardinier v. Otis, 13 Wis. 461; Woodward v. McReynolds, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 244.

It thus appears from the foregoing examination that in twenty-two states the compulsory nonsuit is practiced by the courts under constitutions which provide that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate. It will be perceived, moreover, that in every state in the Union the judge is allowed to withdraw a case from the jury whenever there is a destitution of any competent, relevant, and material evidence to support the issue; and this authority is exercised either by directing a verdict, sustaining a demurrer to the evidence, or enforcing a compulsory nonsuit, as the practice may prevail in the particular state. This fact is incontestable, and is abundantly shown in the overflow of cases already cited.

But it is argued by counsel for plaintiff in error that, whatever may be the practice in other states of the Union, the adjudications of this court are against either form of practice, and necessarily so, since the Constitution of Tennessee not only secures the right of trial by jury, but further declares that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." As already seen the first clause in respect of the right of trial by jury is found in the constitutions of all the states in one form or another, but the latter clause is found in the organic law of only five states. We do not think the latter clause adds anything to the prohibition contained in the first clause. The right of trial by jury ex vi termini means that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but the settlement of all disputed facts shall be left exclusively to their province. This court, in the case of Ivey v. Hodges, 4 Humph. 155, stated that the object of this provision of our Constitution was "to put a stop to the practice of summing up as it was and is yet practiced in the courts of Great Britain," etc., "which consists in telling the jury not what was deposed to, but what was proved." In other words, the court held that, where there is a conflict in the testimony, the judge may state the testimony, but is prohibited from declaring what facts are proved. In the case of Catlett v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 57 Ark. 461, a similar provision of the Constitution of Arkansas was drawn in question as late as 1893. The court said: "This provision shears the judge of a part of his magisterial functions, but it confers no new power upon the jury. It was the jury's province, before this provision was ordained, to pass only upon questions of fact about which there was some real conflict in the testimony, or where more than one inference could reasonably be drawn from the evidence. The Constitution has not altered their province. It commands the judge to permit them to arrive at their conclusion without any suggestion from him as to his opinion about the facts. As Judge Battle expressed it in Sharp v. State, 51 Ark. 151: 'The manifest object of this prohibition was to give the parties to the trial the full benefit of the judgment of the jury, as to facts, unbiased and unaffected by the opinion of the judges.' If there is no evidence to sustain an issue of fact, the judge only declares the law when he tells the jury so. 'The legal sufficiency of proof and the moral weight of legally sufficient proof are very distinct in legal idea. The first lies within the province of the court, the last within the province of the jury.' Wheeler v. Schroeder, 4 R. I. 383."

It will be found that the practice in the five states whose constitutions embody this additional clause sanctions either the compulsory nonsuit or the right of the judge to direct a verdict; in either case confessedly a more radical procedure than the demurrer to the evidence. Thus far we have not noticed the practice in our own state, but now proceed to examine the authorities on the subject. And, in the first place, it may be conceded that the involuntary nonsuit has no foothold in our practice. The question arose in the case of Bacon v. Parker, decided by this court in 1809, and reported in 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 55. Judge Overton, speaking for the court, said: "The practice in England and this country differs on this ground. Here, as well as in North Carolina, in common cases, the court never compels a nonsuit or gives judgment to that effect, but with the consent of the party nonsuited. In England, the practice is understood to be, that the court will order a judgment of nonsuit to be entered, whenever it clearly perceives, the plaintiff fails in proving his case, supposing his evidence to be true; or where no evidence is given on his part. . . . Which is the better method is immaterial, since our practice seems to be settled." The next reported case is that of Scruggs v. Brackin, decided in 1833, and reported in 4 Yerg. 528. In that case it appeared the trial court had ordered a nonsuit. Peck, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "This is erroneous. The court had a right to judge of the admissibility of the evidence offered, and to reject it if inadmissible. But no case is recollected where our courts have tolerated the practice of ordering a nonsuit. This is sufficient to reverse the judgment." The next reported case is that of Hunter v. Sevier, 7 Yerg. 134, in which Catron, Ch. J., said: "But in this state the courts have at all times been holden not to have the power to order a nonsuit for want of proof. The plaintiff is to judge whether his case is made out, and if he sees proper to let a verdict go against him it is his oversight." So in the case of Littlejohn v. Fowler, 5 Coldw. 288, it was held that under our Constitution the plaintiff has the right to have his evidence, whether slight or full, passed upon by the jury, and that the courts have no power to order a nonsuit. These cases do not decide the question we are now investigating. For the same reason the Tennessee cases cited by counsel for plaintiff in error in respect of the right of the trial court to direct a verdict are not controlling in this case. Those cases presented controverted questions of fact material to the settlement of the issue, which belonged exclusively to the jury. Such were the cases of Kirtland v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 452; Ayres v. Moulton, 5 Coldw. 154; Robinson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Lea, 594; Gregory v. Underhill, 6 Lea, 207; Jones v. Cherokee Iron Co. 14 Lea, 157; Cantrell v. Knoxville, C. G. & L. R. Co. 90 Tenn. 638. As stated by the United States Supreme Court, the difference between compulsory nonsuit and directing a verdict "is rather a matter of form than of substance, except in the case of a nonsuit a new action may be brought, whereas in the case of a verdict the action is ended." Oscanyan v. Winchester Repeating Arms Co. 103 U. S. 264, 26 L. ed. 541. But, whatever the points of similarity or divergence, it is indisputable that neither form of practice prevails in this state. While this is true, we have at least one precedent where the practice of demurring to the evidence was recognized. It is found in the case of Bedford v. Ingram, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 155, and decided in 1818. That was an action by Ingram against John R. Bedford, administrator of Thomas Bedford, deceased, for work and labor done and materials furnished. The first seven counts in the declaration were upon an assumpsit by the intestate. The eighth count alleged that the plaintiff and the defendant administrator, after the death of Thomas Bedford, accounted together concerning divers sums of money due and owing to the plaintiff by said Thomas Bedford in his lifetime; and on the account stated, the defendant, as administrator, was found in arrears to the plaintiff, Ingram, in the sum of $1,100, and, being so indebted, he promised to pay. Nonassumpsit was pleaded to said eighth count. This court said: "In the progress of the cause, the defendant's counsel demurred to the evidence (which demurrer contains the whole of the evidence given on the part of the plaintiff), and offered to admit of record that the whole of the evidence, together with every legal and just inference thereupon, were facts in this cause, and thereupon prayed the court to allow the demurrer, and direct the adverse party to join therein; which the court refused unless the demurrant would expressly admit of record that an account had been stated between the parties. To this opinion of the court defendant excepted. The jury found that Thomas Bedford [the intestate] did assume as the plaintiff hath alleged in the first seven counts in the declaration, . . . and further say that the defendant [administrator] did assume as the plaintiff hath alleged in the eighth count [which was upon the account stated]. As to the demurrer to evidence, where either party, for instance, the defendant below, cannot prevail by showing the testimony inadmissible to have it rejected, but says that the evidence itself, though competent to be received, and though it maintain the fact which it is offered to prove, does not still in law maintain the case of the plaintiff, but is afraid the jury will misapply the law if they determine both the law and fact, and at the same time fears that they will not give a special verdict, leaving the law for the court to apply; then, by demurrer to evidence, he may cause the fact to appear as satisfactorily as if stated in a special verdict. If, therefore, the evidence demurred to be parol and circumstantial, upon which the jury may infer the fact it is offered to establish, then the demurrant must admit the fact in the same way as a special verdict would state it. Upon a special verdict the court cannot make any inference from evidence, however plain and irresistible that inference may be. So, likewise, the court cannot do so upon evidence stated in a demurrer. It will not do for the demurrant to say, 'I agree the court may infer all that the jury legally might,' for the judges cannot respond to a question of fact. . . . The demurrer to evidence being in place of a special verdict, must have the same certainty in all respects, and not leave it to the court to make inferences, which they have no more right to do in this case than in that of the special verdict, which in short they have no right to do in any case. . . . This can only be avoided by requiring the demurrant to admit the facts, the same that a jury might find, and then the court will have nothing to do but apply the law. . . . As in the present instance, the demurrant did not offer to admit any fact whatever, but only to leave it to the court to make inferences, therefore the plaintiff below ought not to have been compelled to join in the demurrer. Whether the evidence offered be conducive to the fact, in other words, whether it be competent to be received towards the establishment of the fact, the judge determines. . . . But if the evidence be received, then how far it conduces to the proof is for the jury to determine; and he that demurs must admit the fact it conduces to prove, and which a jury might infer from it; otherwise, you take from the party producing the evidence the benefit of the conclusion which the jury might make in his favor, if the cause were not taken from them. . . . Therefore the demurrant ought distinctly and unequivocally to admit in his demurrer to such circumstantial evidence that the defendant did account with the plaintiff, and promise to pay as stated in the declaration, or ought to withdraw his demurrer, and leave it to a jury to say whether the facts were so or not. The circu t court did not err in refusing to compel the plaintiff below to join, and in leaving to the jury to decide upon the evidence. We concur with the doctrine laid down in 2 H. Bl. 187." It is obvious that in this case the practice of demurring to the evidence is distinctly recognized and there is no suggestion that, when properly understood, it violates any provision of the Constitution. The real point at issue was whether there had been an account stated (insimul computassent) between the plaintiff and the administrator of Thomas Bedford, deceased, and the plaintiff relied on circumstantial evidence to establish the affirmative of that proposition. The court held that the plaintiff could not be compelled to join in the demurrer unless the demurrant would expressly admit of record that an account had been stated between the parties, since there were circumstances in proof from which the jury might fairly deduce that inference. The court expressly approved the rule laid down in the leading case of Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 187, namely: On a demurrer to circumstantial evidence the party offering the evidence is not obliged to join in the demurrer unless the party demurring will distinctly admit upon the record every fact and every conclusion which the evidence offered conduces to prove. The Lord Chief Justice Eyre, among other things, made this sententious statement of the law, namely: "My lords, in the nature of the thing, the question of law to arise out of the fact cannot arise till the fact is ascertained. It is the province of a jury to ascertain the fact under the direction and assistance of the judge," etc. "The matter of fact being confessed, the case is ripe for judgment in matter of law upon the evidence, and may then be properly withdrawn from the jury," etc. That case was an action by the holder against the acceptors of a bill of exchange, payable to a fictitious payee or order, and which, after the acceptance, had been indorsed by the drawers in the name of the fictitious payee for valuable consideration to the plaintiff. The latter exhibited evidence of a long course of dealing in similar bills between the drawers and acceptors for the purpose of raising a presumption from those circumstantial facts that the defendants at the time of accepting the bill knew the paper to be fictitious, and of then urging as matter of law that, if this presumption was established, the defendants were bound by their acceptance. To this evidence the defendants demurred, without admitting upon the record their knowledge, at the time of accepting the bill, that the payee was fictitious, and the plaintiff joined in demurrer. But it was resolved in the House of Lords, Chief Justice Eyre delivering the unanimous opinion of the judges, that, because the defendant's knowledge of the payee being a fictitious person was not expressly admitted on the record, the point of law intended to be raised by the demurrer could not arise upon the record, and, consequently, that no judgment could be given upon the demurrer. Gould, Pl. § 65.

The case at bar is not to be assimilated to the case of Gibson v. Hunter nor to the case of Bedford v. Ingram, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 155, for the reason that it does not present a case of circumstantial evidence tending to prove any particular fact fixing liability upon the company, and which must be expressly admitted upon the record. But, conceding all the facts proved by plaintiff to be true, and admitting all proper and legal inferences which may be deduced therefrom, there is no foundation whatever for any liability against the company. Both cases, however, distinctly recognized the demurrer to the evidence as an established practice of the common law. In this state the practice fell into disuse, and, so far as any reported case would indicate, remained in desuetude since Bedford v. Ingram. In the meantime the practice has been ingrafted upon the jurisprudence of other states, while the judiciary as well as the bar of this state have frequently observed the necessity of such a practice to prevent injustice in the misapplication of law by juries. As stated by Judge McKinney in Whirley v. Whiteman, 1 Head, 616: "In trials by jury the court is to decide questions of law; and the jury, questions of fact. . . . The truth of the facts and circumstances offered in evidence, in support of the allegations on the record, must be determined by the jury. But it is for the court to decide whether or not those facts and circumstances, if found by the jury to be true, are sufficient, in point of law, to maintain the allegations in the pleadings. And this must be done in one of two modes, either the court must inform the jury, hypothetically, whether or not the facts which the evidence tends to prove will, if established in the opinion of the jury, satisfy the allegations; or, the jury must find the facts specially, and then the court will apply the law, and pronounce whether or not the facts so found are sufficient to support the averments of the parties. . . . The principles of law by which the jury must be governed in finding a verdict cannot be left to their arbitrary determination. The rights of parties must be decided according to the established law of the land, as declared by the legislature, or expounded by the courts, and not according to what the jury, in their own opinion, may suppose the law is, or ought to be. Otherwise, the law would be as fluctuating and uncertain as the diverse views and opinions of different juries in regard to it." No clearer definition of the distinct provinces of court and jury is to be found in our books than in this masterpiece of Judge McKinney. In that opinion we find an express recognition of the practice of requiring a special verdict upon the facts in order that the court may make an application of the law. When it appears there is no conflict in the evidence, but the facts are all admitted, we fail to perceive what is to be submitted to the jury. And if the court may apply the law upon a special verdict settling controverted facts, why may not the court make application of the law upon facts which are undisputed, and are all admitted by the demurrer of the defendant? The Supreme Court of the United States, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Woodson, 134 U. S. 614, 33 L. ed. 1032, a case appealed from the supreme court of Tennessee, had occasion to examine the act of 1801, which provides that "not more than two new trials shall be granted to any party in any action at law, or upon the trial by a jury of an issue of fact in equity." Chief Justice Fuller, after reviewing the decisions of this court construing the statute, and also several cases defining the province of the jury in the settlement of disputed facts, said, viz.: "From these decisions it is clear that in Tennessee, as elsewhere, although the jury are the judges of the facts, yet the judge has power to set aside the verdict when, in his judgment, it is against the weight of the evidence, but that that supervisory power cannot be exercised under the statute when the triers of the facts have three times determined them the same way. This manifestly refers to a state of case where, in the opinion of the judge, the verdict should have been otherwise than as rendered, because of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain it, but not to a case where there is no evidence at all, . . . while, on the other hand, the case should be left to the jury, unless the conclusion follows, as matter of law, that no recovery can be had upon any view which can be properly taken of the facts the evidence tends to establish. . . . In such case the practice of a demurrer to the evidence can be resorted to, or a motion to exclude the evidence from the jury, or to instruct them that the plaintiff cannot recover, which motions are in the nature of demurrers to evidence, though less technical, and have in many of the states superseded the ancient practice of a demurrer to evidence. . . . Such a motion, like the demurrer to evidence, admits not only what the testimony proves, but what it tends to prove. The ultimate facts, in other words, are admitted. In Bacon v. Parker, 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 57, it was decided that an involuntary nonsuit could not be entered, but a demurrer to evidence was allowed in Bedford v. Ingram, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.), 155, and it must be that, as the duty devolves upon the judge to declare the law, he may be requested, in some form, to advise the jury that the plaintiff cannot recover when that is the conclusion of law arising upon the record, and should do so though not specifically directed. It is true that it was held in Kirtland v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 452, that it was error for the trial judge to assume to answer both the questions of law and the questions of fact involved in that case, which was one, however, in which there was evidence raising questions of fact to be determined; and in Ayres v. Moulton, 5 Coldw. 154, it was held error in the circuit judge to charge the jury that from the facts as proved the plaintiffs were 'entitled to recover of the defendant the sum sued for,' because 'the facts to be deduced from the evidence must be left exclusively to the jury.' But that also was a case where it evidently did not follow from the ultimate facts that the plaintiffs were entitled as matter of law to recover as stated. To the same effect is Case v. Williams, 2 Coldw. 239, where it was ruled that, if the charge of the trial judge be equivalent to a determination of the facts involved, a new trial would be granted.' This is and must be so, whenever there are deductions of fact to be drawn by the jury, but where that is not the case, although a direct instruction to return a verdict for the defendant may not be in accordance with the practice in Tennessee, yet the decision showed that the question whether a recovery can be had at all, or not, can be presented in some appropriate form in that state." See also East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Mahoney, 89 Tenn. 332.

We hold that an appropriate form for determining whether, as a matter of law, any recovery can be had or liability fixed against the defendant upon facts which are not disputed, is by demurring to the evidence. This form of practice is expressly sanctioned by an adjudication of this court which has never been overruled, though it may be conceded that the practice is cumbersome and antiquated. In the nature of things, it can seldom be successfully invoked, for the reason that if, upon any rational or legitimate view of the evidence, a prima facie case is made out, "or if the testimony be doubtful, or the trend of facts contradictory in themselves, or admit of different interpretations by fair-minded men," the case must be submitted to the jury. Moreover, the practice is attended with the danger that, if unsuccessful, the prevailing party is entitled to final judgment, and an immediate assessment of his damages. 2 Elliott, Gen. Pr. §§ 865–870. In the present record we are confronted with a perfectly plain case, in which no liability is established against the defendant upon the facts, or upon any reasonable or legitimate inference that may be made upon such facts. The law of every case, in whatever form presented, belongs to the court. It is not only the prerogative of the judge, but a solemn duty to declare it. The defendant in this case is entitled to the judgment of the law upon the undisputed facts found in the record. Our duty is imperative, and, being of opinion that in no view of the facts shown in evidence is any liability made out against the defendant company, we affirm the judgment of the Circuit Court.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Sarah KNISLEY, Respt.,
v.
Pascal P. PRATT et al., Appts.

(148 N. Y. 372.)

1. The assumption of the obvious risks of unguarded cog-wheels by an employee, who thus waives the protection of a statute requiring them to be guarded, is not in contravention of public policy.

2. Disregard of the statutory duty properly to guard the cog-wheels of a machine, which is imposed by Laws 1890, chap. 395, p. 756, § 12, does not render an employer liable to an employee whose hand was caught in such wheels where the risk was obvious and was assumed by engaging in the work.

(February 18, 1896.)

NOTE.—As to the effect of a disregard of statutory duty upon the doctrine of contributory negligence, see also note to Sowles v. Moore (Vt.) 21 L. R. A. 723.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, granting a new trial after the entry of a nonsuit at the Erie County Circuit in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John G. Milburn, for appellant:

The risk in cleaning the machine with the cog-wheels unguarded, as they were during the entire period of her service, was obvious and known to the plaintiff, and was therefore assumed by her.

v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 116 N. Y. 628; Crown v. Orr, 140 N. Y. 450.

As this act merely provides that cog-wheels shall be guarded, it does not, in the absence of provisions having that effect, abrogate the rule that if the employee knows they are unguarded and appreciates the risk he cannot call upon his employer for personal indemnity in case of resulting injury.

Willy v. Mulleady, 78 N. Y 310, 34 Am. Rep. 536; Freeman v. Glens Falls Paper Mill Co. 70 Hun, 530, Affirmed 142 N. Y. 639; White v. Wittemann Lithographic Co. 131 N. R. 7 Exch. 130; Caswell v. Worth, 5 El. & Bl. 855; McRickard v. Flint, 114 N. Y. 222.

Mr. H. C. Day, for respondent:

A master is bound to use all reasonable care, diligence, and caution in providing for the safety of those in his employ, and to furnish for their use in his work, safe, sound, and suitable tools, implements, appliances, and machinery in the prosecution thereof, and keep the same in repair.

Benzing v. Steinway & Sons, 101 N. Y. 547; McGovern v. Central Vermont R. Co. 123 N. Y. 280; Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 493, 12 L. R. A. 454.

A master employing a servant owes to him a duty while in such employ to "use reasonable care, diligence, and caution in providing for his safety, and furnish for his use, in his work, safe, sound, and suitable tools, implements, appliances, and machinery in the prosecution thereof, and keep the same in repair."

The servant, upon entering the master's employ, assumes and consents to assume only the ordinary risks incident to the service.

Employers or masters cannot avail themselves of this assent, unless they take reasonable precaution to insure the servant's safety while in the performance of his duties.

The master can claim no exemption from liability for injuries sustained by a servant, when such injuries are traced to the employers' failure to take such precautions for the servant's safety as are enumerated in the first above principle.

The master can gain no exemptions for liability to his servant by reason of his long delay and neglect in performing a positive legal duty resting upon him.

Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra.

The failure to perform a duty imposed by statute, when, as the consequence, an injury results to another, is evidence upon the question of negligence of the party charged with such failure.

McRickard v. Flint, 114 N. Y. 222; McLaughlin v. Armfield, 58 Hun, 376; Koster v. Noonan, 8 Daly, 233; Pauley v. Steam Gauge & L. Co. 131 N. Y. 90, 15 L. R. A. 194; White v. Wittemann Lithographic Co. 131 N. Y. 631.

A servant cannot contract to relieve the master from liability for an injury inflicted by his own negligence.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff seeks to recover damages for loss of her left arm, caused by the alleged negligence of the defendants, who were the proprietors of a hardware factory, where plaintiff was employed at the time of the accident in operating what is known as a "punching machine." A person using this machine is seated at a bench, the top of which is about 32 inches from the floor and covered with plank about 5 inches in thickness. The machine is about 22 inches wide and 4 feet high, with an iron bed plate bolted to the bench. Two iron posts 4 feet high, connected at the top by an iron crosspiece, make a substantial frame for the machine. Near the top is a shaft, passing through the posts, on one end of which is a drum and belt connecting with shafting; on the other end are a small cogwheel, about 7 inches in diameter, running close to the frame, and outside of it, and a large fly wheel. Immediately under this shaft is another shaft, having a cogwheel about 2 feet in diameter, which is operated from the cogwheel on the upper shaft. In the center of the lower shaft is an iron rod, to which is attached a punch, arranged on an eccentric so that the revolution of the shaft causes the punch to lift and lower sixty times per minute. There was no shifter to throw off the belt so as to stop the machine, and the cogwheels were unguarded. The plaintiff, the machine being in motion, was engaged in cleaning it, which consisted in rubbing the dirt and oil off the punch and uprights with a piece of waste, held in her left hand; and in some way her hand was caught between the cogwheels, causing such injuries to it and the arm as to necessitate amputation of the latter near the shoulder. Plaintiff, being of full age, entered the employ of defendants in May or June, 1890, and the accident happened September 24, 1891. She testified that she worked, off and on, about three months on these punching machines prior to the accident, sometimes an hour, sometimes half a day, at a time, as required; that up to the time of the accident she had worked twelve different times, on different days, upon one of the punching machines, and had cleaned it about seven or eight times. It is insisted, on behalf of the plaintiff that, even if, under the admitted facts, she would by the rules of the common law be deemed to have assumed, not only the ordinary, but the obvious, risks of the business, yet the provisions of the statute commonly known as the "factory act" would enable her to recover. Laws 1890, p. 753, chap. 398, amending Laws 1886, chap. 409, entitled, "An Act to Regulate the Employment of Women and Children in Manufacturing Establishments and to Provide for Inspectors to Enforce the Same." The complaint makes no reference to the statute, but charges the defendants in the usual way with neglect to provide safe and suitable machinery and a safe and proper place in which to work. The statute was referred to at the trial in the general term, and on the argument before this court. We shall therefore consider this case as presenting the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover by reason of this statute, even if, under the principles of the common law, as applied to the facts, she had assumed the obvious risks of the employment.

The statute (Laws 1890, p. 756, chap. 398, § 12) provides that it shall be the duty of the owner of any manufacturing establishment to furnish, in the discretion of the factory inspector, belt shifters, for the purpose of throwing on or off belts or pulleys. It also provides absolutely that cogs shall be properly guarded. The belt shifter is out of this case, as no effort was made to prove that the inspector had ordered it to be placed on the machine which injured the plaintiff, and that the owner had failed to obey. It is admitted that the cogwheels were unguarded on this machine. The plaintiff was injured by reason of that condition of the cogwheels, and it appears that a piece of sheet iron, put in between the upright and the gear wheels, would have protected the hand of the operative while cleaning the machine when in motion. It was not unlawful to permit plaintiff to clean the machine when in motion, as the statute provides that "no female, under the age of twenty-one years, . . . shall be allowed to clean machinery when in motion." Laws 1890, p. 756, chap. 398, § 12. The plaintiff was over twenty-one years of age. The defendants are chargeable, therefore, with one omission only under the statute, viz., a failure to properly guard the cogwheels of the punching machine. In order to sustain the judgment in favor of plaintiff, it is necessary to hold that, where the statute imposes a duty upon the employer the performance of which will afford greater protection to the employee it is not possible for the latter to waive the protection of the statute, under the common-law doctrine of obvious risks. We regard this as a new and startling doctrine, calculated to establish a measure of liability unknown to the common law, and which is contrary to the decisions of Massachusetts and England under similar statutes. It should be remarked at the outset that the factory act in this state does not, in terms, give a cause of action to one suffering an injury by reason of the failure of the employer to discharge his duty thereunder. An action for such injury is the ordinary common-law action for negligence, and subject to the rules of the common law. Caswell v. Worth, 5 El. & Bl. 855. The principle contended for seems to rest, if it can be maintained at all, upon a question of public policy. The factory act, it is said, is passed to regulate the employment of women and children, and imposes upon the employer certain duties, and subjects him to specified penalties in case of default; that a sound public policy requires the rigid enforcement of this act, and it would contravene that policy to permit an employee, by implied contract or promise, to waive the protection of the statute. We think this proposition is essentially unsound, and proceeds upon theories that cannot be maintained. It is difficult to perceive any difference in the quality and character of a cause of action,—whether it has its origin in the ancient principles of the common law, in the formulated rules of modern decisions, or in the declared will of the legislature. Public policy in each case requires its rigid enforcement, and it was never urged in the common-law action for negligence that the rule requiring the employee to assume the obvious risks of the business was in contravention of that policy. It is possible that the statute imposes upon the employer duties under which he did not rest at common law.

It may be asked, if the doctrine of obvious risks is applied to the statute, under what circumstances could the employee sue? It is well settled that the risks of the service a servant assumes in entering the employment of a master are those only which occur after the due performance by the employer of those duties which the law enjoins upon him. Benzing v. Steinway & Sons, 101 N. Y. 552; McGovern v. Central Vermont R. Co. 123 N. Y. 280. The rule as to the risks of the service, or ordinary risks, is entirely distinct from the rule of obvious risks, and if the statute has added to the duties which the law enjoins upon the employer before the servant can be subjected to the rule of ordinary risks, then the default of the employer in the discharge of this statutory duty, resulting in injury to the employee, would enable the latter to sue. Such a construction of the statute would not in any way limit the doctrine of obvious risks. This court has frequently recognized the general rule that, whenever one owes another a duty, whether such duty be imposed by voluntary contract or by statute, a breach of this duty, causing damage, gives a cause of action. In Willy v. Mulledy, 78 N. Y. 314, 34 Am. Rep. 536, a recovery was permitted against a landlord who had failed to provide proper fire escapes, as required by the charter of the city of Brooklyn. In Pauley v. Steam Gauge & L. Co. 131 N. Y. 95, 15 L. R. A. 194, it was suggested, for a failure of duty on the part of an employer under the factory act, that, in addition to the public remedy for the enforcement of penalties, the injured employee had his action for damages. We come, then, to the rule of the assumption of obvious risks, and it may well be doubted whether it can be said to rest wholly upon the implied agreement of the employee. The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in O'Maley v. South Boston Gaslight Co. 158 Mass. 135, uses this language: "The doctrine of assumption of the risk of his employment by an employee has usually been considered from the point of view of a contract, express or implied; but as applied to actions of tort for negligence against an employer, it leads up to the broader principle expressed by the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria. One who, knowing and appreciating a danger voluntarily assumes the risk of it, has no just cause of complaint against another who is primarily responsible for the existence of the danger. As between the two, his voluntary assumption of the risk absolves the other from any particular duty to him in that respect, and leaves each to take such chances as exist in the situation, without a right to claim anything from the other. In such a case, there is no actionable negligence on the part of him who is primarily responsible for the danger."

Where the obvious risks of the business result in injury, the inability of the employee to sue is due to the fact that he voluntarily assumed those risks, not necessarily under an implied contract to do so, but by an independent act of waiver, evidenced by his entering the employment with a full knowledge of all the facts. This distinction is not, however, of great importance, in the view we take of the statute, and its effect upon the rights of the parties. We are of opinion that there is no reason in principle or authority why an employee should not be allowed to assume the obvious risks of the business, as well under the factory act as otherwise. There is no rule of public policy which prevents an employee from deciding whether, in view of increased wages, the difficulties of obtaining employment, or other sufficient reasons, it may not be wise and prudent to accept employment subject to the rule of obvious risks. The statute does, indeed, contemplate the protection of a certain class of laborers, but it does not deprive them of their free agency and the right to manage their own affairs. In Massachusetts they have a statute called the "Employers' Liability Act" (Stat. 1887, chap. 270). It provides for a civil remedy at the suit of the injured party, in express terms. In the case of O'Maley v. South Boston Gaslight Co. supra, which was brought under this statute to recover damages for injuries received by the plaintiff, who, while wheeling coal in a barrow on a run in one of defendant's coal sheds, fell off and was injured, it was held that it was a defense to the action to show that plaintiff, when he entered upon the employment, knew and fully appreciated the danger to which he was to be exposed. A few extracts from the opinion will show how the statute has been construed in Massachusetts. The learned judge says: "If the action were at common law, it would be too plain for argument that the plaintiff took the risk of such accidents as that which happened; . . . but it is contended that, under the statute referred to, the rule is different. . . . The statute does not attempt to take away the right of the parties to make such contracts as they choose, which will establish their respective rights and duties. . . . It would be unreasonable to attempt to require every one hiring laborers to have the safest place and the best machinery possible for carrying on his business. It would be an unwarranted construction of the statute, which would tend to defeat its object, to hold that laborers are no longer permitted to contract to take the risk of working where there are peculiar dangers from the arrangement of the place and from the kind or quality of the machinery used. Nothing but the plainest expression of intention on the part of the legislature would warrant giving the statute such an interpretation. We have no doubt that one may expressly contract to take the obvious risks of danger from inferior or defective machinery, as well since the enactment of this statute as before." Goodridge v. Washington Mills Co. 160 Mass. 234, was another case under the same statute, and involved, as does the case at bar, uncovered or unguarded gears. It was held plaintiff could not recover. The case of Britton v. Great Western Cotton Co. L. R. 7 Exch. 130, involved the construction of the English act, 7 Vict. chap. 15, which imposed on the defendant the unqualified duty to fence the fly wheel connected with the steam engine or other motive power. This duty it failed to perform, and plaintiff's intestate, on the sixth morning of his employment, undertook to grease the bearings between the fly and spur wheels, was caught by the fly wheel, and killed. The plaintiff recovered, on the ground that the dangerous character of the employment was not so obvious that deceased must necessarily have been taken to have known it. It is clear, from the language of the court, that the doctrine of obvious risks would have been applied had the facts warranted it. Bramwell, B., said (page 138): "They are in default to begin with, and the mere circumstance that the deceased entered on a dangerous employment does not exonerate them, unless he knew the nature of the risk to which, in consequence of that default, he was exposed." Pigott, B., said: "I do not think we can safely say that he must have known the risk he was running The place was, no doubt, a dangerous place, but he may very well have been ignorant of the real nature of the risk."

The facts in the case at bar, whether it be considered as an action for negligence at common law or under the statute, show conclusively that the plaintiff assumed the obvious risk of working on the machine in operating which she was injured. It is impossible not to feel great sympathy for this unfortunate plaintiff, who has been maimed for life, but her recovery is barred by legal principles that are salutary and proper in the general administration of justice.

The order of the General Term should be reversed, and judgment ordered for defendants against plaintiff, on nonsuit, with costs.

(149 N. Y. 447.)

A recorded quitclaim deed "of certain real property and appurtenances and all the grantor's estate, right, title, and interest therein" is a "conveyance" within the meaning of the recording laws, under which the grantee may be protected as a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration against a prior unrecorded deed.

NOTE.—For note as to the effect of a quitclaim deed in an otherwise perfect record title, see Parker v. Randolph (S. D.) 29 L. R. A. 33.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, in favor of plaintiffs in a controversy submitted without action to determine the right to the specific performance of a contract to purchase real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Gray, J.:

This was a submission of a controversy on an agreed statement of facts, pursuant to § 1279 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiffs had agreed to sell and convey to the defendant certain premises in Westchester county, and the defendant refused to complete the contract for the purchase on his part upon the ground that the plaintiffs had not a good title. The premises were originally owned by Cornelius H. Tallman, who acquired them in 1864 and whose title is conceded to have been good. Later in the same year Tallman conveyed them to Page, by a warranty deed with full covenants, but which was not recorded until in February, 1893. In 1889 Tallman conveyed the same premises to Louisa A. Penfield, by quitclaim deed, which was recorded a few days after its date. A few days later, in the same year, Louisa A. Penfield conveyed the premises to these plaintiffs by warranty deed with full covenants, for the consideration of $1,000. At the time of the conveyance to the plaintiffs they had no notice that Tallman had conveyed the premises to Page, as above mentioned. The consideration expressed in the quitclaim deed from Tallman to Penfield was $125, and the conveyance was made subject to unpaid taxes and sales for the same. The language of the quitclaim deed was as follows: "Have remised, released, and quitclaimed, and by these presents do remise, release, and quitclaim, unto the said party of the second part, and to her heirs and assigns forever"—(then follows a full description of the property)—"together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof, and also all the estate, right, title, and interest, dower and right of dower, property, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever, as well in law as in equity, of the said parties of the first part, of, in, and to the above-described premises, and every part and parcel thereof, with the appurtenances. To have and to hold all and singular the above-mentioned and described premises, together with the appurtenances under the said party of the second part, her heirs and assigns forever." The general term held the title of the plaintiffs to be valid and required the defendant to complete his purchase.

The question about which the parties are in dispute is whether Louisa A. Penfield, as a purchaser of the premises by a quitclaim deed, is to be deemed a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, and, as such, to be within the protection accorded by that portion of the Revised Statutes of this state which is commonly known as the recording act. 1 Rev. Stat. 756, § 1.

Mr. Frank A. Bennett, for appellant:

A purchaser under a simple deed of quitclaim is not to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration.

An unrecorded deed as between parties is valid and a grantee under a quitclaim deed has no better right to the possession of the property than his grantor had.

Ridgeway v. Holliday, supra.

A quitclaim deed only purports to release and quitclaim whatever interest the grantor may then have in the premises. If he had none in esse at its delivery, nothing passes and the recording act will not give an instrument greater force or larger meaning than that expressed by the words of the recorded instrument.

Hetzel v. Barber, 69 N. Y. 1.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I think there can be no doubt as to the correctness of the general term judgment. While there seems to have been no decision by this court upon precisely such a case as is here presented, nevertheless, there are decisions to the effect that deeds which "remise, release, and quitclaim" are operative as a conveyance of land by way of bargain and sale. Such are, for instance, the cases of Lynch v. Livingston, 6 N. Y. 434, and Striker v. Mott, 28 N. Y. 92, which rested upon the authority of the early case of Jackson, Salisbury, v. Fish, 10 Johns. 456. This latter case did away with the strictness in which a release or quitclaim had been sometimes regarded. In Sparrow v. Kingman, 1 N. Y. 242, it was assumed in the opinion that an ordinary quitclaim deed might be used to pass the fee to an estate; so that whatever the interest or estate of the grantor whether that of tenant for life or years or a fee, it would pass by such a conveyance. But the provisions of the Revised Statutes should make the matter perfectly clear. "Deeds of bargain and sale and of lease and release may continue to be used and shall be deemed grants; and, as such, shall be subject to all the provisions of this chapter concerning grants." 1 Rev. Stat. 739, § 142. The requirement of the recording act (1 Rev. Stat. 756, § 1) is that every conveyance of real estate shall be recorded in the office of the clerk of the county where it is situated, and if not so recorded it shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance shall be first duly recorded. Section 38 of the chapter prescribes that "the term 'conveyance,' as used in this chapter, shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing, by which any estate, or interest in real estate, is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned; or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or in equity." The elasticity of the term "conveyance" thus appears to be quite sufficient to comprehend a grant by way of quitclaim, or of bargain and sale.

The argument for the defendant is that the unrecorded deed from Tallman to Page was a valid conveyance, and that Penfield, as grantee under Tallman's quitclaim deed, has no better right to the possession of the property than her grantor had, and as he had none at the time of the delivery of the quitclaim deed there was nothing for it to grant. I fail to see the relevancy or importance of the argument, when considering the purpose and scope of the recording statute, which is designed, obviously, to afford protection to purchasers, in good faith and without notice, from those having an apparent title to land. In the cases in the United States Supreme Court, of May v. Le Claire, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 217, 232, 20 L. ed. 50, 53, and Villa v. Rodriguez, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 323, 338, 20 L. ed. 406, 410, it was, indeed, suggested that one who acquires his title by quitclaim deed cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice, and that, as the conveyance by such a deed would pass the title as the grantor held it, the grantee would take only what the grantor could lawfully convey. The expression of such an opinion in those cases was unnecessary for their decision, and nothing was, in fact, decided against the competency of quitclaim deeds to convey interests in lands. They were based on the case of Oliver v. Piatt, 44 U. S. 3 How. 333, 11 L. ed. 622, but that case did not go to any further extent with reference to the question of the validity of a quitclaim deed as a conveyance than to point it out, in connection with other facts in the case, tending to show notice, as a significant circumstance. Mr. Rawle, in his work on Covenants, 4th ed. p. 35, justly criticises Oliver v. Piatt, and observes, in answer to the suggestion in the decision, that a deed with general warranty might as well be regarded as a "significant circumstance;" for, unless there had been something wrong about the title, the purchaser would not have demanded a general covenant, and he must have intended to rely upon it for his protection. These cases, and others in the state courts, to which the appellant refers, and which I have examined, not because they can be authoritative, but for the purpose of investigation, do not go quite so far as the appellant would have us believe, except in the one case of Marshall v. Roberts, 18 Minn. 405, where a contrary view of the question seems to have been taken The supreme court of Iowa, while holding that a quitclaim deed would not protect a purchaser from one whose title was tainted by fraud, seems to have held, under the recording statutes in that state, that a purchaser acquiring title by quitclaim takes precedence of one holding under a prior but unrecorded deed, of which he had no notice. Springer v. Bartle, 46 Iowa, 688; Pettingill v. Devin, 35 Iowa, 344. In the Texas case of Thorn v. Newsom, 64 Tex. 161, 53 Am. Rep. 747, the question appears to have been raised, but it was left undetermined. The distinction, however, was made there between a contract calling for the sale of the vendor's interest in the land, or, as it is termed, "chance of title," and one calling for a conveyance of the land as distinguished from a release of the vendor's rights. The intimation from the decision is that if there was a conveyance intended the bona fide purchaser would be protected. In the Missouri case of Ridgeway v. Holliday, 59 Mo. 444, the title of the holder by quitclaim deed from the holder of the record title was actually affected, because of his having notice of facts respecting the title of the true owner of the land.

On the other hand, there are many decisions by the state courts to the effect that the holder of the quitclaim deed is entitled to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser and to be protected against a prior, but subsequently recorded, deed. Brown v. Banner Coal & Coal Oil Co. 97 Ill. 214, 37 Am. Rep. 105; Chapman v. Sims, 53 Miss. 154; Cutler v. James, 64 Wis. 173, 54 Am. Rep. 603; Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 410; Graff v. Middleton, 43 Cal. 341; Willingham v. Hardin, 75 Mo. 429. The recording statutes in these different states are very similar to, if not substantially the same as, the New York statute; and the effect of the decisions is to make a deed of real estate by quitclaim as operative to transfer title as would be a deed of bargain and sale, and to hold that the prior recording of such a deed would give it a preference over one previously executed and delivered, but which was subsequently recorded.

The practice of transferring title to real estate through quitclaim deeds has not been uncommon in this state, and, in the absence of any facts creating a suspicion as to the transaction of transfer, there is nothing especially significant in the use of such a mode of conveyance. The point is, What is effected by the deed? and where, as in the present case, the subject of the release and quitclaim is a certain particularly described property with all the appurtenances and all the estate, right, title, and interest of the grantor, with the "habendum" to the grantee, her heirs and assigns forever, a conveyance of the real estate within the meaning of the act, is evident. The terms of such a deed imply that Tallman professed to have an interest in the premises, which he could convey, and it is the duty of the court to so construe a deed, purporting to convey land for a valuable consideration, as to give effect to the intentions of the parties, and to hold it to be a conveyance of the land.

I think the judgment of the General Term should be affirmed, with costs.

John CUNNINGHAM, Appt.,
v.
William B. DAVENPORT, Public Admr., etc., Respt.

(147 N. Y. 43.)

A trust by a deposit in a savings bank of one's own money to his own credit, merely naming himself as trustee for another, is not established when the depositor states that he never intended to create a trust, and has always retained possession of the bank book, without making any disclosure or publication of the trust, or informing the proposed beneficiary of the transaction.

(October 8, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order and judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a portion of a judgment of a special term for Kings County establishing the right of defendant as administrator of Patrick Cunningham, deceased, to a sum of money which plaintiff had deposited in a savings bank in trust for decedent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Stewart Ross, for appellant:

The judgment clearly cannot be sustained upon the theory of a gift, for all the elements of a perfected gift are wanting.

Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 430, 36 Am. Rep. 634; Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N. Y. 421, 6 L. R. A. 403.

Nor can the judgment be sustained upon the theory of a trust.

Beaver v. Beaver, supra; Hamer v. Sidway, 124 N. Y. 550, 12 L. R. A. 463.

The judgment is in face of an affirmative finding of no such intent. Such judgment cannot be sustained.

Conselyea v. Blanchard, 103 N. Y. 231; Weber v. Weber, 9 Daly, 211, 58 How. Pr. 256; Clark v. Clark, 108 Mass. 522; Alger v. North End

NOTE.—Effect of depositing money in bank in trust for third person.

The circumstances attending the deposit may be such as to effect a perfected trust in favor of the third person. In such case there can be no question that the title to the funds will pass to him. In case the depositor's acts are equivocal the rule seems to be to seek his intention and let the intention govern. Upon the question as to what is sufficient to show a completed trust there is some conflict among the authorities. Some courts hold that there can be no completed trust without communicating knowledge of it to the beneficiary, while others hold communication unnecessary. But even in cases which might, in the absence of proof of intention, be held to be completed trusts the intention may control, as is shown by CUNNINGHAM v. DAVENPORT.

What sufficient to show trust generally.

There is one line of cases which holds that to perfect the trust knowledge of the deposit must be communicated to the beneficiary. And that the mere deposit without more is without effect.

Money deposited in trust for a third person will not pass to him if he has no knowledge of the deposit until after the death of the depositor where the by-laws of the bank provided that the money should not be withdrawn without presentation of the pass book. Stone v. Bishop, 4 Cliff. 593.

If the beneficiary does not know of the trust it will not be enforceable. Jewett v. Shattuck, 124 Mass. 590.

If the beneficiary never has possession of the pass book and a by-law of the bank provides that no one should receive a deposit without producing the pass book, there is no completed transfer of the money. Clark v. Clark, 108 Mass. 522.

A mere deposit by a husband of money in the bank as trustee for his wife is not sufficient to pass the title to her. Walker v. Welch (Mass.) 4 New Eng. Rep. 354.

A fund deposited in a savings bank in the name of the depositor in trust for another who is neither party nor privy to the transfer, the depositor retaining the title and control of the fund, is held by an executory trust which is not enforceable. Bartlett v. Remington, 59 N. H. 364.

But under that rule communication of knowledge of the deposit to the beneficiary may be sufficient to perfect the trust.

If the deposit is made and notice of it is given to the beneficiary it cannot be subsequently revoked by the depositor withdrawing the money from the bank. Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512.

Where the depositor took one of her nieces to the bank and had three accounts opened, one for each of her three nieces, and had them sign the book, adding her name as trustee, with the restriction that during her lifetime she alone could draw the money, and then took and kept the books until her death, it was held that there was a valid gift to the nieces, they having accepted the benefit during her life. Miller v. Clark, 60 Conn. 148, note, 40 Fed. Rep. 15.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff appealed from the judgment of the general term, second department, which affirmed that part of the judgment of the special term adjudging that William B. Davenport, public administrator, as administrator of the goods, etc., of Patrick Cunningham, deceased, recover of the plaintiff a judgment for $2,830.15.

This case presented questions between other parties that were determined by the judgment of the special term in plaintiff's favor, and as to which no appeal is taken. In order to properly understand that portion of the special term judgment appealed from it is only necessary to examine a few of the facts as found.

It appears that the plaintiff, on the 2d day of July, 1869, opened an account in the Bowery Savings Bank in the city of New York by a deposit of his own money, and made other like deposits down to about the year 1881, when the account was transferred, at plaintiff's request, to a new account entered on the books of the bank to the credit of "John Cunningham, in trust for Patrick Cunningham, his brother," and so remained until the 17th day of April, 1890, when plaintiff surrendered to the bank his deposit book and had the account transferred to his own credit, and on the 6th or 7th of June, following it, and a statement to the other that he has made the deposit which will belong to the other after the death of the depositor, constitute a deposit in trust although the depositor retained the deposit book until his death. Re Atkinson, 16 R. I. 413, 3 L. R. A. 392.

If the book is given to the cestui que trust after the money is deposited the trust will be complete although it is returned to the depositor and retained by him until his death. Ray v. Simmons, 11 R. I. 266, 23 Am. Rep. 447.

Another line of cases holds the deposit to be sufficient of itself to vest the title in the beneficiary.

The deposit of money as trustee for a third person will pass the title to him although he is not notified of the fact. Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446, citing the unreported case of Kelly v. Manhattan Inst. for Sav.; Re Collyer's Account, 4 Dem. 24; Willis v. Smyth, 91 N. Y. 297; Mabie v. Bailey, 95 N. Y. 207; Re Walker's Will, 45 N. Y. S. R. 21; Connecticut River Sav. Bank v. Albee, 64 Vt. 571.

A trust is complete and irrevocable where a person makes a deposit of money in a bank to the credit of himself as trustee for certain children named, and nothing remains in him but the mere naked legal title. Sayre v. Weil, 94 Ala. 466, 15 L. R. A. 544.

Where, by a direction of a depositor, a sum was carried to an account in the joint names of herself as trustee for a third person and such third person, there was a complete trust in favor of the third person which he could enforce against the executor of the depositor. Wheatley v. Purr, 1 Keen, 551.

The trust is valid although the beneficiary did not know of it until after the death of the trustee. Macy v. Williams, 83 Hun, 243.

A savings bank book showing a deposit in account with one person for another after the death of both gives the representative of the latter a right to the money. Fowler v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 113 N. Y. 450, 4 L. R. A. 145

A deposit in trust for a third person will raise the presumption that the money was that of the third person. Millspaugh v. Putnam, 16 Abb. Pr. 380.

If a person deposits money to the credit of himself as trustee for another, and the account so remains until his death, prima facie the money belongs to the beneficiary although he has not obtained possession of the pass book. Re Gaffney's Estate, 146 Pa. 49.

Effect of making third person trustee.

In case the owner of money places it in bank in the name of another person in trust for a third the latter will have a right to it as against the trustee. Petty v. Petty, 17 Jur. 646, 22 L. J. Ch. 1065.

Where deposit is made for a purpose other than to pass title.

Where the statute forbids the receiving of an account above a specified amount, and a person whose account has reached that amount makes a further deposit as trustee for another, if it appears that the intention was to evade the act and not to create a trust there will be no interest in the cestui que trust. Field v. Lonsdale, 13 Beav. 78, 19 L. J. Ch. N. S. 560, 14 Jur. 995.

If the money is deposited in trust because the depositor has reached the limit of his possible deposit in his own name evidence of that fact may be given for the purpose of defeating the claim of the beneficiaries, although the by-laws of the bank provide that the depositor may at the time of making the deposit designate for whose benefit it was made.

1890, withdrew all of the money, amounting to $2,322.54.

It further appears that the plaintiff always retained possession of the bank books representing these accounts; that there is no evidence that plaintiff ever informed Patrick Cunningham of the transfer of the account to the credit of plaintiff in trust for him; that there is no evidence that plaintiff ever received any moneys from Patrick Cunningham, and plaintiff claims never to have intended to give the money contained in the account to Patrick Cunningham, or to have ever intended it for his benefit.

It also appears that Patrick Cunningham, the alleged beneficiary, died April 14, 1890, three days before the account in the Bowery Savings Bank was changed back into the name of plaintiff individually.

The question now presented is whether, under the facts as stated, the plaintiff created a trust in favor of his brother, Patrick Cunningham, when he opened the alleged trust account in 1881, which he could not afterwards revoke.

It is insisted by the learned counsel for the respondent that this is no longer an open question in this court, and that plaintiff's action in 1881 created an irrevocable trust in favor of Patrick Cunningham, and that the administrator of the latter can recover of plaintiff the money he withdrew from the Bowery Savings Bank, with interest and costs.

We are of the opinion that this case is distinguishable from the cases in this court to which we have been referred, and that the recovery against plaintiff by the administrator of Patrick Cunningham's estate cannot be sustained.

The first case is Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446. The account was here opened: "The Citizens' Savings Bank in account with Susan Boone, in trust for Lillie Willard."

The depositor opened this account in 1866 and retained possession of the bank book until her death in 1875.

A like account was opened at the same time in trust for Kate Willard, a sister of the other beneficiary.

Neither beneficiary was informed of the account.

The court held that such a transaction unexplained and followed by the death of the depositor with the accounts still existing, created a valid trust.

The case of Willis v. Smyth, 91 N. Y. 297, was quite similar in its facts to Martin v. Funk, and the latter case was held to be a controlling authority.

In the case of Mabie v. Bailey, 95 N. Y. 206, the deposit was the same in form as in Martin v. Funk, but the intention of the depositor was not left to inference, it being shown that the pass book had been exhibited to plaintiff's mother and was matter of conversation on several subsequent occasions.

Judge Andrews, after calling attention to this proof, also pointed out that Martin v. Funk left undecided the point whether, in respect to such a transaction, surrounding circumstances may not be shown to vary or explain the apparent character of the acts and the intent with which they were done, and he then adds: "If it was now necessary to decide that point, I should incline to the opinion that the character of such a transaction, as creating a trust, is not con-

Brabrook v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 104 Mass. 228, 6 Am. Rep. 222.

The mere fact of the deposit of money as trustee for another is not of itself sufficient to establish the trust, and evidence is admissible to show that the depositor had reached the limit of his possible deposit, for the purpose of explaining the form of the deposit. Parkman v. Suffolk Sav. Bank, 151 Mass. 218.

Money transferred to the name of trustees for beneficiaries of the depositor under his direction for the purpose of evading the legacy duty will not pass the title to the beneficiaries, especially where the trustees are not notified of the trust and the depositor continues to exercise control of the funds during his life. Gaskell v. Gaskell, 2 Younge & J. 502.

If the depositor does not intend that the title shall pass until after his death, and adopts the device of the trust to evade the statute of wills, the trust cannot be executed. Nutt v. Morse, 142 Mass. 1.

If the transaction is intended as a testamentary disposition of the property it will not be valid. Markey v. Markey, 38 N. Y. S. R. 173.

But the deposit may constitute a valid trust although the fund is to go to the beneficiary only upon the death of the cestui que trust, the depositor retaining control of the deposit in the meantime. Grafing v. Heilmann, 1 App. Div. 260.

If the depositor retains control over the fund and the beneficiary understands that he is to have no benefit of it until after the death of the depositor, he has no such interest as will enable him to prevent the depositor or her guardian in case she becomes insane, from drawing out the funds. Smith v. Speer, 34 N. J. Eq. 336.

If the fund is deposited in trust for the purpose of securing advantageous terms as to interest with no intention of transferring the title, it will not pass. Weber v. Weber (N. Y.) 9 Rep. 632.

Effect of subsequent acts of depositor.

The inference of the creation of an irrevocable trust arising from the deposit of money and opening an account by the depositor in trust for another cannot be refuted by subsequent acts or declarations not connected with the deposit so as to constitute res gestæ. Hyde v. Kitchen, 69 Hun, 280.

If after having created a perfect trust the depositor withdraws the funds and leaves nothing on deposit at the time of his death, it will be the duty of the executor to carry out the trust in favor of the beneficiary. Witzel v. Chapin, 3 Bradf. 386.

No act of the person making the deposit in subsequently withdrawing the money can affect the title of the cestui que trust. Scott v. Harbeck, 49 Hun, 292.

And in case the trustee draws the money his executor may be held for the amount to the cestui que trust. Macy v. Williams, 55 Hun, 489.

Rights and liabilities of representative of deceased depositor.

The administrator of the trustee has a right to draw the fund in continuation of the trust in the absence of notice by the beneficiary forbidding such action. Boone v. Citizens' Sav. Bank, 84 N. Y. 83, 38 Am. Rep. 498, Reversing 21 Hun, 235; Terry v. Bale, 1 Dem. 452; Schluter v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 117 N. Y. 125, 5 L. R. A. 541.

clusively established by the mere fact of the deposit, so as to preclude evidence of contemporaneous facts and circumstances constituting res gestæ, to show that the real motive of the depositor was not to create a trust, but to accomplish some independent and different purpose inconsistent with an intention to devest himself of the beneficial ownership of the fund."

In the case of Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N.Y. 421, 6 L. R. A. 403, the matter of deposit in savings bank by father in name of his son was under consideration. Owing to the peculiar circumstances of that case it was held that the plaintiff's title to the fund depended upon the question of gift rather than trust.

Judge Andrews uses this language in a general discussion of the subject:

"It may be justly said that a deposit in a savings bank by one person, of his own money to the credit of another, is consistent with an intent on the part of the depositor to give the money to the other. But it does not, we think, of itself, without more, authorize an affirmative finding that the deposit was made with that intent, when the deposit was to a new account, unaccompanied by any declaration of intention, and the depositor received at the time a pass book, the possession and presentation of which, by the rules of the bank, known to the depositor, is made the evidence of the right to draw the deposit." Judge Andrews pointing out various motives that impel depositors to open accounts to the credit of third parties or fictitious persons, with no intention of devesting themselves of ownership, continues as follows:

"We are inclined to think that to infer a gift from the form of a deposit alone would, in the great majority of cases, and especially where the deposit was of any considerable amount, impute an intention which never existed and defeat the real purpose of the depositor. The relation of father and son does not in this case, we think, strengthen the plaintiff's case."

We think the reasoning of this opinion is equally applicable to a case presenting the question whether a trust is created by opening an account in the name of, or in trust for, a third party.

The doctrine laid down by this court in the previous cases amounts to this, that the act of a depositor in opening an account in a savings bank in trust for a third party, the depositor retaining possession of the bank book and failing to notify the beneficiary, creates a trust if the depositor dies before the beneficiary, leaving the trust account open and unexplained.

If the intent can be strengthened by acts and declarations of the depositor in his lifetime amounting to publication of his intent a more satisfactory case is made out, but it is not absolutely essential, in the absence of explanation, where he dies leaving the trust account existing.

In the case at the bar we have a state of facts in every way distinguishable from the cases heretofore passed upon by this court. John Cunningham, the depositor, is alive, denying the trust and seeking in his old age to hold his own money as against the administrator of his deceased brother, the beneficiary under this alleged trust.

This case was tried at special term; the record does not contain the evidence, and the findings of fact are conclusive.

The findings show, as already stated, that this was a transaction between John Cunningham and the Bowery Savings Bank; that the depositor first opened the account in his own name, then changed it to his own name in trust for his brother, then changed it back to his own name three days after the death of the alleged beneficiary; that the depositor at all times retained possession of the bank books representing these accounts until delivered up to the bank; that Patrick Cunningham, the brother, was not informed of the account; that John never received any money from Patrick; that John claims never to have intended to give the money represented by the account to Patrick, nor to have intended it for his benefit.

Surely this is a full and complete explanation by the living depositor of his intentions in this matter.

The learned trial judge uses this language in his opinion, viz.: "An intention not to give it to his brother is inconsistent with his act and the form of his deposit, and his evidence is insufficient, to my mind, of what would otherwise be the legal effect without some explanations of the reasons for making the deposit in the form he did."

We think it was quite sufficient for the depositor to state, as he did, that he did not intend to create a trust and never intended to give his brother the money; he was not called upon to disclose his reasons for opening the account in trust for his brother.

We have presented here the case of a man who takes his own money and deposits it to his own credit in trust for another, making no disclosure or publication of the trust, treating it apparently as a mode of transacting his own business, and then survives the proposed beneficiary.

We are of opinion that such a transaction does not create a trust.

There are no sufficient circumstances or declarations from which a court of equity can spell out a trust even under the liberal rule as to the creation of trusts in personal property which holds no formal or written agreement or particular form of words necessary.

The death of the beneficiary three days before the trust account was closed is urged as a reason why this alleged trust should be sustained.

It is a circumstance of no moment, for the opening of the account, as now explained, did not create a trust.

The order and judgment appealed from are reversed, with costs to plaintiff in all the courts.

All concur.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

BATH SAVINGS INSTITUTION
v.
Barzillai W. HATHORN, Admr., etc., of Henry Walker, Deceased, and Alice B. FILES.

(88 Me. 122.)

1. A voluntary trust is a gift, and requires all the essentials of a plain gift to sustain it.

2. The words "in trust for" in the entry of a savings bank deposit, with the same form used on the depositor's book, is sufficient to create a prima facie trust which will be a completed trust or gift in favor of the donee as against the estate of the donor, where all his declarations, acts, and conduct are consistent with the presumption arising from the entry itself.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Sagadahoc County of an interpleader proceeding to determine the right to a deposit in the complainant institution. Decree in favor of Alice B. Files.

After the bill was filed each defendant filed an answer, and then by agreement a decree of interpleader was entered and it was stipulated that the answers should be taken as the pleadings and the cause set down for rehearing on bill of answers and proof, Miss Files being regarded as plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Baker, Baker, & Cornish, for Miss Files:

There are three ways in which a person holding property, real or personal, may make a voluntary distribution thereof for the benefit of another:

1. He can make a simple conveyance or assignment of it directly to the donee so as to vest in the latter whatever interest and title the donor has without intervention of any trust.

2. He may make a transfer of it to a third person upon trusts in favor of the donee.

3. He may retain the title and declare himself a trustee for the donee, and thus clothe the donee with the beneficial estate.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 997.

The elements necessary to constitute an equitable gift such as we claim here are two.

First, an unequivocal intention on the part of the donor to declare a trust in himself.

Second, an unequivocal declaration on the part of the donor, either orally or in writing, that he holds it in præsenti for another.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 997; Ray v. Simmons, 11 R. I. 266, 23 Am. Rep. 447.

The form of deposit itself is evidence of Mr. Walker's intention to make himself a trustee.

Northrop v. Hale, 72 Me. 275; Augusta Sav. Bank v. Fogg, 83 Me. 374.

The surrounding circumstances here point most clearly in favor of our claim.

There is no evidence that this deposit was made in this way to evade any by-law of the bank, or statute of limitation.

Brabrook v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 104 Mass. 228, 6 Am. Rep. 222; Parkman v. Suffolk Sav. Bank, 151 Mass. 218.

Mr. Walker made a complete declaration of trust.

Gerrish v. New Bedford Inst. for Sav. 128 Mass. 159, 35 Am. Rep. 365; Alger v. North End Sav. Bank, 146 Mass. 418; Ray v. Simmons, supra; Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512, 16 Am. Rep. 69; Robinson v. Ring, 72 Me. 140, 39 Am. Rep. 308; Blasdel v. Locke, 52 N. H. 238; Barker v. Frye, 75 Me. 29; Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446.

Where we claim an equitable gift the retention of the book by the trustee is evidence in favor of the trust, instead of against it.

2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 997; Ray v. Simmons, Minor v. Rogers, and Barker v. Frye, supra.

Mr. Charles W. Larrabee for B. W. Hathorn.

Haskell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Henry Walker, of Woolwich, died, solvent and intestate, October 2, 1891, leaving brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces, but neither wife nor children. His wife died January 1, 1886. She was a cousin to the father of the plaintiff, Alice B. Files, of Winslow, who knew the old people as uncle and aunt, and seems to have been always welcome at their house and a favorite with them.

On July 1, 1882, Mr. Walker deposited in the Bath Savings Institution $700 "in trust for Alice B. Files," saying, in substance, that he wished it to go to her at his decease. That deposit remained intact during Mr. Walker's life, and at his death amounted to something over $1,000. He always retained the book, and it was found among his papers by his administrator, the defendant, who now claims the deposit as a part of his estate. The evidence shows that Mr. Walker intended the deposit for Alice at his decease, but never communicated his intention to her.

The authorities all say that a gift inter vivos must be complete. The donor must devest himself of all dominion over the thing given, and the title to it must pass absolutely and irrevocably to the donee. Northrop v. Hale, 73 Me. 66; Dole v. Lincoln, 31 Me. 422; Robinson v. Ring, 72 Me. 140, 39 Am. Rep. 308; Augusta Sav. Bank v. Fogg, 82 Me. 538.

A voluntary trust is an equitable gift, and, like a legal gift inter vivos, must be complete. A declaration of trust as effectually passes the equitable title of the fund to the cestui as a gift inter vivos passes the legal title to the donee. The distinction between them is of a technical nature. In a trust, the real title vests in the donee, but the legal title, perhaps, carrying control of the property, may be placed elsewhere; while in a gift both the real and legal title instantly fall to the donee. It is not necessary, therefore, that he who declares a trust should devest himself of the legal title, if, perchance, he so does it as to transfer the real or equitable title to the cestui; for then he creates an estate really no longer his own. He may retain the legal title, giving him the control, but for the benefit of the cestui, according to the terms of the trust. His control becomes subject to the direction of courts of equity, that always supervise the administration of trusts. They are the children of equity. They spring from it, and cannot survive without its aid and control. The trustee is merely an agent to administer them, and nothing more.

An express trust of lands can only be created by some writing signed by the party or his attorney (Rev. Stat. chap. 73, § 11), but a trust of personal property may be created or declared by parol. It is necessary, however, to clearly establish the terms of it, and show an executed gift, so that the equitable title shall have passed to the donee as effectually as a gift inter vivos. Gerrish v. New Bedford Inst. for Sav. 128 Mass. 159, 35 Am. Rep. 365; Dresser v. Dresser, 46 Me. 48.

Says Lord Cranworth: If a man chooses to give away anything which passes by delivery, he may do so, and there is no doubt that, in the absence of fraud, a parol declaration of trust may be perfectly good, even though it be voluntary. If I give any chattel, that of course passes by delivery; and if I expressly or impliedly say I constitute myself trustee of such and such personal property for a person, that is a trust executed, and this court will enforce it, in the absence of fraud, even in favor of a volunteer. . . . The authorities all turn upon the question whether what took place was a declaration of trust or merely an imperfect attempt to make a legal transfer of the property. In the latter case the court will afford no assistance to volunteers; but when the court considers that there has been a declaration of trust, it is a trust executed, and the court will enforce it whether with or without consideration. Jones v. Lock, L. R. 1 Ch. 25.

In this case, the deposit is in the name of the donor, "in trust for the donee." Standing alone, this entry does not work an absolute, indisputable gift in the form of a dry trust,—that is, a trust without limitation or condition, that may be terminated at the will of the cestui; but extrinsic evidence is competent to control its effect. Brabrook v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 104 Mass. 228, 6 Am. Rep. 222; Clark v. Clark, 108 Mass. 522; Powers v. Provident Inst. for Sav. 124 Mass. 377; Stone v. Bishop, 4 Cliff. 593, Fed. Cas. No. 13,482; Northrop v. Hale, 72 Me. 275.

The evidence discloses that, at the time the donor made the deposit, he expressed a desire that the donee should have the money at his death. That certainly shows no intent to part with the legal title at an earlier day. He is said to have subsequently made talk of the same purport; but he neither informed the donee of the deposit, nor made any effort nor did any act to apprise her of it, or of his intention concerning it. The deposit on his part was both voluntary and secret. Information of it may have been communicated to her by others, but never at his request or with his knowledge. What evidence, then, operates to pass the equitable title in the deposit to her? He had consummated no contract with her. His intentions were kept in his own breast. He could have withdrawn the money at any time, and have made a new disposition of it, and she may not have been the wiser, so far as he knew. It is just as essential, to establish the trust sought to be set up here, to prove some act on the part of the donor that shall operate to pass the equitable title to the donee, as it is to prove delivery in a gift inter vivos. Both require the same essentials. In both, some title must pass from the donor, differing only in degree. A gift must be executed by delivery; a trust, by declaration.

In Augusta Sav. Bank v. Fogg, 82 Me. 538, the donor deposited a sum of money in the name of the donee, subject to his own order, with intent that, at his death, it should go to the donee. No trust was claimed or shown. It was an unexecuted purpose, an ineffectual attempt at testamentary disposition.

In Parcher v. Saco & B. Sav. Inst. 78 Me. 470, a depositor caused to be entered upon the bank ledger words, in substance, "Payable also to Mrs. Leavitt in case of my death," and it was held no gift.

In Curtis v. Portland Sav. Bank, 77 Me. 151, 52 Am. Rep. 750, the entry of "Subject also to" the donee was held to constitute no gift, but that a subsequent delivery of the bank book completed the gift.

In Barker v. Frye, 75 Me. 29, a deposit in the name of the donee, subject to the donor during life, afterwards changed by erasing words giving the donor any control of the fund, and after notice to the donee of the change and that the bank book would be delivered to him the first time they met, and after his reply requesting that the book be sent to him, which the court says "was an acceptance of the gift," it was held that the gift was complete.

The same doctrine is held in Northrop v. Hale, 73 Me. 66; Robinson v. Ring, 72 Me. 140, 39 Am. Rep. 308; Drew v. Hagerty, 81 Me. 231, 3 L. R. A. 230; Parkham v. Suffolk Sav. Bank, 151 Mass. 218.

All of our cases require something more than a mere intention to give, a promise to give, or an expectation to give. Benevolence alone will not do. There must be beneficence also. The mystery sometimes supposed to exist about a trust cannot change the nature of a transaction. A voluntary trust is a gift, and requires all the essentials of a plain gift to sustain it.

In Dresser v. Dresser, supra, a writing specifying the terms of a voluntary trust, and a delivery of the trust property so that the dominion of the donor over it was thereafter lost, is a good example of a trust of this sort.

In Alger v. North End Sav. Bank, 146 Mass. 418, the donor made a deposit similar to the one under consideration. It was in his own name, as trustee for the donee, his housekeeper, who claimed the deposit as a payment for her services. It was shown that, shortly before his death, he told her, "I put it in for you;" "that money is yours;" and the court held that the judge, who tried the case, was authorized to find a perfected gift, if he chose to do so.

Some of the cases are in conflict concerning the question now under consideration, more in the application of the law to the ever-varying facts in the numerous cases than otherwise; but our own cases are all consistent, and squarely hold to the doctrine that a trust in personal property may be created by parol, and that a deposit in bank in the name of another may be explained or controlled by evidence outside the written terms of the deposit. In this case, the terms of the deposit clearly show an intended trust in favor of the donee, but may be controlled or limited by extrinsic evidence. This evidence confirms the trust, showing that it should cease at the death of the donor, and that the legal title should then pass to the cestui. When the deposit was made, the treasurer of the bank told the donor that, at his decease, the money would go to the donee, and the donor replied that was his wish. All the subsequent acts and declarations of the donor show the same intent. The gift cannot be upheld as an absolute gift inter vivos, nor as a gift causa mortis, for these gifts require a delivery of the res, a complete transfer of title. They differ from a gift in trust in that they purport to, and must, pass the whole title, so that the donor can have no dominion or control over them. But a gift in trust withholds the legal title from the donee. It may be transmitted to a third person, or it may be retained by the donor, but in either case the equitable title has gone from him, and unless the declaration of trust contains the power of revocation, or the wide discretion of chancery attaches (Coutts v. Acworth, L. R. 8 Eq. 558; Wollaston v. Tribe, L. R. 9 Eq. 44; Everitt v. Everitt, L. R. 10 Eq. 405; Lister v. Hodgson, L. R. 4 Eq. 30; Sharp v. Leach, 31 Beav. 491; Anderson v. Elsworth, 3 Giff. 154; Toker v. Toker, 31 Beav. 629; Phillips v. Mullings, L. R. 7 Ch. 247; Smith v. Iliffe, L. R. 20 Eq. 666; Welman v. Welman, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 570, 578, 579; Prideaux v. Lonsdale, 1 De G. J. & S. 433), it leaves him powerless to extinguish the trust. Of course, the trust must be established by proof, and the fact that no evidence of a voluntary trust once created remains, or can be shown, does not alter the principle. Many rights fail of enjoyment from the lack of evidence that might once be adduced. So, a secret trust may be valid when it can be proved; but if the donor conceals the evidence of it, and later appropriates the fund to his own use, it is simply a wrong on his part, that prevails because of his perfidy, and goes unpunished and unnoticed because unknown. The cestui's rights are the same although his remedy may have been destroyed.

In the case of Re Smith's Estate, 144 Pa. 428, a lad of three years went to live with his uncle. When the lad was twelve the uncle placed $13,000 in bonds in an envelope, on which he had written and signed a declaration that he held them for his nephew. The bonds remained in the uncle's possession until his death, and the court held a completed gift in trust for the nephew.

In Connecticut River Sav. Bank v. Albee, 64 Vt. 571, the court says: "A completed trust, although voluntary, is valid and may be enforced in equity. It is not essential to its validity that the beneficiary should have had notice of its creation or have assented to it. The owner and donor of personal property may create a perfect or complete trust, by his unequivocal declaration in writing, or by parol, that he himself holds such property in trust for the purposes named. The trust is equally valid whether he constitutes himself, or another person, the trustee."

In that case a father deposited money in a savings bank in the name of his son, naming himself trustee. It appeared that one motive of the father was to avoid taxation; but, said the court, that fact does not negative the idea that he also intended to create a trust for the benefit of his son. It is perfectly consistent with it, and the retention of the pass book is not inconsistent with such a purpose; he must have retained it as trustee.

Ray v. Simmons, 11 R. I. 266, 23 Am. Rep. 447, is in point. One Bosworth deposited money in a savings bank in his own name as trustee for a stepdaughter. He did not tell her what he had done, nor show her the pass book. He kept that himself. After his death, the court held that the stepdaughter was entitled to the money,—that the transaction constituted a trust in her favor.

So is Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446. Susan Boone deposited $500 in a savings bank "in trust for Lillie Willard." Susan kept the pass book, and Lillie had no knowledge of it until after Susan's death. Want of notice to Lillie, and the retention of the pass book by Susan, were urged in defense; but the court held a gift in trust complete. This is an exhaustive case, and contains a review of authorities by Chief Justice Church prior to 1878.

So is Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512, 16 Am. Rep. 69. A widow deposited $250 in her own name, "as trustee of William A. Minor," the child of a neighbor. The child knew nothing of the deposit until after the depositor's death, and meantime did not have possession of the pass book; and the court held the trust complete, and allowed a recovery of the money from the depositor's executor.

So is Re Gaffney's Estate, 146 Pa. 49. It appeared that Hugh Gaffney deposited $560 in his own name, as trustee for Polly Kim, and the court held the entry itself prima facie evidence of the trust, and, unexplained, sufficient to uphold it.

In Gerrish v. New Bedford Inst. for Sav. supra, the court says: "No particular form of words is required to create a trust in another, or to make the party himself a trustee for the benefit of another. It is enough for the latter purpose if it be unequivocally declared in writing, or orally if the property be personal, that it is held in trust for the person named. When the trust is thus created, it is effectual to transfer the beneficial interest, and operates as a gift perfected by delivery."

The same case holds that notice to the beneficiary is unnecessary where the transaction is clear; but when ambiguous, or susceptible of different interpretations, it removes the doubt, and is decisive of the purpose of the donor. Some of the earlier Massachusetts cases seem to hold notice to the beneficiary essential to the validity of a trust, but, when considered in the light of this case, rather consider the notice a controlling than an essential element in the creation of a voluntary trust. The prevailing doctrine now is that notice is unnecessary, but, when shown, has controlling effect.

In this case, the entry "in trust for" is of clear and unmistakable import, and sufficient to create a prima facie trust. It might have been controlled by evidence that would have shown a contrary intention, but such evidence is wholly wanting. Moreover, all the declarations, acts, and conduct of the donor are consistent with the presumption arising from the entry itself, and show that it expresses the true import of the transaction, and creates a completed trust in favor of the donee.

Decree accordingly, with costs against the estate.

C. W. JOHNSTON et al., Respts.

(.....Wis.....)

1. A statute as to fisheries making different regulations for different localities or waters is not void as class legislation in the absence of a constitutional provision against it.
2. A statute discriminating between different kinds of fish and between different localities and waters, in regulating fisheries, does not deny to any person the equal protection of the laws.
3. Seizure and destruction of nets by officers, in obedience to a statute, in abating a nuisance caused by their voluntary use by the owner in violation of the fishery laws, does not deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, or of "a certain remedy in the laws for all injuries" to his property, or make an unconstitutional "distinction" as to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property.

Cassoday, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of replevin, commenced August 9, 1895, before a justice of the peace in Oshkosh, to recover twelve gill nets, of the value of $60, alleged to have been unjustly taken and detained by the defendants. The defendants answered by way of denials, and justified the seizure and destruction of the nets as fish and game wardens of the state, under chapter 221, Laws 1895. On the trial before the justice the plaintiff proved the ownership and value of the nets, and admitted that he had placed the nets in the waters of Lake Winnebago for the purpose of fishing, and that the defendants were such fish and game wardens. The defendants admitted that they, as such fish and game wardens, took the nets from such waters and destroyed them. A trial by jury having resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendants, judgment was entered thereon accordingly, from which the plaintiff appealed to the county court. Upon the trial in that court it was stipulated that the case be decided by the court upon the record certified by the justice; and it was thereupon decided, accordingly, by that court, in favor of the defendants. From the judgment entered therein, in favor of the defendants, and upon the certificate of the trial judge as required by chapter 215, Laws 1895, the plaintiff brings this appeal. Chapter 221, Laws 1895, appears first on pages 367–396, inclusive, and again on pages 397–426, inclusive. There are some discrepancies between the chapter as thus first presented and as thus subsequently presented; but they both purport to have been approved and published on the same day, and they both have the same title, and are numbered the same, and are the same throughout, except in certain particulars, not material on this appeal since the portions of the act there involved, are the same in both publications. Counsel contend that the act in question is unconstitutional and void upon several grounds.

1. It is claimed that certain clauses of the act are repugnant to the constitutional provisions which declare that "no . . . ex post facto law . . . shall ever be passed." Wis. Const. art. 1, § 12. "No state shall . . . pass any . . . ex post facto law." U. S. Const. art. 1, § 9. "By an ex post facto law," said Field, J., "is meant one which imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable at the time it was committed; or imposes additional punishment to that then prescribed; or changes the rules of evidence by which less or different testimony is sufficient to convict than was then required." Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 325, 326, 18 L. ed. 363, 364. See also Re Medley, 134 U. S. 160, 33 L. ed. 835; Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 377, 38 L. ed. 485. This rule is uniformly recognized in all well-considered adjudications upon the subject. It is equally well settled that a general law for the punishment of offenses, which endeavors by retroactive operation to reach acts before committed, and also provides a like punishment for the same acts in future, is void only so far as it is retrospective, and valid as to future cases within the legislative control. Jaehne v. New York, 128 U. S. 189, 32 L. ed. 398. In the case at bar the act complained of was committed nearly four months after the passage and publication of the law in question, and hence that chapter cannot be regarded as an ex post facto law, as to that act. This being so, we are not called upon to determine whether any provision of the chapter was thus retroactive, and hence, to that extent, an ex post facto law.

2. Counsel contend that the law in question is class legislation, and therefore void. This seems to be put on the ground that the act makes certain "regulations for the outlying waters of the state" (§§ 12–15), and certain other "regulations for the inland waters" of the state (§ 16), and certain "provisions applying to certain localities or waters only" (§§ 33–38*a*), and particularly because "the waters of Rush lake" are thereby "exempted from the provisions" of the "act relating to regulations upon the methods or times of taking, catching, or killing fish" (§ 36). We are referred to no clause of our state Constitution which condemns such legislation as class legislation, and we have found none. It certainly does not belong to any of the nine classes of cases in regard to which "the legislature is prohibited from enacting any special or private laws." Const. art. 4, § 31. The constitutions of some of the states expressly prohibit every kind of local or special legislation. As indicated, such prohibition in this state is only partial. As often said, and always conceded, our state Constitution is not so much a grant as a limitation of powers; and hence the state legislature has authority to exercise any and all legislative powers not delegated to the Federal government, nor expressly or by necessary implication prohibited by the national or state Constitution. State, Graef, v. Forest County, 74 Wis. 615; State, Lamb, v. Cunningham, 83 Wis. 146, 17 L. R. A. 145. The law in question is entitled "An Act to Revise, Amend, and Consolidate the Laws of the State Relating to Game and Its Preservation, Fish and the Preservation and Propagation thereof." To legislate intelligently upon such a subject, there must be a legislative discretion as to the different kinds of fish, and as to the different waters in which they are or may be found. The exercise of such legislative discretion in the instant case does not seem to be condemned, as class legislation, by any clause of our state Constitution.

3. But it is claimed to be class legislation within the meaning of the clause of the Federal Constitution, which declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Amend. art. 14, § 1. This clause was clearly intended to prevent hostile discrimination against any individual, or class of individuals, by the statutes of any state. Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. ed. 394; Pembina Consol. Silver Min. & M. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S. 188, 31 L. ed. 653, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 24; Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 448, 34 L. ed. 524. "Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited, but legislation which, in carrying out a public purpose, is limited in its application, if within the sphere of its operation it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the amendment." Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 32, 28 L. ed. 925. In speaking of that constitutional provision, it was said by Mr. Justice Field that it "does not prohibit legislation which is limited either in the objects to which it is directed, or by the territory within which it is to operate. It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed." Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 71, 30 L. ed. 580. There is no pretense that the act in question contains any hostile discrimination against any person or any class of persons. True, it makes certain things unlawful, and prescribes certain penalties, forfeitures, and punishments for violations of the law, but they are alike applicable to any and all persons who violate the law. Under the authorities cited, it is very clear that the mere fact that the statute in question is applicable to certain localities and waters, and discriminates between different kinds of fish, does not make it class legislation, within the meaning of the clause of the Federal Constitution quoted.

4. Among other things, the statute in question provides that "the powers and duties of such fish and game wardens shall be . . . to seize, remove, and forthwith destroy any net, pound, or other device found in the inland waters of this state or in the possession of any person or persons intending to use the same for fishing, or having removed or being in the act of removing the same from any of the waters where the fishing with nets or devices or the setting of the same is prohibited or illegal under this act, or any law of the state, and which are declared to be public nuisances." Section 9, subd. 4. "No person shall be allowed to set, place, or use any gill, fyke, pound, seine, dip, or other net or snare, or trap, in any of the inland waters of the state of Wisconsin for the purpose of catching fish of any variety," except as therein otherwise provided, and which is not material here. Section 16. "Any net of any kind prohibited by law, while set or found in any waters when such net is prohibited by law from being set or used," is therein "declared to be a public nuisance." Section 19, subd. 1. The illegal use of such net contrary to the provisions of the act forfeits the same to the state. Id. subd. 10. It is thereby made the duty of such wardens to destroy the same forthwith, as a public nuisance, "when found or taken in the unlawful use . . . and no liability shall be incurred to the owner or to any other person for such destruction." Section 20. It is conceded that the plaintiff's nets were seized by the defendants, as such wardens, while they were in such unlawful use, and thereupon forthwith destroyed by them. Counsel for the plaintiff frankly admits that "the only issue involved is the constitutionality of said law." But, in addition to the grounds stated, they contend that the statute in question is repugnant to that clause of the Federal Constitution which declares "nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Amend. art. 14, § 1. "Due process of law," said Waite, Ch. J., "is process due according to the law of the land. This process in the states is regulated by the law of the state." Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 93, 23 L. ed. 679. In other words, in matters of state jurisprudence the law of the state is the law of the land. "Legislation is not open to the charge of depriving one of his rights without due process of law, if it be general in its operation upon the subjects to which it relates, and is enforceable in the usual modes established in the administration of government with respect to kindred matters; that is, by process or proceedings adapted to the nature of the case." Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623. "Due process of law, and the equal protection of the laws are secured if the laws operate on all alike, and do not subject the individual to an arbitrary exercise of the powers of government." Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 377, 38 L. ed. 485; Leeper v. Texas, 139 U. S. 462, 35 L. ed. 225. But neither that provision nor any other provision of the Constitution of the United States "was designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity." Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 31, 28 L. ed. 924; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205; Re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 448, 34 L. ed. 524; State v. Heinemann, 80 Wis. 253. "The police power of a state is as broad and plenary as the taxing power." Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232. In the recent case of Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 136, 38 L. ed. 385, 388, Affirming 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L. R. A. 134, Mr. Justice Brown, speaking for the court, has enumerated a great variety of cases which have been sustained under the police power, and adds: "Beyond this, however, the state may interfere wherever the public interests demand it, and in this particular a large discretion is necessarily vested in the legislature to determine, not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests." The decision in that case sustained the validity of a statute substantially like the one in question, and it was there held that such seizure and destruction of the nets was a lawful exercise of the police power of the state, and did not deprive the citizen of his property without due process of law; and such decision was put upon the ground that "it is within the power of a state to preserve from extinction fisheries in waters within its jurisdiction, by prohibiting exhaustive methods of fishing, or the use of such destructive instruments as are likely to result in the extermination of the young as well as the mature fish." The plaintiff, having voluntarily put the nets to an unlawful use, which made them public nuisances under the statute is in no position to recover damages from the defendants for having as public officials obeyed the law, in abating the nuisances by seizing and destroying the nets. Of course the plaintiff had his right of action to determine whether the nets were or were not in such unlawful use. We must hold that the plaintiff has not been deprived of his property without due process of law.

5. The reasons given for holding that the statute in question is not repugnant to the Federal Constitution in the particulars mentioned, make it sufficiently clear that it is not repugnant to that clause of our state Constitution which declares that "every person is entitled to a certain remedy in the laws, for all injuries" to his property; nor that other clause, cited by counsel, which declares that "no distinction shall ever be made by law, between resident aliens and citizens, in reference to the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property." Const. art. 1, §§ 9, 15.

It will be observed that we have confined our opinion to the validity of so much of the chapter in question as is applicable to the particular facts here present, and have carefully refrained from expressing any opinion as to the validity of the act in other respects.

The judgment of the County Court for Winnebago County is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CREDIT SYSTEM COMPANY, Appt.

(92 Wis. 366.)

1. A contract to indemnify a merchant against loss by insolvency of customers is a contract of insurance.
2. An agent of an insurer against loss by insolvency of customers, having power to solicit insurance, transmit applications, collect premiums, and receive pay therefor, may, under Rev. Stat. § 1977, bind his principal by an agreement to include customers rated by a mercantile agency not recognized in the regular policies of the company.
3. Mere failure to reply to a letter containing a slip to be pasted to a policy of insurance, and which deals with a matter already embraced in the contract, will not make the slip binding on the insured in the absence of anything to show that the insurer was injured by the silence.
4. An agreement attached to a policy insuring against loss by insolvency of customers, which policy embraces a period of several months prior to the date of its issuance, which agreement accepts customers rated by a mercantile agency not recognized in the policy, will cover the same period as the policy.
5. An exclusion of liability for losses

NOTE.—The above case begins another branch of insurance law. It is believed to be the first decision, at least by any court of last resort, upon the kind of insurance therein considered.

For insurance of an employee's fidelity, see Fidelity & C. Co. v. Eickhoff (Minn.) 30 L. R. A. 586.

for credit given "exceeding a credit of 30 per cent on the lowest capital rating" in a policy insuring against loss by insolvency of customers excludes merely the excess above that amount, and not the entire loss in case credit is given above that amount.

6. An agreement attached to a policy insuring a merchant against loss by insolvency of customers, that in case a customer is not rated "within the system" of the insurer by the mercantile agency designated by the policy, and he is rated by another specified agency within such system, losses suffered on his account shall be covered by the policy, will, in case the system requires a rating as to both capital and credit, include a customer rated by the agency designated by the policy only as to credit, but by the other agency as to both capital and credit.

7. The dissolution of a corporation defendant after the submission and taking under advisement by the court of an action on contract will not abate the action, but the court will date the findings and enter the judgment as of the time when the action was submitted.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a contract guaranteeing plaintiff against loss by insolvency of customers to whom he sold goods. Affirmed.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

This is an action upon a written contract issued by defendant to plaintiff, and called a "certificate of guaranty." The plaintiff is a manufacturer of clothing, doing business in Milwaukee, and was such in 1889. The defendant was, at that time, a corporation, incorporated under the laws of the state of New Jersey. It appeared that, about the 23d day of October, 1889, the defendant's agent at Chicago, one Langsdorf, called on the plaintiff, and the plaintiff then made a written application to the defendant company for a certificate of guaranty. This application, so far as necessary to be stated, is as follows:

"L. A. Shakman & Co. hereby apply for a guaranty of $5,000 of the debts of the persons to whom we may sell goods, according to the system of said company, during the period of one year, commencing on the 1st day of July, 1889, and ending on the 1st day of July, 1890, and for that purpose we hereby make application to purchase of said company a certificate of guaranty, according to its system of credits, under the copyright of said company, for said term, and desire to enter series A of said company, which series is made up of not more than six hundred and fifty certificates, averaging a guaranty of $5,000 for each certificate. This application is made with the understanding that the said company limits its liability to pay excess losses in any one series in accordance with the following table, less the deduction allowed, to be made by said company, as the value of the bad debts sustained by the applicant, which is hereby agreed to be 12½ per cent of the total amount of losses incurred by reason of bad debts remaining unpaid at the time of proving applicant's losses against said company." Langsdorf forwarded this application to the company, by whom it was accepted and a "Certificate of Guaranty" returned to Langsdorf, who delivered it to Shakman on the 8th day of November, 1889. This certificate reads as follows:

No. 3452. Incorporated 1888. $5,000.

United States Credit System Company, of the City of Newark, N. J.

For and in consideration of the terms and conditions herein named, and of the sum of $145, paid by L. A. Shakman & Co., hereby grants, bargains, and sells to the said L. A. Shakman & Co. this certificate, issued under its copy-righted system of credits, in series A, class B, for the term of one year, commencing on the 1st day of July, 1889, and ending on the 1st day of July, 1890. And for said consideration the said United States Credit System Company guarantees, covenants, and agrees that if the said L. A. Shakman & Co. should, by reason of the insolvency of any debtor or debtors, who owe such debtor debts for merchandise sold and delivered during said period, under the credit system of said company as hereinafter mentioned, or by reason of any uncollectible judgment or judgments that he or they may have obtained, for the sum or sums of money due for merchandise sold and delivered as aforesaid, have losses in excess of 1¼ per cent on their total sales made during the above limited period, to pay such excess loss, not exceeding $5,000, less the deductions, and subject to the terms and conditions hereinafter named. It is, however, expressly agreed and understood that this certificate forms a part of series A, and the company's liability to pay excess losses in any series is limited to the fund or funds provided for said series, as appears more specifically in the application signed by said L. A. Shakman & Co., which application forms a part of this certificate.

Terms and Conditions.

(1) That no credit which may have been given to any party or parties shall be included in the calculation of losses, unless he or they were rated in R. G. Dun & Co.'s Mercantile Agency in the latest books or reports issued by it at the time of shipping the goods, and that no special or other report was received by said L. A. Shakman & Co. changing the same. And in case any change has occurred, such sale and shipment shall be considered to have been made in accordance with such change. (2) That, in calculating the losses, no credit that may have been given shall be included therein exceeding credit of 30 per cent on the lowest capital rating such party or parties were rated in said Mercantile Agency's books or reports. (3) That, in the calculation of losses, no account against any debtor shall be included therein for more than $10,000. (4) That no credit that may have been given shall be included in the calculation of losses, unless the rating of the party to whom such credit is given was at least two thousand dollars ($2,000) at the time of shipping the goods, and that the credit rating was the best or next to the best for the capital. (5) All losses shall remain the property of said L. A. Shakman & Co., and in consideration thereof it is agreed that 12½ per cent of the said 1¼ per cent of the yearly sales, and 12½ per cent of the losses incurred in excess thereof, not exceeding the amount of this guaranty, shall be deducted from both said sums, and the balance, after the deduction of the amount of said 1¼ per cent on the said yearly sales, shall be the sum for which said company is liable. (6) That it shall be the duty of the said L. A. Shakman & Co. to notify said company of the insolvency of any of his or their debtors coming within the calculation of losses under this certificate, within ten days after receiving information of the same. Such notice shall state the name of the debtor, the place of business, date of shipment, amount thereof, and amount still due. Upon failure to give such notice, such claim shall not be taken into the calculation of losses. (7) That, in presenting proofs of losses to said company, such proofs shall specifically show the facts upon which the guarantor bases the belief that the claims are a loss, a statement of the amount of the gross sales between and including date of beginning and expiration of this certificate, the names of the person or persons to whom the goods were sold, itemized account of the same, date of shipment, amounts paid on account, the discounts the debtor or debtors were entitled to receive; and said proofs of loss must be duly verified. (8) That all proofs of loss must be presented within six months after the expiration of the term mentioned and set forth in this certificate, or else the said claims shall be forever barred, even though the loss occurs on an account falling due after the expiration of said six months: provided, however, where any claim is in litigation, and notice thereof is given to the company, then, in that case, the loss, if any, shall be presented within ten days after the termination of said litigation. (9) It is expressly understood that this certificate is issued under class B of this company, whereby the amount of the yearly sales of said L. A. Shakman & Co. are fixed between the sum of $100,000 and $200,000; but, should such sales be of a greater or less sum than above fixed, then any loss sustained by the said L. A. Shakman & Co. would be settled by this company under the terms and conditions of the class to which it belongs, according to the classification system of this company. (10) That this company shall only be liable to the said L. A. Shakman & Co. for goods, wares, and merchandise by him or them owned, shipped, and sold in the usual course of his or their business and trade, and not for goods kept by him or them on consignment, and for which he or they have incurred no liability to pay for; nor shall said company be liable for claims arising from other sources. (11) The company shall pay all losses within sixty days after the proof of loss shall have been made. (12) There shall be no liability on the part of the company unless the said L. A. Shakman & Co. shall have continued his or their said business for the full period of the term herein mentioned and set forth, and should he or they not so continue, fifty (50) per cent of the guaranty fee received shall be returned in full satisfaction of all claims against this company.

Special: In condition No. 2, 20 per cent is changed to 30 per cent. Condition No. 4 is changed so as to include sales to parties whose rating is K 3½ in Dun's Agency Book.

At the time of the delivery of this certificate, and before payment of the consideration or premium, Shakman objected that the policy did not allow the use of Bradstreet's reports of ratings as well as Dun's. There is a conflict in the evidence as to what followed this objection. Shakman's evidence tends to prove that Langsdorf said he would concede this, and that he had authority to do so, and that Langsdorf thereupon wrote, and delivered with the policy, the following slip:

Milwaukee, Nov. 8, 1889.

Indorsement to certificate No. 3,452, in favor of L. A. Shakman & Co., to wit: Should any party to whom above-named firm may sell goods not be rated within the system of this company at Dun's Mercantile Agency, and Bradstreet's Agency does rate such party within the system of this company, then, in such cases, the latter shall be binding upon this company.

A. Langsdorf, Genl. Supt.

Langsdorf, on the other hand, while admitting that Shakman objected to the policy because it did not allow the use of Bradstreet's ratings as well as Dun's, denies that he gave the indorsement to Shakman as a contract, but says that he told him he would submit the matter to the company for their decision, and that he wrote out the indorsement simply to show Shakman how it would read in case the company approved it. At the same time, and after the delivery of the slip, Shakman paid to Langsdorf the premium of $155. It appeared that one Fishell was the partner of Langsdorf, and that their office was at Chicago, and that they styled it the "Western Department" of the United States Credit Company; Langsdorf calling himself general superintendent, and Fishell general manager. Langsdorf testifies that they assumed these titles without authority of the company, and really only had authority to solicit business and collect premiums. On or about November 26, 1889, the plaintiff received a letter from Fishell as follows:

Inclosed find indorsement slip, as requested, which please attach to the certificate, to take the place of the agreement left with you signed by our Mr. Langsdorf.

Very respectfully,
Albert Fishell, Mgr.

The slip inclosed reads as follows:

Should Dun's Mercantile Agency not rate a party, and Bradstreet's Agency should give such party a rating or report, and such rating or report is sufficient to be covered by the system of this company, then and in that case the said L. A. Shakman & Co. may use Bradstreet's Mercantile Agency as a basis for such party. This special permission to take effect November 13, 1889.

[Signed] Fred M. Wheeler, Secretary.

The plaintiff read the letter, but not the slip, and paid no attention to it, and did not return it. The action was tried by the court, jury being waived, and the court made findings of fact substantially as above stated. As to the disputed questions with regard to the Langsdorf indorsement, of date November 8, the court found favorably to the plaintiff's contention, and that it became a part of the contract on that day. The court further found that the plaintiff, during the period covered by the contract, suffered losses within its terms, amounting, in the aggregate, to $6,502.47, and that after deducting therefrom 12½ per cent of such total, and 1¼ per cent of the plaintiff's total sales, the net losses covered by the contract were $2,856.75. Due notice and proof of loss were also found, and the court found, as matter of law, that the defendant is an insurance corporation, and that the contract in question is a contract of insurance. Judgment for the plaintiff for $2,856.75, with interest and costs, was rendered, and the defendant appealed.

Messrs. Winkler, Flanders, Smith, Bottum, & Vilas, for appellant:

The defendant is not an insurance company. Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 160.

The contract between plaintiff and defendant being one of guaranty, Langsdorf, the alleged agent of defendant, had no power to change or modify the contract except by authority from defendant, and no such authority can be implied from the facts in this case.

Even assuming that the Langsdorf indorsement at the time took effect subject to the subsequent approval or rejection of the company, the respondent is nevertheless concluded by the subsequent indorsement sent him in the letter of November 26, 1889, and by him received and retained.

Messrs. Bloodgood, Bloodgood, & Kemper, for respondent:

The contract is one of insurance.

Our statute has changed the rule of law requiring a person dealing with the agent of an insurance company to inform himself, at his peril, of the power of such agent.

The business done by this defendant, as shown in the contract itself, is an insurance business within the definitions given in the books.

Where a party has brought his case to trial and proceeded to present it on the merits and submit the decision, and before any judgment is rendered one of the parties dies, the court, in order that the time consumed by it in deliberation without laches of the party who was successful in the suit may not operate to his disadvantage, will not allow the action to abate, but instead will enter judgment nunc pro tunc as of the submission.

1 Black. Judgm. § 127; Mitchell v. Overman, 103 U. S. 62, 26 L. ed. 369.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We regard the contract before us as unquestionably a contract of insurance. An insurance contract is a contract whereby one party agrees to wholly or partially indemnify another for loss or damage which he may suffer from a specified peril. The peril of loss by the insolvency of customers is just as definite and real a peril to a merchant or manufacturer as the peril of loss by accident, fire, lightning, or tornado, and is, in fact, much more frequent. No reason is perceived why a contract of indemnification against this ever-present peril is not just as legitimately a contract of insurance as a contract which indemnifies against the more familiar, but less frequent, peril by fire. This very contract has been (sub silentio) construed as a policy of insurance by the supreme court of New Jersey. United States Credit System Co. v. Robertson (N. J.) 23 Ins. L. J. 717. The contract being, then, a contract of insurance, and the defendant's business being the making of such contracts, it follows that the defendant is an insurance corporation, within the meaning of Rev. Stat. §§ 1977 and 1978, Langsdorf was its agent for the purpose of soliciting insurance, transmitting applications, and collecting premiums, and received pay therefor. He was, consequently, under § 1977, supra, its agent for all intents and purposes, and had power to make the additional agreement contained in the indorsement dated November 8. Renier v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 74 Wis. 89. The court has found, on ample evidence, that he did make that agreement, and the fact is therefore settled. It is, then, a fact in the case that a complete contract of insurance was made, on or about November 8, by the terms of which the plaintiff was to have the right to use the Bradstreet's ratings in case a given customer was given no rating by Dun.

But it is said that the memorandum sent to the plaintiff November 26, which permitted the use of Bradstreet's reports only after November 13, 1889, became effective and binding by reason of the plaintiff's receiving it and failing to object thereto. We are unable to agree with this contention. The agreement of November 8, being perfect, the letter and inclosed memorandum of November 26 could, at the most, amount to nothing more than a proposal to change the terms of the existing contract. This the plaintiff could do or not, as he chose; but it cannot be said that he did so unless he expressly agreed to the change, or unless his silence was legally equivalent to an express consent to the proposed change. There was no express agreement to make the change, nor do we think that the simple failure to answer the proposal should be construed as such an agreement, in the absence of all evidence showing that the defendant was influenced in its conduct by plaintiff's silence. An agreement inferred from silence must, in such case, rest on the principle of estoppel; and one essential element of estoppel is lacking here, namely, a change of position on the part of the defendant, relying on the plaintiff's silence, which would result in substantial injury to the defendant were it not permitted to rely on the estoppel. The conclusion necessarily is that the contract which became perfected, November 8, with the Langsdorf indorsement, became the contract governing the rights of the parties.

Another question now arises upon the construction to be given to the Langsdorf indorsement. It will be noticed that the policy, though dated October 23, 1889, in terms covers the period of one year commencing on the 1st of July, 1889, and that it insures against losses accruing for merchandise sold and delivered during that period. Thus, the contract covers several months' business transactions previous to its date. It appears in evidence that a considerable number of the losses for which the plaintiff has recovered judgment were suffered between July 1, 1889, and the delivery of the contract, and that these losses arose from credits given to parties who had no credit rating in Dun's reports, but did have such rating in Bradstreet's reports. It is now contended that the Langsdorf indorsement is purely prospective in its operation, and only insures losses occurring after November 8; so that, for the losses occurring before that date, covered by Bradstreet's reports only, there can be no recovery. The indorsement reads:

"Should any party to whom above-named firm may sell goods not be rated, within the system of this company, at Dun's Mercantile Agency," etc.

The argument cannot prevail. This indorsement is part of the whole contract. It must be read in connection with all the other provisions of the contract, and as though it were incorporated in the contract at the proper place. So read, there can be no doubt that the contract refers to all goods sold and credits given between July, 1889, and July, 1890, and that the right to use the Bradstreet ratings in the proper cases was intended to be as broad in its terms as to time as the right to use the Dun ratings.

Subdivision 2 of the terms and conditions of the policy provides that, in calculating "losses, no credit that may have been given shall be included therein, exceeding a credit of 30 per cent on the lowest capital rating such party or parties were rated at in said mercantile agency's books or reports." In a number of instances of losses the plaintiff had given the insolvent debtors a larger credit than 30 per cent of their lowest capital rating. The court allowed, in such cases, 30 per cent of such rating, and disallowed the excess. It is claimed by appellant that the clause means that the entire credit is to be excluded, and not simply the excess above 30 per cent of the rating. This is purely a matter of construction of language, and our construction agrees with that of the trial court, namely, that it is only that part of the credit exceeding 30 per cent of the rating which is to be excluded.

It is claimed that a loss of $300 suffered by the failure of one Simansky was improperly allowed. It appears that Simansky's name appears in Dun's reports with the notation "Blank 3;" that is, no capital rating, and credit "fair." In Bradstreet's reports, however, he appears rated "X D," which means $1,000 to $2,000 capital, credit fair. It seems to us that this loss was properly allowed. Simansky had no capital rating in Dun's reports. The system of the defendant required both a capital and a credit rating. This was therefore a case clearly within the Langsdorf indorsement, where the party was not "rated within the system of the company" at Dun's Agency, and was so rated in Bradstreet's Agency.

This case was tried and submitted to the court February 20, 1894, and taken under advisement by the court, and held under advisement until October of the same year. The original findings were signed and filed October 2, and, on motion of defendant, were amended in some particulars on the 27th day of October, on which day the appellant's attorneys made proof to the court that, on the 2d day of October, the court of chancery of New Jersey had by decree declared that the defendant had ceased to be a corporation, and had forfeited franchises and rights under the laws of New Jersey, and appellant's attorneys objected to the entry of judgment for that reason. Thereupon the court ordered the findings to be dated and filed as of March 3, so as to bring them within the term at which the case was tried, and also rendered judgment nunc pro tunc as of that day. This was right. The action was upon contract. Where such an action has been fully tried and submitted, and taken under advisement by the court, and, pending the decision, a party dies, the court will not allow the action to abate, but will enter judgment as of the time when the action was submitted. The judgment forfeiting the franchises of the corporation could amount to nothing more than the death of an individual. 1 Black, Judgm. § 127; Mitchell v. Overman, 103 U. S. 62, 26 L. ed. 369.

WEST SUPERIOR IRON & STEEL COMPANY (Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Garnishee, Appt).

(.....Wis.....)

1. Payment of a claim for injuries to an employee is not a condition precedent to a right of action against the insurer on a policy to indemnify an employer for sums for which he "shall become liable" to employees.

2. Injury to a workman in iron and steel works, caused by the fall of a girder which was being raised by an independent crew building an addition to the works, is within a policy of indemnity against claims for compensation for injuries in "all operations connected with the business of iron and steel works."

3. Entry of judgment against the principal defendant before proceedings to garnish a claim have commenced, makes the indebtedness absolute, within the meaning of Rev. Stat. § 2769, providing that no judgment shall be rendered upon a liability owing from him to the defendant unless it is due absolutely before judgment against the defendant.

APPEAL by the garnishee from a judgment of the Superior Court for Douglas County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce an employer's liability for personal injuries to his servant against which he held a policy of insurance with the garnishee. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

On the 3d day of March, 1892, the appellant issued to the West Superior Iron & Steel Company its policy of insurance, the essential parts of which are as follows:

"Whereas, the West Superior Iron & Steel Company of West Superior, Wisconsin, hereinafter called the 'employer,' by application dated the 1st of March, 1892, the statements in which the employer warrants to be true and agrees shall be incorporated herein, has applied to the Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation . . . for indemnity against claims for compensation for personal injuries caused to employees while in its service, at the place and places mentioned in the schedule hereto attached, and has paid to the corporation the sum of $1,044 as premium for such indemnity for twelve months from the 1st day of March, 1892, at noon, which premium is based on the estimated yearly pay roll of the employer, amounting to $400,000: Now, it is agreed as follows: That the corporation, in so far as regards injuries caused during the period covered by the premium now paid, or by any renewal, will pay to the employer . . . such sums for which the employer shall become liable to its employees by virtue of the common law or of any statute, subject to the following limitations: . . . In the event of an accident which shall be the cause of the death of or injury to an employee the corporation shall not be liable for more than $1,500 The sums paid to the employer shall be for personal injury within the meaning of this policy caused to any employee in its service while engaged in the employer's work in any of the occupations or at any of the places mentioned in the schedule hereto, such payment to be made within one week after the receipt by the corporation of satisfactory proofs of the claim: provided, always, that this policy is subject to conditions indorsed hereon."

The conditions indorsed provided, among other things, that in case of an accident causing personal injury to an employee and an anticipated claim for damages, the assured should give immediate notice thereof to the company, and furnish such additional information as it might require, and that it should have the right to settle such claim or defend the same in the name of the employer. The schedule referred to is as follows: Under the heading "Description of the Occupation of Employee" occurs the following: "All operations connected with the business of iron and steel works." Under the heading "Wages Paid to Employees in the Occupation" occurs the following: "Four hundred thousand dollars." Under the heading "Places at Which Employees to Whom Wages are Paid are Employed" occurs the following: "West Superior and elsewhere in Wisconsin in the service of the employer." The plaintiff, during the life of the policy, was one of the regular employees of the assured at said iron and steel works, and, during such time, and on the 24th day of August, 1892, he received a personal injury. Notice, according to the terms of the policy, was given to the appellant. Plaintiff commenced suit against the employer to recover compensation for his injuries. Notice thereof was given to the appellant. It refused to take any action in the matter, upon the ground that, "the operations being carried on at the time complained of, and by which plaintiff was injured, were not covered by the contract of insurance," namely, the erection of a building. Such proceedings were had in the action that plaintiff recovered judgment against the employer for $1,400 damages and $51.95 costs. Thereafter such proceedings were had that appellant was summoned as garnishee of the judgment debtor by reason of its liability on the policy. Issue was joined in the garnishee action, and was tried, with the result that findings of fact were filed in accordance with the foregoing statement, and to the effect that at the time plaintiff was injured he was engaged in the manufacturing department; that the employer was building an addition to its works; that a crew other than the one plaintiff was connected with in the service of the employer was constructing the building; that while such crew was raising one of the girders it fell, striking against the shears at which plaintiff was at work, and, rebounding, struck and injured him; that the conditions of the policy to be performed by the employer subsequent to the accident in order to fix the liability of the assurer were complied with. The court construed the policy as a contract to indemnify against liability, and upon such construction, and the foregoing facts, and others not necessary to mention, found the appellant liable as garnishee, and ordered judgment accordingly. Appropriate exceptions were made to present the questions here considered. Judgment was entered in accordance with the findings, from which this appeal was taken.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Did the court err in construing the policy of insurance to be a contract of indemnity against liability, instead of one of indemnity against damages, and in holding that payment of the personal injury claim is not a condition precedent to the right to recover thereon? The policy recites that it is issued on an application for indemnity against claims for compensation for personal injuries. It acknowledges the payment of $1,044 as the premium for such indemnity for a period of twelve months. This is followed by the agreement to pay "to the employer . . . all sums for which it shall become liable to its employees." Certain conditions are indorsed on the policy, and made a part of it, which are consistent with the apparent meaning of the language contained in the body of the contract. By such conditions the assured is prohibited from settling the claims, except by consent of the assurer. They expressly provide that an action may be brought against the assurer before the payment of the claim, by the use of the following language: "The company shall not be sued upon this policy in any court after six years from the time that the injury occurred upon or by reason of which the cause of action accrued, unless at the expiration of said time some suit brought by the injured employee be then pending against the employer, in which case an action may be brought within six months after the termination of such suit, and not later." This language plainly indicates that payment of the claim is not a condition precedent to a right of action against the insurer on the policy. Again, by one of the conditions, the insurance company assumes entire charge and responsibility for the settlement of the loss and of any legal proceedings, and for the payment of the costs thereof. There is no way provided by which it can be relieved of its liability except by actual payment to the employer of the full amount for which it could, in any event, become liable. It will be seen that both the provisions in the body of the policy and the conditions indorsed thereon and made a part of it are inconsistent with any reasonable theory other than that the contract of insurance is one of indemnity against liability, and that actual damages is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action thereon. It not only clearly contemplates that such an action may be brought before actual payment of the claim for damages by the assured, but by plain and unmistakable language it contracts to indemnify the assured against liability, not against damages. The case is not one requiring a resort to rules for judicial construction in order to determine what the parties intended by the language of the contract. Substantially the same kind of policy was under consideration in the recent case of Anoka Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Minn.) (1895) 30 L. R. A. 689, cited in the brief of counsel for respondent, where the court held it to be a contract of indemnity against liability, and said: "The intention of the parties appears to be so plainly expressed that any other construction than the one here given to the contract would do violence to the language they saw fit to use."

It is further claimd on the part of the appellant that the accident whereby plaintiff was injured was not within the terms of the contract of insurance; that by the schedule referred to in the body of the policy, and attached to it, liability was restricted to injuries to employees while engaged in operations connected with the business of iron and steel works,—that is, in the operating department of the business, as distinguished from a business like that of constructing necessary buildings. To be sure, plaintiff was injured while at work in the operating department, by the fall of a girder which was being raised to its position by an independent crew, engaged in building an addition to the works. Therefore, if the labor of constructing such addition under a proper interpretation of the policy, is not an operation connected with the business of iron and steel works, appellant is not liable. We are referred to People's Ice Co. v. Employer's Liability Assur. Corp. 161 Mass. 122, as a case directly in point to sustain appellant's contention. The policy in that case insured the employer against claims for damages on the part of its employees in "all operations connected with the business of ice dealers." The court held that this language covered only employees in the operating department, and that a person injured while engaged in constructing an ice house was not one of the employees mentioned. But this conclusion was reached by reason of representations contained in the application upon which it was issued. The latter contained, among other representations, the following: "Employer's works are situated . . . where cutting ice." "The trade or business is ice dealers." "The operations carried on by the work people are cutting and handling ice." "The machinery in use is such as is necessary in cutting ice." We are not prepared to say but that there was reasonable ground to hold that the policy, taken in connection with the application, and the language of the schedule, "all operations connected with the business of ice dealers," covered only persons engaged in the actual operations of cutting, handling, storing, and delivering ice, and not those engaged in the construction of storehouses; nevertheless we should hesitate to adopt such construction if the precise question were before us. The language was inserted for the benefit of the appellant. It is its language. Therefore, if open to judicial construction at all, that interpretation should be given must favorable to the assured. Insurance Co. of North America v. Garland, 108 Ill. 220; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Scammon, 100 Ill. 644; Symonds v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 23 Minn. 491; Foot v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 61 N. Y. 571; Stout v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 11 Biss. 309, 12 Fed. Rep. 554; Teutonia F. Ins. Co. v. Mund, 102 Pa. 89. This rule is applied rigidly in the construction of conditions inserted in policies restricting the general scope of the contract of insurance. Burkhard v. Travellers' Ins. Co. Id. 262, 48 Am. Rep. 205. Here there is no application containing representations descriptive of the particular departments of the business covered by the contract as in the Massachusetts case, or to damages caused by particular instrumentalities as in the case of Phillipsburg Horse Car Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 160 Pa. 350. The general language of the contract, "All occupations connected with the business of iron and steel works," is not restricted by anything in the conditions indorsed on the policy or any paper referred to or made a part of it. If the intention was to restrict such language to operations in any particular department, or to any particular branch of the business, or to any particular instrumentalities used in such business, it was easy to have said so in unmistakable language. The court should give the general language the assurer saw fit to use, under the circumstances, a broad and liberal construction in favor of the objects for which the policy was taken out, and by so doing the conclusion is easily reached that it covers the operation of constructing a building for the use of the assured in its business, as one of the operations connected with such business.

It is further claimed that the indebtedness of the garnishee to the iron and steel company did not become due absolutely till judgment was entered in respondent's action against such company, hence not subject to garnishment when this action was commenced. We hardly understand the force of this assignment of error. Judgment was entered against the iron and steel company before the garnishee action was commenced. Entry of such judgment made the indebtedness of the iron and steel company absolute. Section 2769, Rev. Stat., provides that "no judgment shall be rendered upon a liability of the garnishee by reason of any money owing from him to the defendant, unless before judgment against the defendant it shall have become due absolutely." This action was not commenced till January 26, 1894. Judgment was entered in the action against the iron and steel company on the 22d day of December, 1893. Due notice was served upon the insurer of the claim for damages and of the commencement of the action therefor, and it refused to recognize the claim, upon the ground that such claim was not covered by the policy. On the rendition of such judgment, under the circumstances, the liability of the garnishee became absolute for the amount thereof, $1,451.95, and that being before the commencement of this action satisfies the provisions of § 2769, Rev. Stat. St. Joseph Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 69 Wis. 389; Jones v. St. Onge, 67 Wis. 520.

There is no other question in the case requiring consideration.

The judgment of the Superior Court is affirmed.

(.....Wis.....)

1. Leave will not be granted to institute proceedings to forfeit the franchises of a solvent active corporation carrying out the purposes of its creation in supplying the necessities of a large number of people and whose securities are held by innocent persons, in the absence of a clear wilful misuse, abuse, or nonuse of its franchises.

3. Waiver of the right to forfeit the franchises of a water company whose property a municipal corporation has the option to acquire for neglect to keep accurate accounts of the cost of construction, as required by the ordinance granting permission to erect and operate the works, is effected by long delay in moving for forfeiture, accompanied by active compulsion upon the company as to extension and operation of the works.

APPLICATION for leave to bring quo warranto proceedings against defendants to declare a forfeiture of their rights as a corporation. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. G. Jeffries, John Winans, and W. H. Mylrea, Attorney General, for plaintiff.

Messrs. William Ruger, E. M. Hyzer, and W. G. Wheeler for defendants.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application by the attorney general for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto against the Janesville Water Power Company and others to forfeit the corporate franchise of such company and other franchises owned by it. The petition states, in substance, that the company was incorporated July 16, 1887, for the sole purpose of constructing, acquiring, and operating a system of waterworks in the city of Janesville, and has ever since existed as such corporation; that during the year 1887 said city, pursuant to chapter 164, Private & Local Laws 1887, by ordinance, upon terms and conditions therein specified, granted to the firm of Turner, Clarke, & Rawson a franchise to establish a system of waterworks, to furnish said city with fire protection, and to supply wholesome water to the inhabitants thereof, for public and domestic use; that such ordinance was duly accepted by said firm; that they thereafter conveyed their rights under the same to said water company; that such company thereafter contracted with a construction company, composed of stockholders and officers of the water company, for the building of such waterworks; that the water plant was duly constructed, satisfactorily to the city, and accepted by it on or before August 6, 1888, and that the water company has since operated the same. The grounds upon which it is claimed the corporate and other franchises should be forfeited are mainly as follows: (1) Violations of the conditions of the ordinance upon which the franchise was granted, in that the said water company has failed to furnish wholesome water as therein provided, has refused to sell water to the inhabitants of the city at meter rates, has neglected to comply with the ordinance in respect to furnishing fire protection, and has neglected to furnish water wholly from artesian wells. (2) Violations of law in respect to the organization and business management of the corporation, in that it has issued bonds in excess of the cost of constructing the waterworks, and has issued stock without the same having been fully paid in money or its equivalent. (3) Violations of the ordinance in respect to keeping accurate books of account of the cost of constructing the works and operating the same, in that it was provided by such ordinance that the city should have the right to acquire the works by purchase at the end of seven years from their acceptance by the city, at a sum sufficient to return to the owners the full cost thereof and 7 per cent annual interest thereon, the same to be ascertained from the books of such owners, together with a sworn statement of the cost of construction, with expenses and earnings, and that the grantees of the franchise, their successors and assigns, should keep accurate books showing such cost, expenses, and earnings, and that a fraudulent failure so to do should vacate and annul the franchise and all privileges granted under it; that the city gave due notice of its election to purchase the works under such reserved right, and required the sworn statement to which it was entitled; that, in response thereto, a fraudulent and false statement was rendered; that it was not taken from books of account accurately kept, as provided in the ordinance, and was known by the officers of the corporation who made it to be false and fraudulent; that there has been a total neglect to keep books of account as required by the ordinance; and that such neglect has been with faudulent purpose, to practically annul that part of the ordinance giving the city the right to acquire the works by purchase. It is plain from an examination of the petition that the ground of complaint chiefly relied upon is the one mentioned in subdivision 3. The allegations are chiefly on information and belief. All are denied, and those in regard to violations of the ordinance in respect to the operation of the works are met by proofs to the contrary of the most positive and satisfactory character. And it is made to appear that substantially all the facts, particularly in regard to the matters referred to in subdivision 3, were fully known and taken official notice of by the city as early as November, 1894, at which time an action was brought in the circuit court to determine the cost of the water plant, and to forfeit its franchises, which action is still pending; that, since the commencement of such action, the city has recognized the existence of such franchises and the water company's obligations in the premises by requiring it to make large and expensive extensions to the water mains, and put in additional hydrants, necessitating other improvements, including an additional artesian well. And it appears that the alleged violations of the ordinance in respect to keeping accounts of the cost of construction are all denied; and that they took place, if at all, before any of the present stockholders of the corporation were interested in the company; and that they have, at considerable expense, endeavored, in good faith, to supply all the information in that regard required; and that in any event the city could not, at the present time, incur the indebtedness requisite to purchase the works without exceeding its constitutional limit.

The foregoing contains, substantially, a correct statement of the case upon which we are to determine the question of whether the sovereign power of the state ought to interfere to forfeit the franchises of the alleged offending corporation, and to wind up its affairs. The granting or refusing this application rests in the sound discretion of the court. The legislature, in providing that an action may be brought, under § 3241, Rev. Stat., only by leave of this court, upon cause shown, obviously did so for a purpose. The law requires that the power thus intrusted to the court shall be exercised and leave granted or denied as the public interest appears to demand, upon due consideration of the facts of each particular case. To merely examine the petition, and if, taking all the allegations thereof, whether upon information and belief or otherwise, into consideration as true, it prima facie states a cause of action or facts that might support a judgment, would be a failure to exercise that sound judicial discretion which the law contemplates, amounting to an abuse of judicial duty. While courts differ on this question, the weight of authority is in favor of the rule that the facts and circumstances of each particular case, and even the motives for instituting the proceedings, may be considered. Atty. Gen. v. Sheffield Gas Consumers Co. 3 De G. M. & G. 304; Atty. Gen. v. Cambridge Consumers Gas Co. L. R. 4 Ch. 71. And especially in case of a solvent, active corporation, carrying out, at the time of the application, the purposes and designs of its creation, performing duties of a quasi public character, having to do with the daily necessities of a large number of people, and where large sums of money have been invested, and securities therefor are held by innocent parties, whose security depends upon a continuance of the corporation, unless there is a clear, wilful misuse, abuse, or nonuse of the franchises sought to be forfeited, or violation of law,—something that strikes at the very groundwork of the contract between the corporation and the sovereign power; something that amounts to a plain, wilful abuse of power or violation of law within the meaning of the statute on the subject, whereby the corporation fails to fulfil the very design and purpose of its organization—leave will not be granted by the court to resort to the extraordinary remedy for a forfeiture of its franchises. State v. Farmers' College, 32 Ohio St. 487; Atty. Gen. v. Erie & K. R. Co. 55 Mich. 15; State, Prosecuting Atty., v. Commercial Bank, 10 Ohio, 535. Leave will not be granted if to forfeit the franchises under the circumstances will be inequitable, or will not have the effect of remedying the grievances complained of, or the proceeding is not in good faith. The counter affidavits used on the application should be considered, and material allegations on information and belief, which are so overcome by positive affidavits and proofs in opposition thereto as to establish the fact involved against the petitioner beyond dispute, should not be considered. Thomp. Corp. § 6786. The rule which generally prevails in this regard is well stated in State, Prosecuting Atty., v. Commercial Bank, supra, as follows: The court proceeds with extreme caution in proceedings having for their object the forfeiture of corporate franchises, and such forfeitures are not to be allowed except under express limitations of the charter, or for plain abuse of power, by which the corporation fails to fulfil the design and purpose of its organization, also, in effect, that the extreme remedy of forfeiture will not be allowed where there are other remedies adequate to redress the grievances complained of; that the remedy of forfeiture is the last resort, certainly not allowed where compensation in damages will substantially remedy the violation. High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 649. Without proceeding further to discuss the principles of law involved and the practice in such cases, we are warranted in saying that the allegations of the petition presented, in respect to violations of the franchises in matters pertaining to the operation of the works and the water service, are so overcome by the affidavits and other proofs that the case in that respect fails to show any warrant for the institution of proceedings to forfeit the franchise of the corporation.

In regard to violations of law alleged in respect to overbonding and issuing corporate stock without payment in money or its equivalent, which happened at or about the time of the organization of the corporation, upward of eight years ago, it is not perceived how, under the facts of this case, the public have a sufficient interest or are sufficiently prejudiced in the matter that, after the lapse of such a period of time, the state should interfere to forfeit the corporate franchises. While such forfeiture might have the effect to punish the corporation itself, to the great and irreparable damage of the present stockholders and the holders of the bonds, it is not perceived how it would have any other effect; and we think, on the whole, the doctrine of estoppel by laches, hereafter referred to, should apply. We suggest in this connection, on a subject of practice, that the water company is the only proper defendant here; that this proceeding is not in the nature of a bill in equity, where all persons may be made defendants who have or claim an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff, or are necessary to a complete determination or settlement of the question involved; it is a proceeding under the statute solely against the alleged offending corporation, and it, only, should have been named as defendant.

As to the neglect to keep accurate books of account of the cost of construction and operating expenses and the earnings, whereby it is alleged that the city is prejudiced in respect to exercising its option to acquire the works by purchase, it is by no means clear that a failure to observe conditions inserted in the ordinance to aid the city in determining the cost of the works in the event of a desire to purchase constitutes a ground for forfeiture at the suit of the state; but the view we take of the matter renders it unnecessary to decide that question. It is claimed on the part of the defendant company that, in any event, the right of the state to forfeit its franchises has been waived. On the contrary, it is claimed on the part of the petitioners that the state cannot be held to have waived such right by any laches shown or any act on the part of the city. That the forfeiture of the franchises of the corporation may be waived by the state is not seriously denied. Atty. Gen. v. Petersburg & R. R. Co. 6 Ired. L. 456; People v. Ulster & D. R. Co. 128 N. Y. 240; People v. Manhattan Co. 9 Wend. 361; State v. Fourth N. H. Turnpike, 15 N. H. 162; 5 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 577; Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. C. & R. Co. 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 129; and Foster v. Joliet, 27 Fed. Rep. 899,—are among the authorities on the subject brought to our attention in the briefs of counsel, to which many more might be added. But it is contended that the state, only, can waive the forfeiture; that acts on the part of the city of Janesville do not affect the matter. It is true that a waiver by the city is not binding upon the state. Nevertheless it would be going too far to say that acts which would estop the city cannot be taken notice of and given effect to on this application. The state may waive the right to bring an action on behalf of the public by mere delay in moving to institute proceedings while the corporation, in carrying cu', in good faith, the purposes of the organization, expends large sums of money; so held in Atty. Gen. v. Sheffield Gas Consumers Co. 3 De G. M. & G. 304, a well-considered, leading English case, where Lord Justice Turner uses the following language: "That delay will affect the attorney general as much as a private individual I am not prepared to say; but, in my opinion, it is a circumstance to be considered in determining the question whether this court shall interfere, although the application to the court be on behalf of the attorney general." In Com. v. Bala & B. M. Turnp. Co. 153 Pa. 47, the court goes further, and holds that in case of delay, accompanied by circumstances which would estop individuals, the state is equally estopped. The circumstances there were: A corporation had been allowed to proceed and expend large sums of money, when the facts relied upon in the application for leave to bring the action to forfeit its franchises were notorious. Held, that the delay, under the circumstances, created an estoppel, so as to effectually prevent the institution of such proceedings. The court, in effect, said: If the complainant were a private individual, the court would not hesitate to say that his laches were a bar; and the same rule holds good notwithstanding the application is by the attorney general on behalf of the state. The question involved is not one under the statute of limitations, but one of laches, which may be imputed to the state as well as to an individual. While time does not run against the state, time, together with other elements, may make up a species of fraud, and estop even sovereignty from exercising its legal rights. To the same effect are Willmott v. Barber, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 105; Atty. Gen. v. Johnson, 2 Wils. Ch. 102; Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 1. The principles here maintained should be quite rigidly applied where, as in this case, the corporation has not merely been allowed, but has been compelled, by those chiefly interested and the real moving parties, to proceed at great expense, under the franchises sought to be annulled, for a considerable period of time, while the facts relied upon as grounds for forfeiture have been all well known.

Without taking further time to discuss the subject, we hold that delay in moving for leave to commence the action, with the other elements referred to, constitutes, on this application for the exercise of the discretionary power of the court, an effectual waiver of the harsh and extraordinary remedy of proceedings under the statute to forfeit the franchises of the company, and that this application should therefore be denied.

The application for leave to bring an action against the Janesville Water Power Company to forfeit its franchises is denied.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover property sold under an attachment which plaintiff claimed as exempt from execution. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. S. Grogan for appellant.

Messrs. Watson & Buxton for appellee.

Faircloth, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts found by the referee and sustained by the court are as follows: (1) That plaintiff, in November, 1887, owned and occupied, as his home place, the land now in controversy, and left the state in that month to avoid a warrant out against him for false pretense, with the intention of returning as soon as the case against him should be thrown out of court, and that his wife and children remained on the place until plaintiff returned, about Christmas, 1889; that the plaintiff spent his time in visiting relatives in various states, intending to return to this state when he believed the charge against him to be buried. (2) That during his absence an attachment issued, and the land was sold, and the defendant purchased it; no homestead having been assigned to the plaintiff. His honor held that the plaintiff, during his absence, was not a resident of this state, and therefore not entitled to a homestead. This is the only question presented.

The Constitution guarantees the right to a homestead to every resident on the land occupied by him, and whoever denies the right must show that the case falls within the constitutional exceptions, which is not the case in this instance, or that the owner has lost it by nonresidence. Residence and domicil are so nearly allied to each other in meaning that it is difficult sometimes to trace the shades of difference, although in some respects they are distinct; and the definitions of residence are sometimes apparently conflicting, owing mainly to the nature of the subject with which the word is used, the purpose being always to give to it such meaning and force as will effectuate the intention of that particular statute. The great bulk of cases in the books are cases of statutory residence, as applied to the subjects of voting, eligibility to office, taxation, jurisdiction in divorce proceedings, probate and administrations, limitations, attachments, and the like cases. The word is frequently used in the sense of bodily presence in a place, sometimes a mere temporary presence, and sometimes the most settled and permanent abode in a place, with all the shades of meaning between these extremes, and also with reference to the distinction between an actual and legal residence. So it seems entirely proper to consider its meaning in connection with the subject-matter and the purpose of the statute in which it is found, as well as the relation of the citizen to the subject-matter. The leading purpose of the Constitution (art. 10, §§ 1-3, 8) is to secure the homestead to the debtor and his family, and the term "resident" therein should be so construed as to accomplish that purpose, unless there should be found some positive or necessary and reasonable rule of law to the contrary. Absence from the state does not necessarily mean a change of residence, in the legal sense, as that question depends upon the intention and other facts. A protracted residence in another state, engaged in a permanent business, with no home in this state, would be at least inconsistent with a residence here. "Residence," strictly construed, would defeat the object of the Constitution (art. 10) in relation to homesteads. If a citizen of Raleigh should go to Baltimore on business, he could not be said to literally reside in Raleigh during his absence but by allowing the doctrine of animo revertendi its reasonable force, the business is attended to, and the purpose of the law is secured. The question of domicil and residence has been so fully and frequently discussed by this court that it would be superfluous work to repeat what has been decided. We will only refer to Finley v. Saunders, 98 N. C. 462; Fulton v. Roberts, 113 N. C. 421; State, Hannon, v. Grizzard, 89 N. C. 115, and the several cases therein referred to; and to State v. Johnston (at the present term) (N. C.) 23 S. E. 921. The general rule from the cases is that when one leaves the state with the intention of returning he does not lose his residence here. This will do for the present case; but to avoid any extreme conclusions from the above statement, we will say that circumstances may easily lead to a different result; for instance, if the lapse of time should be long enough to rebut such intention, or if a residence should be acquired in another state, or by engaging in permanent business elsewhere, without the animo revertendi, or by assuming the duties and privileges of a citizen in such other state. The question is one of law, and not of morals, and we could not inquire into the latter. Our opinion is that the court below committed error, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the facts now in the record before us.

Reversed.

Clark, J., dissenting:

The sole question in this case is whether a fugitive from justice, wandering about in other states, without intention of returning until a criminal indictment against him in this state can be procured to be dropped, and upon whom, therefore, personal service of summons cannot be made, is liable to be brought into court in a civil action by attachment of his property and publication, and if he can set aside the sale under such attachment proceedings on the ground that his homestead was not set apart. The question is in reality a single one, because, unless such fugitive is a nonresident, the attachment will not lie, and, if he is a nonresident, he is not entitled to the homestead. It would be singular if a party could thus not only defy the criminal process of the court, but by such indefinite and illegal absence from the state could also avoid service of civil process, and on his return could (as this plaintiff is attempting to do) take back his property, with his debt paid by the purchaser at the sale which had been ordered by a court of justice. It would seem that the decisions of the court have been conclusive against this very ingenious and novel proceeding. In Wheeler v. Cobb, 75 N. C. 21, it was held that one voluntarily removing to another state for the purpose of discharging the duties of an office of indefinite duration, though he may occasionally visit the state, and may have the intent to return at some future day, is a nonresident for the purposes of an attachment. This has been often cited with approval, and as late as Carden v. Carden, 107 N. C. 214, this court again citing it, adds: "The prominent idea is that the debtor must be a nonresident of this state, where the attachment is sued out, not that he must be a resident elsewhere. The essential charge is that he is not residing or living in the state . . . where process may be served so as effectually to reach him. In other words, his property is attachable, if his residence is not such as to subject him personally to the jurisdiction of the court and place him upon equality with other residents in this respect." The court then goes on to say that "visiting this state only once or twice a year and with only a general intention of returning at some indefinite time and making his home here," would not exempt his property from attachment. The court further adds: "Non residents, within the meaning of the attachment law, means the actual cessation to dwell within a state for an uncertain period, without definite intention as to the time for returning, although a general intention to return may exist." For these propositions the opinion cites, besides Wheeler v. Cobb, supra; Waples, Attachm. 35; Weitkamp v. Loehr, 21 Jones & S. 79. If former deliverances of our own court are to guide us, this would settle the present case, for this fugitive from justice not only did not "visit the state twice a year," but, so far from having an intention to return at a definite time, he had a most definite and fixed determination, for a very good and sufficient reason, —the terror of the indictment which had been returned against him,—not to return until "this charge against him was buried." There being no statute of limitation after indictment found, it was uncertain as to time and manner when a fugitive could procure the "burial" of the proceedings, and he did not return until it was done; and he was in fact absent from the state somewhat over two years. It was not necessary, as we have seen, that a residence should be obtained in another state. It is sufficient if the party has ceased to reside in this state. In New York v. Genet, 4 Hun, 487, it is held that a fugitive from justice who leaves the state is a nonresident, and his property is liable to attachment. Brady, J., says: "The effect of such an act must be to deprive the person committing it of his character as a resident. He places himself designedly beyond the reach of the power of the state by leaving its territory, and in terror of its laws. . . . He abandons deliberately his residence. . . . When a man thus conducts himself, he waives acquired rights which depend upon his presence within the state, or circumstances which warrant its presumption, and is to be treated as if he were not present, and had no rights founded upon that legal attitude. He became, in other words, to all intents and purposes, for the enforcement of remedies, a nonresident of this state." On appeal this decision was affirmed by the New York court of appeals by a unanimous bench. 63 N. Y. 646. The same ruling was made as to another fugitive from justice in Thames & M. M. Ins. Co. v. Dimmick, 51 N. Y. S. R. 41. See also Kneeland, Attachm. §§ 182–193, and cases cited; and 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 125, note 3.

If the attachment was valid, as under the above decisions in our own court and elsewhere it must be, the purchaser acquired a good title; for the plaintiff, if a nonresident, was not entitled to claim a homestead, which is given by our Constitution only if the lot or tract "is owned and occupied by a resident of this state." This point has been uniformly so held; indeed, the language of the Constitution could bear no other construction. In Baker v. Legget, 98 N. C. 304, Merrimon, J., says: "The right of homestead provided and secured by the Constitution . . . is incident to residence in this state. Only residents have and are entitled to it. A nonresident has no such right, although he may be the owner of real property situate in the state." And the opinion goes on to hold that "when a resident removes from the state" he "abandons and relinquishes his right of homestead." In the next case in order (Finley v. Saunders, 98 N. C. 462), Smith, Ch. J., says that "by the removal of the debtor out of the state, with a view to a permanent residence elsewhere . . . although his family do not follow him to his new abode, he forfeits his constitutional right" to the homestead. We have seen it is held above that it is not essential to becoming a nonresident that another residence shall be acquired or contemplated elsewhere, if residence in this state has ceased with only an intention to return at an indefinite time. But this case is important as showing that the right to the homestead depends upon the residence of the debtor himself, and cannot be held vicariously for him by his wife and children remaining here. In Munds v. Cassidey, 98 N. C. 558; Smith, Ch. J., holds that: "The person claiming the exemptions from execution must be an actual, not a constructive, resident. Therefore, one who has been a resident, but has removed from the state with the expectation of returning at some uncertain time is not entitled to the exemptions." In that case the debtor was employed upon a steamboat in Florida, and expected to return to this state. The learned chief justice further adds that this "benevolent provision" is for actual residence, and must not be construed as embracing cases of mere domicil, which is always retained till a right of domicil is obtained elsewhere. This, too, will remove the confusion brought about by cases like State, Hannon, v. Grizzard, 89 N. C. 115, as to the right of suffrage, eligibility to office, and the like. All these depending upon domicil, the right to vote or hold office can be retained by constructive residence when no actual residence with an animus manendi has been acquired elsewhere. But as to attachments and homestead, we see, by this and other decisions above cited, the rights are determined when actual residence ceases in this state. This is reaffirmed in Lee v. Moseley, 101 N. C. 311, 2 L. R. A. 106, which holds: "The words 'a resident of this state,' employed in the Constitution (art. 10, § 2) in respect to homesteads, have a more restricted meaning than that usually given to 'domicil,' to entitle a person to the constitutional exemption he must be an actual, and not a constructive, resident." In the opinion, Smith, Ch J., combats the idea that the intent to return should be left to the jury, and says that "it is sufficient if in fact the debtor does change his residence, and the effect of his acts cannot be defeated by his declaration that he did not so intend." In the present case, was the fugitive from justice, moving round from state to state for more than two years, not daring to return here, and only expressing the conditional intention to return at some indefinite time, an actual or a constructive resident of this state? If the latter, upon the above unbroken line of authorities he was not such a "resident" as could claim a homestead, or an exemption from attachment of his property, at the hands of the law which he was defying. Fulton v. Roberts, 113 N. C. 421, cites as authority the above cases of Munds v. Cassidey, Baker v. Legget, and Lee v. Moseley. As bearing upon the present case, it is authority that the burden of showing the nonresidence of a party who has at one time been a resident of the state is upon him who claims that the homesteader has become a nonresident. That has no application here, as the facts are found by the referee, as above stated; and the intent of the party to return at some indefinite time, upon a contingency, as Smith, Ch. J., says above, was immaterial. Our decisions have been uniform, and have become "a rule of property," and at a sale ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction, which order was based on these rulings, the defendant has laid out his money. If he should ever lose it under such circumstances, so long a line of decisions should not be reversed for the benefit and at the instance of an admitted fugitive from justice, who even now has only ventured to return to the state because, by some means undisclosed to us, the criminal indictment against him has been "buried."

It is not necessary, to obtain the benefit of a homestead exemption, that the debtor should be a citizen. It is sufficient if he is a resident of the state. But he must be a resident, whether a citizen or not. Homestead and attachment affect property rights, and are governed solely by residence, not by citizenship. Citizenship once acquired can be retained by constructive residence plus the proper intent. Not so with homestead and attachment, which depend upon actual residence, which is a question of fact upon the circumstances of each case. As citizenship (and with it the right of suffrage and eligibility to office) cannot be acquired by mere residence without an animus manendi, it is right that it cannot be lost by mere nonresidence if there is the animus revertendi. But exemption from attachment, which is seizure before judgment, and homestead, which is exemption from seizure after judgment, are conferred by residence alone, and must, therefore, be lost by nonresidence. It is not always easy to draw the line between residence and nonresidence, but we know that mere incidental absence, as on a visit or a journey, is not nonresidence; and, on the other hand, we know it would do violence to both the legal and the ordinary use of the word to say that a man who flees the state to avoid being found by its officers, and who is skulking through other states to avoid extradition, for more than two years, with no intention of returning till the criminal proceeding has been dropped, has during all those years been a resident of this state, or to say further that, because he was residing here all that time, the law will protect him from service of civil process by attachment of his property, and preserve for him the homstead, which the Constitution confers upon no one unless he is a resident.

STATE of North Carolina

(.....N. C.....)

The provision for an appeal by the mother from an acquittal of the putative father in a bastardy case, made by the act of 1879, chap. 92, is in violation of the constitutional prohibition against placing a person twice in jeopardy, as the statute, by imposing a fine upon him when the issue of paternity is found against him, makes it a criminal proceeding.

(Clark and Montgomery, JJ., dissent.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Iredell County disallowing his plea of former jeopardy in a bastardy proceeding appealed by the state from a justice's judgment of acquittal. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. C. Caldwell for appellant.

Mr. Frank I. Osborne, Attorney General, for the State.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Acts 1879, chap. 92, § 2 (Code, § 35), it was provided that "when the issue of paternity shall be found against the putative father, or when he admits the paternity, he shall be fined by the judge or justice not exceeding $10, which shall go to the school fund of the county." In the same section it was provided, further, that "the court shall make an allowance to the woman not exceeding the sum of $50, to be paid in such instalments as the judge or justice shall see fit," etc. This provision was first enacted in the chapter of the act of 1879, which was passed for the purpose, as appears upon its face, of enlarging the criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace under the Constitution (art. 4, § 27), by limiting the punishment so that it could not exceed a fine of $50 or imprisonment for thirty days. After the passage of the act, however, the attention of this court had never been called to the fact that a fine was imposed by this statute until the argument of the case of State v. Burton, 113 N. C. 655. The court agreed to rest the decision in that case upon other grounds, but the justice who delivered the opinion of the court discussed the question, and expressed for himself the opinion that the act of 1879 had made bastardy a criminal offense, cognizable originally before a justice of the peace. At the next succeeding term the court held, in Myers v. Stafford, 114 N. C. 234 (Justice MacRae delivering the opinion, and Justice Clark dissenting), that § 35 of the Code made bastardy a petty misdemeanor, and consequently that the county commissioners were not liable for damages for putting a defendant convicted of that offense to work on the public roads until the fine and costs should be paid. At the next term the ruling of the court, that the proceeding was a criminal action, was affirmed, in State v. Parsons, 115 N. C. 730, and it was held by an undivided court that, where there was a verdict of guilty, the defendant must be discharged from custody, and relieved of all liability as to the fine of $10 and the costs, upon remaining in jail for the requisite time and taking the prescribed oath. But it was held in those cases that the allowance of $50—while the making of it was contingent upon a finding that the defendant was the father, as was the imposition of the fine—was still, like the old allowance, imposed under that part of the act passed by the legislature in the exercise of its power to enact police regulations, but that, as the act made the allowance payable to the mother, she became, in contemplation of law, a creditor of the defendant, and could, under § 2942 of the Code, suggest fraud and contest the defendant's right to discharge, as an insolvent, from its payment In State v. Wynne, 116 N. C. 981, the court as now constituted held, without a dissent, that bastardy was a criminal offense, complete on the begetting of the child, and was within the exclusive jurisdiction of a justice of the peace for twelve months thereafter. We are now urged to overrule all of these adjudications, made upon full consideration of the question by two courts, the majority of the members of which were differently constituted, and declare that the imposition of a pecuniary fine as a punishment for a violation of law does not ipso facto create a criminal offense. This persistent effort on the part of counsel to overturn former rulings of the court makes it necessary to again adduce the authorities upon which they were founded. The Constitution of 1868, as amended in 1875 (art. 1, § 13, and art. 4, § 27), had authorized the legislature to provide for the trial of petty misdemeanors without the intervention of a jury, and the boundary line of a justice's jurisdiction should depend upon the punishment prescribed by statute. It must be inferred that, when the legislature associated bastardy with a number of misdemeanors, the punishment whereof in the same act was reduced so as to make them cognizable before a justice, it was not accidental, but with a purpose to constitute it a criminal offense; that for the first time it was made punishable by a fine of $10. But not only do the circumstances indicate an actual intention on the part of the legislature to create a criminal intention, but the apt words used, ex vi termini, can be construed to mean nothing else. Was the construction of the act of 1879 in the three recent decisions of this court erroneous, as it is now contended it was?

It is familiar learning that words in a statute must be construed according to their technical meaning, unless a contrary intent is apparent upon the face of the act. Under this rule, what must be the interpretation of the provision that, on the admission that the defendant is the father, or the finding of the issue of paternity, "he shall be fined by the judge or justice of the peace not exceeding $10, which shall go to the school fund of the county?" "A crime is an act made punishable by law." Broom, Phil. of Law, § 162; 1 Whart. Crim. L. § 14, and note. "A crime," says Bishop, "is any wrong which the government deems injurious to the public at large, and punishes through a judicial proceeding in its own name." 1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 32. Under the Constitution of North Carolina the death penalty can be inflicted in four cases only, all other capital punishment being forbidden. The legislature is empowered to prescribe as a punishment for all other criminal offenses either a fine, or imprisonment with or without hard labor, or both. When an act affecting the public is forbidden by statute, says Bishop, "the doing of it is indictable at common law." 1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 237; State v. Parker, 91 N. C. 650; 2 Archbold, Crim. L. 2; 2 Hawk. P. C. chap. 25, § 4. If a crime is an act or wrong punishable by law in a proceeding conducted in the name of the state, it would seem that there can be no controversy about the fact that this proceeding, originally conducted in the name of the state, in order to carry out a police regulation, became a crime when made punishable by law by fine appropriated to the school fund, as are all other fines imposed on conviction for crime. It seems never before to have been doubted that the legislature creates a criminal offense whenever it prescribes that a certain act shall be punishable either by fine or imprisonment, or forbids it generally, and by implication empowers the courts to impose either fine or imprisonment, as is the case where the law simply declares that a certain act shall be deemed a misdemeanor, without providing how it is to be punished. State v. Hatch, 116 N. C. 1005; State v. Hawkins, 77 N. C. 494; 1 Bishop, Crim. L. § 940. "A fine," says Lord Coke (1 Co. Litt. 126*b*), "signifieth a pecuniary punishment for an offense or a contempt committed against the King." "A fine is a pecuniary punishment for an offense or a contempt committed, imposed by the judgment of a court." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 991. If a fine is either a punishment for a criminal offense or a contempt, there being no pretense that begetting a bastard is a contempt, it must be a criminal offense. The Scotch definition of a criminal offense, which was founded upon principles identical with the common law, declared any act made punishable by law, either by corporal punishment or pecuniary mulct, to be a crime. Mack. Crim. L. 3. The act of 1741 (Potter, Rev. p. 14, § 10) and all subsequent enactments contain substantially the same provision as is still contained in § 32 of the Code, viz., that the father, upon the finding of the issue of paternity against him, "should stand charged with the maintenance of the child, as the court may order, and shall give bond," etc. Hayw. Man. p. 645; Acts 1814, chaps. 870, 871; 2 Potter, Rev. p. 304; 1 Rev. Stat. chap. 12, § 4; Rev. Code, chap. 12, § 4; Battle, Rev. chap. 9, § 4. The act of 1879, which is embodied in § 35 of the Code, is in direct conflict with the language quoted from § 32, in providing that "the court shall make an allowance to the woman not exceeding the sum of $50 to be paid in such instalments as the judge or justice shall see fit, and shall give bond," etc., instead of standing chargeable to the county as to amount as well as date of payment, as the court might determine. Clearly the effect of the passage of the act of 1879 was, until the Code took effect in 1883, to repeal this portion of the Old Revised Code as compiled in Battle's Revisal. Either the court had the power to make an unlimited allowance, or one limited to $50. It is manifest that the commissioners inadvertently brought forward, and the legislature inadvertently enacted, in the Code, provisions apparently conflicting. In the same way the later provision of the Code (§ 35), in making bastardy a criminal offense, deprives the state of the right of appeal from a verdict of not guilty. "The pre-existing law and practice, recognized and enforced in numerous adjudications," said the court, in State v. Powell, 86 N. C. 643, "had settled the principle, that when a party charged with any offense before a tribunal of competent jurisdiction has been tried and acquitted, the result is final and conclusive, and no appeal is allowed the state to correct any error committed by the court, and this has been uniformly maintained since the adoption of the new Constitution, as before. State v. Jones, 1 Murph. 257; State v. Taylor, 1 Hawks, 462; State v. Martin, 3 Hawks, 381; State v. Credle, 63 N. C. 506; State v. Phillips, 66 N. C. 646; State v. West, 71 N. C. 263; State v. Armstrong, 72 N. C. 193. The right of the state to appeal from erroneous rulings in the court below exists only where judgment is given for the defendant upon a demurrer to the bill, or upon a special verdict, or on a motion to quash, or in arrest of judgment. State v. Lane, 78 N. C. 547; State v. Swepson, 82 N. C. 541; State v. Moore, 84 N. C. 724. The reason given by Chief Justice Pearson and Judge Daniel in State v. Carson, 2 Dev. & B. L. 370, and State v. Pate, Busbee, L. 244, for declaring that the legislature had no power to make a criminal offense, without indictment or presentment, ceased when power was given to the legislature (Const. art. 4, § 14) "to provide other means of trial for petty misdemeanors." A justice's court now has jurisdiction to try misdemeanors, and the attorney general frankly conceded that no appeal on the part of the state lies from a finding of a court of competent jurisdiction that a defendant is not guilty. When the Constitution was so altered as to permit the substitution of the justice of the peace as a trior of the fact, for the jury, as intimated by Chief Justice Smith in State v. Powell, supra, the principle was in no way changed. In speaking of the constitutional provision that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, Bishop (1 Crim. L. § 997) says: "We have seen elsewhere, that while so much of a statute as is against the accused is interpreted strictly, the parts in his favor are extended liberally, and the same distinction applies to a written Constitution. Therefore the constitutional provision now under consideration should be liberally construed, as covering cases within its reason, while not within its words. On which principle, plainly, the courts should, as we have seen they generally do, hold it applicable to misdemeanors, the same as to treason and felony." Again, Bishop says (Id. § 1026): "A statute which, by a device of an appeal by the state, undertakes to authorize the retrial of one acquitted on a valid indictment, is void."

Granting, then, that the act of 1879 created a criminal offense, the re-enactment of the old provision in § 32 of the Code, that "from the judgment and finding, the affiant, the woman, or the defendant may appeal to the next term of the superior court," etc., would be void, if the principle is properly stated by Bishop. It is the duty of courts, however, as far as it can be done without violating a constitutional principle, to reconcile apparent conflicts in two statutes, and construe them so as to give effect to both. Winslow v. Morton (at this term) (N. C.) 24 S. E. 417. It has been held in State v. Wynne, supra, that the criminal offense is within the exclusive jurisdiction of a justice, for twelve months from the time the child is begotten, and, if that was true, the justice here had jurisdiction, and any statute providing for an appeal would be pro tanto void. While the defendant, on conviction, may be commited to a house of correction or to prison, yet, when committed to prison or prayed into custody, without further action by the state or the complainant, he will be discharged on taking the required insolvent oath. State v. Burton and State v. Wynne, supra; Myers v. Stafford, 114 N. C. 234. In these cases the right of the mother has been held to be an incidental one, growing out of conviction, which was compared to the right to have a nuisance abated in certain instances; and it is difficult to see how we would have gone further, in the face of the prohibition against placing a person twice in jeopardy, and subject a defendant to a second trial. The utmost length that this court has gone, since attention was called to the act of 1879, was when it was conceded that, after conviction,—not after acquittal,—the mother acquired the rights of a judgment creditor, and, where she showed due diligence in giving notice, could insist upon contesting the right to discharge as an insolvent on the part of the defendant, and might appeal in apt time to vindicate her right. This privilege can be given her under the statute without infringing the constitutional rights of the defendant. But the unfortunate bringing forward of the old statute could not annul rights acquired under the later statute, embodied in a subsequent section of the Code. After the passage of the act of 1879, and before the attention of this court was called to the fact that a fine had been imposed by that act, several cases came before this court, which were cited in State v. Burton, and have been considered in every subsequent opinion in which this subject has been discussed. It would seem needless to thresh over such old straw for the fourth time. The fact that the imposition of a fine creates a criminal offense is none the less true because the court overlooked for a time the fact that it had been done. For the reasons given, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the defendant is entitled to be discharged.

Reversed.

Clark, J., dissenting:

Up to and including State v. Edwards, 110 N. C. 511, in which the authorities are collected, the decisions of this court were uniform that proceedings in bastardy were civil, not criminal. In State v. Burton, 113 N. C. 655, it was intimated, but not decided, that they might be construed to be criminal actions. This has been followed by Myers v. Stafford, 114 N. C. 240 (dissenting opinion on page 689, 114 N. C.), which held, by a divided court, that it was a criminal action, and two decisions to that effect have since been made; but the constantly increasing perplexity and difficulties arising from this construction, and which threaten to virtually nullify the act, warn us to return to the ancient landmarks and show the peril of departing from them. For the first time, the effect of the new departure has brought us face to face with this question. The legislature has provided (Code, § 32) that from the judgment and finding on the trial before the justice "the affiant, the woman or the defendant, may appeal to the next term of the superior court of the county where the trial is to be had de novo." Now we are asked to nullify this express provision of the lawmaking power upon the ground that, this being a criminal action, no appeal lies from the judgment of the magistrate if in favor of the defendant. The power of the legislature to enact laws cannot be abridged or denied, except when their action is clearly contrary to some provision of the Constitution. But it is contended that the Code (§ 35), authorizing a fine of $10, turns the action into a criminal proceeding, and ergo the express provision (§ 32) giving affiant or the woman the right to appeal is abrogated, and of no effect. This cannot be so.

1. If §§ 32 and 35 are incompatible, the provision of § 35, authorizing the $10 penalty, should be held nullified, rather than the express provisions of § 32. To disregard the latter is to change the whole nature of the proceeding. In construing statutes, particular stress is laid upon the mischief to be remedied. The mischief to be remedied here is not to make the begetting of a bastard child a criminal offense, and to collect the petty penalty of $10 therefor. Clearly not, for there is already the criminal offense of fornication and adultery, admitting of far heavier penalty, and even when no child is begotten. Besides, if bastardy is a criminal offense, the woman would be liable as an aider and abetter, a coprincipal, which is clearly not contemplated by the statute. The object of the statute, through and through, is to provide for the maintenance of the child, and prevent it being a charge upon the county, which is a civil, not a criminal, proceeding. This is the evident purport of the whole chapter on bastardy, and has been so recognized by a long, and until very recently an unbroken, line of decisions. Section 32 directs that the judgment, if against the defendant, shall be "for the maintenance of the child,"—a civil judgment. If the incidental power given by § 35 to impose a penalty of $10 conflicts with the entire balance of the chapter and the evident purpose of this long-established legislation, then that provision should be held a nullity, and not the other provisions and evident intent of the entire chapter.

2. But the addition of the penalty of $10 cannot consistently be held to change this proceeding, which is essentially civil in its nature, and has always been so held till very recently, into a criminal action. In exactly similar manner it is provided that the board of county commissioners are liable in certain cases for all losses sustained in the collection of taxes, and also guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to a fine of not less than $500. Code, § 2075. Again, Code, § 2703, provides that the sheriff, for failure to make proper returns of the election for state officers, is liable to forfeit $2,000 to anyone who shall sue for the same, and shall be guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. In the same manner a penalty of $2,500 is allowed against the sheriff for failure to settle his taxes, and is added to the amount of the judgment. State, Davenport, v. McKee, 98 N. C. 500. But it was not held that this made such proceeding a criminal action. There are numerous like cases. Can it be contended that because, in these cases, a fine or imprisonment is imposed, the civil action is turned into a criminal proceeding, so that the defendant has the benefit of a superior number of challenges, the benefit of reasonable doubt, and if he gets a verdict by errors of the judge in the court below there is no review by an appeal? In bastardy proceedings the woman is given the right to institute proceedings to obtain judgment for the maintenance of the child by the defendant, and that he pay in a sum fixed by the court for that purpose, and if the penalty of $10 is a criminal proceeding, it is simply, as in the above instances, a separate matter which cannot change the woman's civil remedy into a criminal proceeding which would protect the man from review by appeal if the civil issue is found in his favor. If the provisions of §§ 32 and 35 are incompatible, the latter, being merely incidental, and not the former, should give way. They should, however, rather be construed together, and, if so, § 32 gives the woman a civil proceeding, and § 35 is a criminal proceeding (as in so many sections of the Code, of which two sections are above cited) for the petty penalty limited to $10.

3. If, however, the recent doctrine were reiterated that the incidental $10 penalty changes the whole nature of the proceeding, still it does not follow that the express provision of the statute giving the woman the right of appeal is unconstitutional. The provision that no one shall be twice in jeopardy means simply that no one shall be tried in another action for a criminal offense after a verdict either of conviction or acquittal in a trial for the same offense. It does not forbid a review of the same case by appeal, which is merely a continuation or prolongation of the same. It is true that appeals, except on special verdicts and in certain other limited cases, are not given to the state. But that restriction is simply by virtue of the statute, and not by any constitutional provision. State v. Taylor, 1 Hawks, 462, is put expressly on that ground, and is cited as authority for a similar ruling in State v. Credle, 63 N. C. 506. Accordingly, appeals from a general verdict of not guilty were recognized in this state (State v. Haddock, 2 Hayw. (N. C.) 162; State v. M'Lelland, N. C. Conf. Rep. 523) till restricted by statute (Acts 1815, chap. 895). But, even if this be a criminal proceeding, the legislature has chosen to give the "woman and the affiant" the right to appeal, and in so doing the legislative department acted within the limits of its constitutional authority. That an appeal can be authorized by statute on behalf of the state from a judgment discharging the prisoner on a special verdict, or on a motion to quash, or in arrest of judgment, or from a verdict procured by fraud, is conclusive that the cases in which the state can appeal from a judgment and verdict in favor of the defendant, are to be determined by the statute law. If this be a criminal action, the Code (§ 32), by giving the affiant or the woman the right of appeal, has simply added this proceeding to the instances in which the state can appeal from a judgment discharging the defendant. The matter lies entirely with the people, acting through their representatives in the legislature. It is not likely that they will increase the number of instances already existing by law in which the state can appeal from a judgment in a criminal action discharging the defendant, but the power exists. The Constitution forbids that a defendant be tried for the same offense in another action. The statute allows a defendant to apply for another trial in the same action, and that the state may do the same in certain specified instances. It is in the legislative power to increase or diminish at will the instances in which the state may have the matter re-examined upon appeal.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Dennis J. GRIFFIN
v.
UNITED ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY.

1. The question of due care in touching an electric-light wire on the outside of a building, by a person who is not an expert, is for the jury.

2. Touching an electric-light wire is not negligence, as a matter of law, when touched by a tinsmith with a conductor pipe on the outside of a building, who does not know that an electric-light wire would do any hurt, or that such wires run on the outside of buildings.

3. The duty of insulating electric-light

NOTE.—Negligence as to electric wires on or in buildings.

I. In general.
II. Wires on roofs.
III. Contributory negligence.

I. In general.

The extent to which electric wires, some of them carrying dangerous currents of electricity, have in recent years been placed in buildings or on the roofs or attached to their walls, has suddenly given rise to very important questions respecting the care required to prevent injury to persons from contact with such wires. A considerable number of important cases have already been decided in which this question was presented.

In one of the first cases of this sort there was involved a failure to comply with a municipal ordinance requiring an electric-light company to have the splices on its wires perfectly insulated. But it is doubtful if this ordinance added anything to the duty or liability of the company, as it would seem to be very clearly chargeable, on general principles of law, with the duty to provide such insulation for dangerous electric-light wires when stretched 2 or 3 feet above the roof of a building. This was the case of Clements v. Louisiana Electric-Light Co. 44 La. Ann. 692, 16 L. R. A. 43. It is more fully discussed under infra, II., as to Wires on roofs.

What is called an electrical explosion is described in Yates v. Southwestern Brush Electric Light & P. Co. 40 La. Ann. 467. In this case wires passing into a building to convey electricity for incandescent lighting by contact with other wires outside of the building became accidentally charged with an arc current of high tension. This resulted in causing an explosion of a brass pipe through which the electric wire ran, and fragments thereof wounded a person engaged in the building. The safety fuses or safety catches which had been provided to prevent such accidents were insufficient, either in number or capacity, to break the circuit and cut off the flow of electricity accidentally received by the wire outside of the building. The court held that the insufficiency of the fuses or catches was the proximate cause of the accident, and that the electric-light company was liable for the damages.

An injury to the servant of a contractor in repairing a house, by contact with the untaped ends of electric-light service wires bearing a low tension wires running on the outside of a building is owed to every person who for purposes of business is rightfully upon the premises.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Hampden County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. B. Carroll and W. H. McClintock for plaintiff.

Mr. William H. Brooks, for defendant:

The plaintiff was not in the exercise of due care. He had his choice of methods in putting up the conductor, and there was no necessity for his coming in contact with this wire, directly or indirectly.

Lothrop v. Fitchburg R. Co. 150 Mass. 423; Boyle v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 151 Mass. 102; Thompson v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 391; Watts v. Boston Tow Boat Co. 161 Mass. 378.

This was an unnecessary exposure to a danger which the plaintiff knew or ought to have known.

There was no statutory requirement that the wires should be insulated with any kind of covering, and there is no statute giving the plaintiff any right of action for an injury arising from his coming in contact with these wires. If he has any such right it must be on the principles of the common law.

The defendant was not negligent.

Hector v. Boston Electric Light Co. supra.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort, for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by receiving an electrical shock from a wire of the defendant company. The plaintiff was a tinsmith, and was at work, with a fellow servant, placing a galvanized iron conductor on the rear of a building called the American House. He was upon the ground, and his fellow servant was on a ladder near the roof of the building, which was about 22 feet from the ground. The wire from which the plaintiff received the shock ran along the wall of another building until it reached a point about 2 feet from a corner of from 115 to 230, which was insufficient to cause death or great bodily harm, was held not to make the electric company liable, in Mullen v. Edison Electric Illum. Co. 13 Misc. 392. Here the wires had been disconnected from the house-distributing wires pending repairs on the house, and were inclosed in a box about 8 feet from the cellar floor, where they would have caused no injury if the man had not stood upon a box and taken hold of the ends of two of them at the same time, so as to make a short circuit.

In the case of GRIFFIN v. UNITED ELECTRIC LIGHT CO. an electric-light wire ran along the wall of a building, and thence for 8 or 10 feet, at the height of about 12 feet from the ground, to another building. As the insulating material had become worn off at some places upon it, and a person was injured in consequence, the negligence of the electric-light company owning the wire was held to be a question for the jury.

A peculiar case of the destruction of a building by a wire attached to it is that of Jackson v. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. 88 Wis. 243, 26 L. R. A. 101, where a dead telephone wire was left attached to a building, running from that to a pole on another building, from which it conveyed lightning which struck the pole to the former building, causing its destruction. In this case the wire was originally attached to the building without the owner's consent, and was negligently left there. The court held that this negligence was the proximate cause of the destruction of the building by lightning.

II. Wires on roofs.

In the case already mentioned, of Clements v. Louisiana Electric-Light Co. 44 La. Ann. 692, 16 L. R. A. 43, in which there was a failure to comply with an ordinance to have the splices on electric-light wires perfectly insulated, such wires ran about 2 feet 4 inches over the roof of a gallery. Two of these wires were about 17 inches distant from each other, and were fastened to a support or horse. The wires were visible and to all appearances were safe, but there was a defect in the insulation which caused the death of a person who attempted to go over or under the wires. The court held that the electric-light company was responsible for his death. The wires were over a roof to which people in adjoining rooms had access, and where, in the course of time, mechanics must go to make repairs or laborers to sweep off or clean the roof. The court said: "It was the duty of the company, independent of any statutory regulation, to see that their lines were safe for those who by their occupation were brought in close proximity to them."

Placing electric-light wires over the metallic roof of a hotel where persons may come in contact with them, without raising them high enough to prevent such contact, is held in Giraudi v. Electric Improv. Co. 107 Cal. 120, 28 L. R. A. 596, to be negligent in case of injury to a person by an electric shock from such wires. The electric-light company was therefore held liable for such injury to an employee of the hotel, who went out with his employer in a dark night, during a heavy rain storm, and accidentally came in contact with the electric-light wires. The wires were supposed to be insulated, but, either by reason of the wet or of imperfection in the insulation, they conveyed an injurious electric shock. The court says if the wire was not in good condition it was the fault of the electric-light company.

It may be proper to mention here that an ordinance prohibiting the suspension of electric wires over or upon the roofs of buildings was sustained in Electric Improv. Co. v. San Francisco City & County (C. C. N. D. Cal.) 45 Fed. Rep. 593, 13 L. R. A. 131. It is held to be within the legitimate police power of a city, where the suspension is extremely dangerous, both as being liable to originate fires and as obstructing the extinguishment of fires otherwise originated.

In the recent case of Ennis v. Gray, 87 Hun, 355, the plaintiff was by occupation a roofer, and at the time of the accident was at work on a cornice of a house in New York. Upon the cornice, near the end, and not far from the wall of the house, was a converter, which is an electrical device whereby a portion of the very powerful current carried over the main street conduits of electric-light lines is withdrawn on to the distributing lines for house formed by this building with the American House, and then ran diagonally across the corner to the wall of the American House, at a point 8 or 10 feet from the same corner, where it entered a square iron-block attached to the wall of the American House. This wire was about 12 feet from the ground. Six or 8 inches higher than this wire, and about 8 inches nearer to the building, another wire ran along, and went into the same box. The conductor was to be placed in the corner formed by the two buildings, for the purpose of carrying off water from a gutter under the eaves of the American House. We are of opinion that there was evidence for the jury that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care. The jury might well have found, on the evidence, that the injury was caused by the pipe coming in contact with a place on the wire where the insulating material had become worn off. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that this condition was so apparent to the plaintiff that he must have seen it, or ought to have seen it, although the accident happened in the forenoon. While an expert may consider it dangerous to touch any wire, unless he knows it to be a harmless one, there was evidence that the plaintiff was not an expert, and did not know that an electric light wire would do any hurt, or that electric light wires ran on the sides of buildings. The question of his due care was for the jury. Illingsworth v. Boston Electric Light Co. 161 Mass. 583, 588, 25 L. R. A. 552.

We are of opinion, also, that there was evidence of the defendant's negligence, proper to be considered by the jury. There was certainly evidence that the insulation of the wire was gone, and its condition was such that the jury might have found, from the description given of it by the witnesses, that it had been in that condition for such a length of time that the defendant ought to have known of it. The plaintiff was not a trespasser, or a mere licensee, who must take the premises of another as he finds them. He was rightfully on the premises, for purposes of business. On these premises the defendant had rightfully placed, as the case finds, two electric wires. These were a lighting in such a manner as to be changed into a current of comparatively small potential, but greater volume, for the purposes of domestic lighting. The cornice in question was 2 feet and 2 inches wide, and the distance between the converter and the wall was 14½ inches. The converter was connected by wires to a cable carrying a current of a thousand volts in a standpipe coming up from the street at the south end of the cornice. The wires ran from the standpipe to two fuse boxes on top of the converter, the primary wires hanging between the converter and the wall. The testimony showed that the plaintiff was on his knees facing south, and had in his hand a small whisk broom, and was sweeping the tin roof around the northeast corner of the converter when he received a shock and became unconscious. He was found shortly after, with his clothes on fire, lying between the converter and the wall. Upon the questions of how the accident happened, and whether there was any negligence, it was shown that the insulation had worn off from the wires on the cornice in five places, and also that a splice or joint of the wires was left entirely uninsulated. An electrician also testified that to put the wires and converter on the cornice in front of a window and where they were exposed to contact with anyone on the cornice was improper construction. The court held that this was sufficient evidence of negligence. The defendant tried to escape liability by alleging that there was no contractual relation with the plaintiff, that he had not contracted with the plaintiff to install the apparatus, and that as to the plaintiff the construction and maintenance of the apparatus were res inter alios. The court, however, held that the defendant was engaged in supplying electric-light to the houses and streets, and, considering the high voltage of the wires, which rendered the business dangerous unless conducted with care and skill, there was a duty, not only to the public generally, who in the streets might come in contact with the wires, but also with respect to any individual engaged in a lawful occupation where he was entitled as of right to be. The court says that as the defendant was engaged in placing wires in streets and making connections with houses intended for occupancy, and as his business was of a character highly dangerous and likely to result in injury to others unless it was conducted with care and prudence, the duty was created, in the conduct and management of such business, of using the necessary care and prudence to prevent the happening of the accident.

In case a city and an electric-light company both have wires on one frame on the roof of a building, the negligence of the electric-light company in leaving uninsulated joints of its wires within 12 or 15 inches of the frame, up which persons are required to go in the performance of duty, makes that company liable to a lineman in the employ of the city for injuries received by accidental contact with such uninsulated wire. Illingsworth v. Boston Electric Light Co. 161 Mass. 583, 25 L. R. A. 552. The fact that contact with an electric-light wire, though bare and uninsulated, would cause no injury unless other conditions supervened, was held in this case to constitute no defense for leaving it uninsulated, where other circumstances were likely to occur which would make the wire dangerous.

But the lack of safe insulation of electric wires over the roof of a building to which no wires of any kind are attached, and on which persons have no right to go by reason of permission to use a standard for the support of wires, which is located on a neighboring building, does not make the electric-light company liable to a lineman of a telegraph and telephone company whose duty it is to affix a telephone wire to such standard, but who goes on the roof of the former building and there comes in contact with a defectively insulated wire; even if he was there with permission of the owner of the building. Hector v. Boston Electric Light Co. 161 Mass. 558, 25 L. R. A. 554.

The court says that whatever may be the duty of the electric-light company to the owner of that building and to its servants, there is no evidence that it intended to authorize the use of that roof by the telegraph and telephone company or its servants, and that whatever duty the electric-light company owed to a servant of the telegraph and telephone company under its license to the latter company to use the standard for the support of telegraph or telephone wires, this duty cannot be held to extend over the whole circuit of the electric-light wires, and that the electric-light company is not required for the protection of the servants of the telegraph and telephone company to maintain an effectual insulation of its wires over other buildings than that on which the standard was placed, and at places where it had no reason to expect the servants of the other company would go in the performance of their duties in using its standard, and where it source of danger, unless properly insulated. This fact was recognized by the defendant, by insulating them. But it was negligent if it failed to use reasonable diligence in seeing that its wires were kept in a state of repair. This duty it owed at least to every person who, for purposes of business, was rightfully upon the premises. What its duty was, in this respect, as to other persons, we have no occasion to inquire. See Illingsworth v. Boston Electric Light Co. supra.

The ruling of the justice of the superior court in favor of the defendant is stated in the report, upon which the case comes before us, to be based upon the case of Hector v. Boston Electric Light Co. 161 Mass. 558, 25 L. R. A. 554. But that case differs essentially from the one before us. There a lineman of a telegraph and telephone company was sent to attach a wire to a standard owned by the defendant on the roof of a building numbered 45 Temple Place, in Boston. Instead of entering this building, and going out upon the roof, he went up through the building numbered 29 Temple place, passed over the roofs of several intervening buildings until he came to the roof of No. 41, which was next to, but higher than, the roof of No. 45. A bunch of wires ran from the standard on No. 45 over a small portion of the roof of No. 41. The plaintiff stooped under these wires, to see how he could get onto the roof of No. 45, and was injured by reason of the insulation being worn off from one of these wires. The case was decided in favor of the defendant upon the ground that the defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff to maintain an effectual insulation of its wires over other buildings than that upon which its standard was placed, which was the only place to which the telegraph and telephone company sent the plaintiff, or where he had a right to be. In the case at bar the plaintiff was rightfully where he was when injured. The question of the defendant's negligence was for the jury.

By the terms of the report, the order must be: Case to stand for trial.

had neither invited nor licensed them to go. In this case a verdict for plaintiff was set aside on exception to rulings.

So, where a boy went on the roof of a coal shed to get a ball, and came in contact with a naked copper wire used to conduct electricity to light a railroad station and works, it was held that the railroad company maintaining the wire was not liable, because the boy was at most a mere licensee. Sullivan v. Boston & A. R. Co. 156 Mass. 378. In this case a verdict was directly for defendant.

In most of the above cases the question of negligence in respect to dangerous wires is held to be a question for the jury, and it may be doubtful if the two cases just referred to ought to have been exceptions, and if they do not too strictly apply the rule as to assumption of risks by licensees or trespassers. It is not very clear that the owner of an electric wire carrying a dangerous current ought to be at liberty to leave it uncovered and uninsulated where any person, although a mere licensee or trespasser, is liable to come in contact with it. Even licensees or trespassers seem entitled to protection against such dangers, as much as against danger from excavations near a highway or frequented path. That they are entitled to protection in the latter class of cases, see note to Lepnick v. Gaddis (Miss.) 26 L. R. A. 686. Manifestly the right to such protection increases with the extent of the danger.

III. Contributory negligence.

On the question what constitutes contributory negligence in case of an injury to a person by an electric wire in or upon a building, the case is usually, if not always, for the jury. So it was held in Clements v. Louisiana Electric Light Co. 44 La. Ann. 692, 16 L. R. A. 43, where a tinsmith employed to repair a roof attempted to step over or to go under electric-light wires about 2 feet 4 inches above the roof, and there was nothing to indicate that the wires were not properly insulated. It was not certain in this case whether he attempted to step over or go under the wires, but the court held that with wires of that height it was not negligence to attempt either mode of passing them, if all necessary and prudent care was used in proportion to the danger. It was also declared that such workman had a right to believe that the wires were properly insulated in compliance with an ordinance requiring their insulation.

So, where an employee in a hotel went out on a metallic roof in a dark night to help his employer secure signs which seemed to be endangered by a heavy rain, and came in contact with electric-light wires which he knew were above the roof, but which he may not have known were dangerous, his negligence was held to be a question for the jury. Giraudi v. Electric Improv. Co. 107 Cal. 120, 28 L. R. A. 596.

So, the negligence of a lineman in going up a frame for the support of electric wires, on which were electric-light wires as well as fire-alarm wires on which he was working, is held to be a question for the jury, where his plyers caught on a wire and in endeavoring to free them his hand came in contact with uninsulated joints of electric-light wires within 12 or 15 inches of the frame. Illingsworth v. Boston Electric Light Co. 161 Mass. 583, 25 L. R. A. 552.

Likewise, in Ennis v. Gray, 87 Hun, 355, the contributory negligence of a roofer at work on a cornice was held to be a question for the jury, when he was injured by an electric shock from wires connected with a converter by which a portion of the powerful current in main street conduits of an electric-light line is withdrawn to distributing wires for house lighting.

(April 4, 1896.);

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ohio County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of services rendered by plaintiff for defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. P. Hubbard and Henry M. Russell, for plaintiff in error:

The conversation testified to by the plaintiff, if for the moment and for the purpose of argument it may be described as a contract, was directly within the provisions of the statute of frauds.

A contract of that nature, if it is to be used for any purpose as an element of the plaintiff's case, is clearly within the reason of the statute of frauds.

Dunphy v. Ryan, 116 U. S. 491, 29 L ed. 703.

The claim that a contract which is not enforceable because not in writing may be used to rebut the presumption that services were rendered without expectation of specific wages for them, is directly in conflict with the law governing the class of cases to which this case belongs.

NOTE.—On the question of a presumption as to gratuitous services rendered to one occupying a parental relation, see Ulrich v. Ulrich (N. Y.) 18 L. R. A. 37, and cases there cited.

Where the claim is not against an estate, and the parties are brother-in law and sister-in-law, and the services were not household duties, and the parties treated each other simply as proprietor and clerk, a contract to pay for the services should be implied from very slight circumstances.

When there is evidence of a contract, if it be unwritten, it is always for the jury to say whether it establishes the claim of the plaintiff or not.

If there was not an express contract there was either an implied contract or an obligation created by law.

Dent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

George L. Durst, defendant, on writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court of Ohio county rendered in favor of Amelia C. Plate on the 26th day of February, 1895, for the sum of $877.40, interest and costs, assigns the following errors, to wit: "(1) The said circuit court erred in admitting certain evidence against your petitioner's objections, on the trial of the cause before the jury. (2) The circuit court erred in excluding from the jury, upon the trial of the cause, certain evidence offered by your petitioner. (3) The circuit court erred in overruling your petitioner's motion, made when the plaintiff rested her case, to exclude the plaintiff's evidence from the jury. (4) The circuit court erred in giving to the jury certain instructions against your petitioner's objections, and in refusing to give certain instructions requested by your petitioner, and in modifying certain other instructions requested by your petitioner. (5) The circuit court erred in overruling your petitioner's motion to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant him a new trial."

As to the third assignment, it is sufficient to say that the law concerning the same has been settled by repeated decisions of this court to the effect that a motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence is waived by the defendant when he elects to proceed with the case, and introduces evidence in defense. Core v. Ohio River R. Co. 38 W. Va. 456, followed by a number of cases decided, but not yet reported.

Able counsel hotly contested the present case from beginning to end, and allowed no point of advantage to escape their ever-vigilant eyes. So that every possible chance for an exception is presented for the consideration of this court. The main and important questions for consideration—and, indeed, all other questions—arise on the motion to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant a new trial. No one informed of the circumstances could, in any view, consider the damages excessive or exorbitant. The proof is abundant to establish the nature and value of the services rendered, and there is therefore but the naked legal question as to whether the evidence is sufficient to justify any recovery; in other words, whether the services, however valuable, were given gratuitously in excess of voluntary gifts on the one part, and received on the other without any expectancy of recompense or remuneration.

The material facts in the case are as follows, to wit: When the plaintiff was about twelve years of age, in the absence of other home, she went to live with the defendant, her brother in-law. This was in the year 1885. For the first three or four years she was sent to school, and during the whole period she lived in the family as the defendant's own daughter might have done. She was furnished with a comfortable room, with suitable clothing and other necessaries, was supplied with money for shopping and other purposes, accompanied the defendant's wife on various pleasure trips, went to the World's Fair with money furnished by the defendant, received numerous presents at Christmas and other times, and was treated by the defendant with great kindness and consideration in every way. On her part the plaintiff rendered services such as might have been required and expected from a daughter; attending to the marketing, and assisting in the care of the young children. In addition to these services the plaintiff assisted the defendant in his store, attending to customers, looking after entertainments the defendant had in charge, and doing whatever else the exigencies of the business, and her own capacities, from time to time suggested. The defendant and his wife had an unfortunate misunderstanding, and in August, 1894, the defendant's wife with her two young children, went to Oakland, accompanied by the plaintiff and another friend. The misunderstanding had existed for some time, and there had been more or less coolness between the plaintiff and the defendant on account of it. The Oakland party made their preparations without informing the defendant, and started off with no more notice to him, according even to the plaintiff's claim, than a statement, just as they were going out of the door, that they were going to Oakland. The defendant resented this, and when the plaintiff and the others returned he told the plaintiff that she could leave his home. She did so and soon afterwards instituted this action. During all the time of the plaintiff's stay with the defendant, she had never received or demanded any pay for her services. The money, clothing, and presents which she received she herself says were not regarded as wages. She never brought forward in any way the question of compensation, and, even after the alleged conversation on which the case was made to turn in the court below, no visible change was made in the relations between the parties. According to the plaintiff's testimony, a conversation took place four years before August, 1894, late one evening in the store of the defendant. This conversation was repeated several times in the plaintiff's testimony, and was given by her as follows: "Mr. Durst asked me if I was tired. I said, 'Yes, sir.' and he said, 'How long have you been with me now?' and I told him, 'Five years;' and he said, 'Well, when you are with me ten years I will give you $1,000.'" On another occasion, defendant remarked that when she (the plaintiff) should get married he would give her $1,000, and a $500 diamond ring. Defendant does not positively deny either of these conversations, except as to the time of the first, but intimates that he was not in earnest, but jesting. It must be admitted, in any view of the matter, that this was jesting on a very serious subject to this unfortunate and parentless young girl,—still in the eyes of the law, an infant,—engaged early and late, week days and Sundays, at home and abroad, actively, earnestly, and faithfully endeavoring to promote the worldly interests of the defendant. Jokes are sometimes taken seriously by the young and inexperienced in the deceptive ways of the business world, and if such is the case, and thereby the person deceived is led to give valuable services in the full belief and expectation that the joker is in earnest, the law will also take the joker at his word, and give him good reason to smile. The law discountenances deceit, even practised under the form of a jest, if the weak, immature, or confiding are thereby imposed on to their injury. Where the law raises a presumption of gratuitous service, because of the relationship of the parties, the person rendering such service must rebut such presumption by either showing an express contract, "or such facts and circumstances as will authorize the jury to find the services were rendered in expectation by one of receiving, and by the other of making, compensation." This is the rule as announced in the case of Riley v. Riley, 38 W. Va. 290, and followed in the case of Cann v. Cann, 40 W. Va. 138. In this case there is no express contract on which the plaintiff could sue, and hence it must be determined whether, in the absence thereof, the facts and circumstances warranted the finding of the jury. The services were rendered in advancement of the defendant's business. They were valuable and necessary, and he so regarded them. Up until she was seventeen, nothing was said as to compensation; but she was clothed, fed, furnished spending money, and received some so-called presents from the hands of the defendant. She had then arrived at an age when she had become quite proficient in his business,—that of a caterer and confectioner; was very useful to him, and diligent and attentive about his business. It was also quite time for her to begin thinking about her own future. He, as a sensible business man, undoubtedly realized this fact, and also that he was receiving gratuitously services to which he was not wholly entitled, and that, as soon as she became fully informed as to her own worth and rights, she would ask compensation at his hands, or seek other employment. Under such circumstances as this, he, in a sympathetic manner, approached plaintiff, and asked her if she was tired, and she answered, "Yes." He then asked her how long she had been with him, and she replied, "Five years." He said, "When you are with me ten years, I will give you $1,000." And at another time, admitted by the defendant, he told her that when she got married he would give her $1,000 and diamond earrings. For five years she had given unremitting service to his affairs, and he, evidently moved by a righteous obligation to do so, temporarily inspires her with the hope of future reward. The defendant says he was not in earnest, but only jesting. Admitting such to be the case, these conversations, whether he was in earnest or not, were calculated to mislead her, and leave the impression on her mind that in any event he would deal justly by her, and fully compensate her for her services; and in this manner he retained her in his employ until it suited his convenience to discharge her without compensation, which he did, to say the least, in an unkind and heartless manner, ill becoming a stranger, much less a brother-in-law. And now it devolves upon us to say whether she is entitled to pay for what her services were actually worth, or does the law, from the fact that he was only misleading her, and never intended to pay her, excuse him from doing so? A person is estopped from denying the sincerity of his conduct, to the injury of a person misled thereby. We therefore must conclude that these promises, in spite of the declaration of the defendant to the contrary, were made in sincerity, as an inducement to her future service. As these promises are not here sued on, the question of the statute of frauds does not arise; but, the plaintiff having been prevented by the defendant from performing her part of the undertaking, she is entitled to recover for the services already rendered, in view of the compensation promised. 2 Tucker, Bl. Com. 131; 1 Story, Cont. §§ 12, 18, 21; Brooks v. Scott, 2 Munf. 345. The conversations were therefore proper to go to the jury, not as a complete basis of recovery, within themselves, but as facts and circumstances tending to rebut the presumption that the services were gratuitous, and to show the peculiar means adopted by the defendant to induce the plaintiff to remain quietly in his service, to promote his pecuniary interests, without expecting, on his part, to be called upon to compensate her therefor. The statute of frauds cannot be used as an instrument of fraud. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 860; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 339; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 658, 660, 661.

The plaintiff asked the court to give the jury seven instructions. The court gave two, to both of which the defendant objected. The defendant asked for ten instructions. The court gave two modified, and gave six, and refused to give two. For this court to copy into its opinion, and comment on, all these instructions separately, is an unnecessary and burdensome task not required of it, in the due and orderly administration of justice, but would greatly interfere with the consideration, and occupy the space belonging to other more weighty matters. And when the court finds, on examination of the whole case, that substantial justice has been done, it will not reverse the judgment, simply to gratify litigious dispositions, for any error committed by the circuit court, unless such error, if it had not been committed, would have tended, in some measure, to have produced a different result.

Defendant's counsel, in their able, scholarly, and exhaustive brief, complain of the admission into the record by the circuit court of "a mass of useless verbiage and trifling repetition," which they ask this court to remedy. In view of the many exceptions and instructions "useless in verbiage and trifling in repetition," with which the counsel have encumbered the record, their attention is respectfully called to the celebrated decision of a beam against a mote with which they are familiar. Since, by the provisions of § 9, chap. 131, Code, this court is required to consider the whole evidence, there appears no other way properly to do so, except on a certificate of the whole evidence just as it was taken in the circuit court, unless counsel mutually waive this provision, and certify the facts proved. The circuit court should be commended, instead of condemned, for obeying the law strictly, although it may uselessly add to the cost of litigation. The legislature, and not the court, should provide the remedy.

Most of the instructions asked by the defendant, and refused or modified, were based on the theory that the plaintiff was bound to prove a distinct or express contract; and they were modified by the court so as to include a mutual understanding, to be derived from the circumstances and relationship of the parties, and in no event could she recover unless it appeared that the defendant expected to pay her for her services. These instructions were founded on the law as stated in the cases of Riley v. Riley, and Cann v. Cann, before cited. Both those cases were suits against decedents' estates, wherein one of the alleged contracting parties was dead, and therefore the other was held to a strict compliance with the law. In this case both parties are alive, and both testify. If the defendant had been dead, and the plaintiff had just as fully established her case as she has done with him living, her right to recovery would have been unquestionable. Thompson v. Stevens, 71 Pa. 162; Pollock v. Ray, 85 Pa. 428; Thornton v. Grange, 66 Barb. 507; Young v. Herman, 97 N. C. 283; Howe v. North, 69 Mich. 272; Hogg v. Laster, 56 Ark. 382. But the defendant being alive, and being permitted to testify that he had no expectation or intention of compensating the plaintiff for her services, but what he said with regard thereto was a mere jest, distinguishes this case from the cases above cited, so as to render the principle established by them to some extent inapplicable to the present case. His having fully established the want of intention or expectation on his part presents the question whether, in the absence of such expectation or intention, the law, against his will and protest, will compel him to pay her what her services were reasonably worth. In § 508, 1 Story, Cont., it is said that, if a contract is understood by the parties thereto as a mere jest, it has no binding force. But it is also held that if one of the parties thereto accepted it in earnest, and acted thereon to his own detriment and loss, to that extent it would be binding and valid. Armstrong v. M'Ghee, Add. Rep. 261; 1 Story, Cont. § 12, note 1. In Addison on Contracts, 24, it is said: "In a third class of cases the law prescribes the rights and liabilities of persons who have not in reality entered into any contract at all with one another, but between whom circumstances have arisen which make it just that one should have a right, and the other should be subject to a liability, similar to the rights and liabilities which exist in certain cases of express contract. Thus, if one man has obtained money from another through the medium of oppression, imposition, extortion, or deceit, or by the commission of a trespass, such money may be recovered back; for the law implies a promise from the wrongdoer to restore it to the rightful owner, although it is obvious that this is the very opposite of his intention. Implied or constructive contracts of this nature are similar to the constructive trusts of courts of equity, and, in fact, are not contracts at all." When any deceit is practised, by which a man obtains the labor, money, or other property of another, with the other's consent, in the expectation of recompense, although such deceiver has no intention of paying therefor, but expects the benefit thereof wholly without just recompense, the law implies a quasi or constructive contract; for it never permits a wrongdoer to take advantage of his own wrong, to the detriment or injury of another. The plaintiff was deceived into the belief, by the kindness, conduct, and conversations of the defendant, that he intended to faithfully compensate her services, justly and fully, at such time as she might marry, or reach an age when she might feel like undertaking business for herself; and he thereby secured her careful attention, labor, and co-operation in the advancement of his business affairs. But, before the time arrives for his meeting his promised undertaking, he gets rid of her, without fulfilment of such undertaking, and pleads that he was merely jesting, and that, as he never intended or expected to compensate her for her services he is entitled to them gratuitously. She testifies that she accepted his promises in earnest, and expected him to fulfil them. What course she might have pursued, had these promises not been made to her, it is impossible for us to say, except that, presumptively, at least, as soon as her eyes became open to her true worth, she would have asked him to pay her a just wage, or have sought other employment, although, on account of her tender years and female dependency, she may have hesitated to take such a step. However this may be, his jesting promises, taken by her in earnest, were sufficient to justify the court in compelling him to treat her with fairness and honesty. The instructions, therefore, in so far as they required the existence of a distinct contract or a mutual understanding, were erroneous as to the plaintiff; but the jury having properly disregarded them, and found a verdict in her favor, in accordance with the law as it should have been given them, they furnish no grounds for the reversal of the judgment thereon. We therefore conclude that the circuit court did not err in refusing to give any of the defendant's instructions, or in giving any of the plaintiff's, but the errors committed were against the plaintiff, wholly. Numerous exceptions were taken by the defendant as to the admission and refusal to admit evidence, but, if the circuit court erred in all of these (which is in no wise apparent, from our view of this case), such errors could not have possibly changed the just result reached.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF PARKERSBURG
v.
William W. HARKNESS and John W. Dudley, Admr., etc., of Samuel Simes, Deceased, Plff. in Err.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. A pledge is a bailment of goods by a debtor to his creditor, to be kept by him until his debt is discharged.

2. Where a party residing in Philadelphia gives the following order to his agent in the the city of Parkersburg: "Mr. C. S. Fewsmith, Parkersburg, W. Va.: Will you please hold to the order of Peter C. Hollis and J. L. Richards, trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes, deceased, my stock of lubricating oil stored in my oil tank in Parkersburg, W. Va., as collateral security for the return of $7,500, borrowed and received of them, and oblige, truly, Wm. W. Harkness;"—which paper was indorsed: "Accepted. Parkersburg, W. Va., May 23rd, 1888. [Signed] Crowell S. Fewsmith,"—said Fewsmith being at the time the agent of said Harkness in possession of said oil,—the acceptance of such order transferred the possession of the oil to said trustees of Samuel Simes, deceased, and the oil was thereby pledged for the payment of said borrowed money.

3. An attachment subsequently levied upon said property as the property of said William W. Harkness would be subject to the lien created by said pledge.

4. Although said pledge was evidenced by writing, it need not be recorded to make it effective as a lien on said oil.

(April 8, 1896.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wood County to review a judgment disallowing a claim of petitioner to certain oil owned by defendant Harkness which had been attached by plaintiff and which defendant Dudley claimed under a pledge from Harkness. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. W. Vandervort, for plaintiff in error:

If the transaction was a pledge the papers need not have been recorded and petitioner is entitled to the oil as against subsequent attaching creditors.

Doak v. Bank of the State, 6 Ired. L. 309.

A pledge is a bailment of personal property as security for some debt or engagement.

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 588; Jones, Pledges, § 14; Bank of British Columbia v. Marshall, 11 Fed. Rep. 19; Schouler, Bailm. § 205; St. Losky v. Davidson, 6 Cal. 647.

A transfer of property as collateral security for a debt is now regarded as a pledge unless the form of the transfer be clearly a mortgage in its terms.

Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 5.

The delivery of possession is sufficient wherever it would be so in case of a sale of the same property.

Parks v. Hall, 2 Pick. 207.

It is not necessary that the pledgee should place anyone in charge over such property, or that he should immediately take any other possession of it after the possession constructively given.

Jones, Pledges, § 36; Jewett v. Warren, 12 Mass. 300, 7 Am. Dec. 74.

Possession by owner is not conclusive evidence of fraud.

Macomber v. Parker, 14 Pick. 497; Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 479, 24 L. ed. 785.

A delivery of goods to a workman or clerk employed by the pledgeor and possession by such party on behalf of the pledgee, are sufficient to create and continue the lien.

Jones, Pledges, § 35; Homes v. Crane, 2 Pick. 607; Collins' Appeal, 107 Pa. 605, 52 Am. Rep. 479; Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C. 136; Williams v. Gillespie, 30 W. Va. 591; 3 Parsons, Cont. 372; Sumner v. Hamlet, 12 Pick. 76; Fletcher v. Morey, 2 Story, C. C. 555.

Messrs. Hutchinson, Hutchinson, & Camden, for defendant in error:

Possession must accompany a pledge.

Story, Bailm. §§ 287, 288; Homes v. Crane, 2 Pick. 607; Ward v. Sumner, 5 Pick. 59; Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467, 24 L. ed. 779.

The transmutation of possession in this case is not sufficient.

Yenni v. McNamee, 45 N. Y. 621; Williams v. Gillespie, 30 W. Va. 586.

If the possession of Fewsmith had been of such a character as to be effectual to complete the transfer, and therefore to put upon creditors the burden of inquiring how he held the oil, the plaintiff in error could not now avail himself of it because it is admitted that upon inquiry the trustee and agent who had the possession, if anyone, told the bank that the oil belonged to Harkness and concealed the bailment, if any; and the plaintiff in error is now estopped by the act and declara ions of its agent and trustee. Possession was restored to Harkness by such declarations and representations.

English, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 29th day of March, 1894, the First National Bank of Parkersburg brought an action of debt in the circuit court of Wood county against one William W. Harkness, and at the same time obtained an order of attachment directed to the sheriff of Wood county, who levied the same on a certain lot of land situated in the city of Parkersburg, and described in the return on said order of attachment; also upon the following personal property located on said lot, to wit, one iron oil tank of the capacity of about 3,000 barrels, and on about 1,800 barrels of crude oil in said tank, near the outer depot of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Parkersburg, W. Va., on the 30th day of March, 1894, at half past 8 o'clock A. M. On the same day another order of attachment was issued in said suit, directed to the sheriff of Ritchie county, which was levied on the 30th of March, 1894, upon two tracts of land situated in Ritchie county, belonging to said William W. Harkness, described in the return of said sheriff. On the 13th day of July, 1895, John W. Dudley, sheriff of Wood county, and as such administrator with the will annexed of Samuel Simes, deceased, filed a petition against the said First National Bank setting up title to or interest in the oil levied on under said attachment, and advertised to be sold by H. P. Camden and John F. Hutchinson, special commissioners, under attachment and order of sale against William W. Harkness, to which petition the First National Bank appeared by attorneys, and the petitioner filed bond in the penalty of $200, conditioned as required by § 23 of chap. 106 of the Code of 1868, and the counsel agreed to the facts upon the matters arising on said petition and claim, and by agreement a jury was waived, and the whole matter of law and facts submitted to the court. The facts agreed were as follows:

"Upon petition of John W. Dudley, sheriff of Wood county, and as such administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Samuel Simes, deceased, against the First National Bank of Parkersburg: Be it remembered that upon the trial of the matters arising on the foregoing petition the facts in said cause were agreed upon between said petitioner and the First National Bank of Parkersburg, which agreement of facts was in writing, and is in the words and figures following:

"The petitioner and the defendant, the First National Bank of Parkersburg, by their counsel of record in the above-entitled cause, hereby waive a jury to try the matters in controversy presented by said petition, and agree that the whole matter of law and fact shall be submitted to a determination by the court in lieu of a jury, and said parties agree to the facts, as follows: That some years ago, prior to 1886 William W. Harkness, a citizen of Pennsylvania, and resident of Philadelphia, became the owner of about 1,800 barrels of crude petroleum oil which he caused to be stored in an iron tank situate on a lot on Depot street in the city of Parkersburg, county of Wood, and state of West Virginia, which oil and tank and land belong to the said Harkness then and ever since. Harkness gave the order hereinafter mentioned. The said tank and the oil therein have ever since remained on said lot, and the said Harkness has ever since resided in the city of Philadelphia, and has ever since continued to own said lot. Some time after the said Harkness became the owner of said oil, and after he had caused it to be stored in said tank, the said Harkness kept and employed a watchman to guard said oil and tank, and said watchman lived in a house on the premises where the oil tank stands in which said oil was stored. That about the year 1886 C. S. Fewsmith came to Parkersburg to reside, and was employed by the said Harkness as agent to have a general oversight in and over the property of said Harkness and said oil and said tank for the purpose of preserving and protecting the same, which the said Fewsmith did, as the agent of said Harkness, from about the year of 1886 up to the 23d day of May, 1888, when he accepted the order hereinafter mentioned, and thereafter said oil was held as shown by the facts herein admitted; and on and after the date of the acceptance of said order dated May 22, 1888, the trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes, deceased, relied upon said C. S. Fewsmith, holding said oil tank, as their agent under said accepted order, and have never been notified at any time since then by said Fewsmith, Harkness, or any one else that said possession was held by anyone but for said trustees and said estate of said Simes, deceased; but of this order, and their reliance as aforesaid on it and Fewsmith, they gave no notice to said bank or otherwise; and it is not agreed by said bank that said Fewsmith was at any time the agent of said trustees and estate of Simes, but the court will determine whether said Fewsmith was the agent of said trustees and said estate, or of said Harkness, from the facts and circumstances herein stated. Since the lien of said attachment, the possession of the same said oil, etc., has been in John W. Dudley, sheriff of Wood county, under and by virtue of the levy of said attachment in favor of the defendant against the property of W. W. Harkness. From and after said date of said order the said Fewsmith had general watch and supervision over said oil. His expenses and the expenses of the watchman residing upon the premises where said tank stands, and who had immediate control and charge of said oil for Harkness, for the purpose of guarding the same against accident or injury, had and have been paid by William W. Harkness. That during the time said Fewsmith had charge of said tank of oil he resided in the city of Parkersburg, in another part thereof, and away from the lot of land and premises where said oil tank stands, and exercised no other acts of control or possession of said oil except to look after it as stated. That said Fewsmith caused said oil to be insured in the name of said Harkness, and kept it insured, paying the premiums thereon in the name of said Harkness during the time of said insurance, up to within the last year or two; and the taxes on said oil were paid by said Harkness through said Fewsmith, and in the name of said Harkness. It is further agreed that on the 22d day of May, 1888, the said Harkness, then being in Philadelphia, gave the order addressed to the said Fewsmith, a copy of which is filed as an exhibit with the petition in this case, which order the said Fewsmith accepted, as shown on the face of the said order; that after the date of said order and the date of the acceptance thereof said trustees and estate of Samuel Simes, deceased, relied on said Fewsmith as the agent of the trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes, and that they have so continued to rely on C. S. Fewsmith as their agent up to the date for the purposes set forth in said order aforesaid, dated May 22, 1888; but of these claims and said order said bank had no notice, and if said Fewsmith, in managing and controlling said oil, has acted otherwise than as agent of the trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes, except to pay the taxes thereon and insure the same, such dealings had been without any notice thereof to the trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes, deceased, and said bank had no notice of the reliance of said trustees on the claim that Fewsmith was their agent; that the said oil has remained in the same tank, in the same place, on the same lot of said Harkness, precisely as it was at the date of said order of May 22, 1888, under which the petitioner claims in this suit, and since that date no change has been made whatever in the place of storage of said oil, but that the said oil and said tank have there remained and continued down to and including the time of issue of said attachment. It is further agreed that no notice was given of the execution of said order or the acceptance of the same to the public, or to said First National Bank, but that the said Harkness obtained credit, by virtue of the claim of ownership by him of said oil and tank and lot on which it stands, from said First National Bank; and the said Fewsmith and the said Harkness have claimed and represented to the said bank at various times that the said Harkness owned said oil, and the loan made at the First National Bank to the said Harkness, upon which the said suit and attachments in its favor against him was instituted and sued out, was made to him, the said Harkness, upon the representations made by his agent, Crowell S. Fewsmith, that the said Harkness was the owner of said oil and of other property in the state of West Virginia, and in the city of Philadelphia, but it does not appear that any of these facts were disclosed to the estate of Samuel Simes, deceased, or to its trustees or personal representative. It is further agreed that on the 29th day of March, 1894, the First National Bank of Parkersburg instituted an action at law in the circuit court of Wood county, West Virginia, against said Harkness to recover the sum of $6,000 due upon the note of said Harkness, the said bank executing an attachment bond as required by law, whereupon the sheriff of said county, John W. Dudley, by his deputies, levied upon and attached said oil and said tank, and took possession thereof under said attachment, as required by order of attachment in said suit, and since that time the said sheriff has had possession of said oil and tank by virtue of said order of attachment, and not otherwise; that afterwards, in said suit of the said bank against said Harkness, a personal judgment was rendered upon process personally served upon said Harkness, and an order of sale entered therein, directing the sale of said oil and tank and real estate attached to pay said debt of $6,000, with interest and costs; and other banks also sued out attachments and levied upon the property of said Harkness; but of the pendency of said action and of the proceedings therein, including the issuing out of said attachment and of the levy of the same on said tank and oil, the estate of Samuel Simes, nor its trustees nor its personal representatives, had any notice until long after the same had taken place, and not until recently. It is agreed that the papers, affidavits, bonds, orders of attachment, and returns in said suit of the First National Bank of Parkersburg against said Harkness shall be made and considered as parts of this agreement of facts. It is further agreed as a fact that after the said attachment was levied in favor of the First National Bank of Parkersburg, to wit, on the 30th day of April, 1894, the said Harkness, who had accepted service of the summons in the action of the First National Bank of Parkersburg against him, made the memorandum in writing, marked 'Ex. 3,' with the petition in this case, in which he acknowledges the debt of $7,500, due under the note of May 28, 1888, and that said Exhibits Nos. 1, 2, and 3, with the petition in this case, it is admitted, were executed under the circumstances and for the purpose and at the times more fully stated therein. And it is further agreed that the said order of May 22, 1888 — Exhibit No. 2,—filed with said petition, has never been recorded in the office of the county clerk of Wood county, West Virginia, at any time. And it is further agreed that John F. Hutchinson and H. P. Camden, special commissioners, have advertised said tank and oil for sale under and by virtue of an order made in the action in favor of the defendant, the First National Bank of Parkersburg, in which said attachment was issued and levied, and that said sale has been adjourned and continued until July 13, 1895, by H. P. Camden and John F. Hutchinson, special commissioners, and that said special commissioners have advertised for sale July 23, 1895, certain real estate in Wood county, and on August 2, 1895, certain real estate in Ritchie county, for the purpose of realizing proceeds with which to pay said judgment of the First National Bank and other judgments amounting to about $12,000, against said Harkness. It is agreed to submit the whole matter of law and fact to the court for such judgment as he may render, reserving to either party the right to review such judgment by writ of error or otherwise. Witness our hands this 13th day of July, 1895.

"'First National Bank, by Hutchinson, Hutchinson, & Camden.

"And the matters of law and fact, a jury having been waived, were submitted to the court; and the court, after maturely considering the petition and the claim of the said petitioner, dismissed the said petition, and ordered that the First National Bank recover its costs against said petitioner, etc.; and thereupon said petitioner moved the court to set aside said judgment, and grant him a new trial, because said judgment was contrary to the law and the evidence and the facts agreed as aforesaid, which motion, being considered by the court, was overruled; to which opinion and judgment of the court in overruling said motion said petitioner excepts, and prays that this his bill of exception No. 1 may be signed and made part of the record in said cause, which is accordingly done. A. I. Boreman. [Seal.]"

From this judgment John W. Dudley, administrator with the will annexed of Samuel Simes, deceased, obtained this writ of error, and relies upon the following assignments of error: First, that the court erred in its judgment dismissing said petition; second, in refusing to set aside said judgment and grant a new trial to plaintiff in error.

The controversy in this case is in regard to the oil in an iron oil tank described as being of the capacity of about 3,000 barrels, amounting to about 1,800 barrels of crude oil in said tank, described in the levy indorsed on said order of attachment. The defendant in error claims said property by virtue of the levy of said attachment thereon, while the plaintiff in error, as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Samuel Simes, claims it as having been pledged by William W. Harkness to Peter C. Hollis and Joseph L. Richards, trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes, deceased, to secure the payment of $7,500. It appears from the agreement of facts which is made part of the record that prior to the year 1886 the defendant, William W. Harkness, became the owner of about 1,800 barrels of crude petroleum oil, which he caused to be stored in an iron tank situate on a lot on Depot street in the city of Parkersburg, Wood county, W. Va., which lot and oil tank then belonged to said Harkness, and have ever since belonged to him. After said Harkness had caused said oil to be stored in said tank, he employed a watchman to guard said oil tank, who lived in a house on the lot where the oil tank stands in which the oil was stored. About the year 1886 one C. S. Fewsmith came to Parkersburg to reside, and was employed by said Harkness as agent to have a general oversight over the property of said Harkness, and said tank and the oil stored therein, for the purpose of preserving and protecting the same, which said Fewsmith did as the agent of said Harkness from the year 1886 until the 23d day of May, 1888, when he accepted an order from said William W. Harkness, which reads as follows:

Philadelphia, Pa., May 22, 1888.

Mr. C. S. Fewsmith, Parkersburg, W. Va: Will please hold to the order of Peter C. Hollis and J. L. Richards, trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes, deceased, my stock of lubricating oil stored in my oil tank in Parkersburg, W. Va., as collateral security for the return of $7,500, borrowed and received of them and oblige, truly [Signed] Wm. W. Harkness,— which order was accepted by said C. S. Fewsmith in the following words:

Accepted. Parkersburg, W. Va., May 23rd, 1888. [Signed] Crowell S. Fewsmith

What was the legal effect of this order and acceptance? We can regard it in no other light than that of a pledge of the oil in this tank as collateral security for the payment of the sum of $7,500, mentioned in said order, to said trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes, deceased. Jones, in his valuable work on Pledges (§ 1), says: "A pledge may be defined to be a deposit of personal property as security, with an implied power of sale upon default. Lord Holt, who was the first to make a systematic statement of the general law of bailment, defined a pawn to be that sort of bailment, 'when goods or chattels are delivered to another, to be a security to him for money borrowed of him by the bailor.' Sir William Jones defined it to be 'a bailment of goods by a debtor to his creditor, to be kept by him till his debt is discharged.' The definition given it by Judge Story is 'a bailment of personal property as a security for some debt or engagement.'" In order that a pledge of personal property may be effectual, it is necessary that the possession of the property be given to the pledgee. So in the case of Williams v. Gillespie, 30 W. Va. 586, fourth point of syllabus, this court held that an agreement to pledge personal property for the security of a debt is ineffectual to create a pledge of or lien on the property unless the property is put in the possession of the pledgee. Now, in order to determine whether that was done in this instance, we must first consider the character of the property. The tank is an immense iron tub sitting on top of the ground, in this instance having the capacity of 3,000 barrels, and containing 1,800 barrels of crude petroleum. This tank was and is located upon a lot belonging to said William W. Harkness, in the city of Parkersburg. At the time said order was given, said tank and oil were in the possession of C. S. Fewsmith as the agent of said W. W. Harkness, and by him had been given special control and supervision of this tank and the oil it contained. The tank was so immense, and the quantity of oil it contained so great, that actual possession could not be delivered to said trustees; but when we look at the face of the order it is perceived that said William W. Harkness thereby requests his agent, C. S. Fewsmith, to hold, subject to the order of Peter C. Hollis and Joseph L. Richards, trustees of the estate of Samuel Simes deceased, his stock of lubricating oil stored in his iron tank in his yard at Parkersburg, W. Va., as collateral security for the return of $7,500 borrowed and received of them. By this order he requests C. S. Fewsmith to become the agent of said trustees in holding the possession and caring for said property, and C. S. Fewsmith, by accepting said order, thereby agreed to become the agent of said trustees, and hold the property, as requested, for them. Can we regard this transaction, taken as a whole, in any other light than that of a pledge? Previous to this order, the possession of this 1,800 barrels of oil was held by C. S. Fewsmith as the agent of William W. Harkness, and by the order or request and its acceptance was transferred to said Fewsmith, as the agent of the trustees of Samuel Simes, deceased, and as security for said sum of $7,500. Jones, Pledges, § 1, says: "Every contract by which the possession of personal property is transferred as security only is to be deemed a pledge. In Georgia, a pledge or pawn is declared to be property deposited with another as security for the payment of a debt." And that, as it seems to us, was done in this case. It appears in the agreed statement of facts that subsequent to this transfer said W. W. Harkness paid the taxes and insurance on this oil, but such payments were not inconsistent with the fact that the property had been pledged for the payment of the $7,500 he had borrowed from the estate of Samuel Simes. He had not sold the property to any person, but had merely pledged it, and it was incumbent on him to pay the taxes to prevent a sale of the property, and it was consistent with prudence that he should insure the property in order to prevent loss to himself, and to avoid the destruction of the security to the Simes estate for the money he had borrowed. The distinction between a pledge and a mortgage is stated in Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 4, as follows: "The chief distinction between a mortgage and a pledge is that by a mortgage the general title is transferred to the mortgagee, subject to be revested by performance of the condition: while by a pledge, the pledgeor retains the general title in himself, and parts with the possession for a special purpose." And the same author in his work on Pledges (§ 7) says: "A pledge differs from a mortgage of personal property in being a lien upon property and not a legal title to it. The legal title to property pledged remains in the pledgeor, while a mortgage passes the legal title of the property itself to the mortgagee, subject to be revested in the mortgagor, upon the performance by him of an express condition subsequent." The legal title to the property did not pass in this instance; the possession, however, went from Fewsmith, agent of Harkness, to Fewsmith, agent of the trustees of Samuel Simes' estate. As to the manner in which possession may be held by the pledgee, Jones on Pledges (§§ 3, 4) says: "But possession may be held by a third person for the pledgee, when such person will be considered as the pledgee's agent." So in the case of Brown v. Warren, 43 N. H. 430, it was held that, "where property is pledged as security for a debt or liability, it is immaterial where the pledgee holds the property or a third person holds it for him." "If property of A be held by B and C jointly, A may assign the same in pledge to B or C severally, and the pledge will be good if both B and C have knowledge of the same, and assent to hold the property for the pledgee."

It is claimed by counsel for the defendant in error that there was no possession accompanying the pledge, and for that reason it was inoperative. The question is as to the possession of the property at the time the pledge is claimed to have been made. It appears that after said C. S. Fewsmith came to Parkersburg, in 1886, he was employed by said Harkness as agent to have a general oversight in and over the property of said Harkness and said oil and said tank for the purpose of preserving and protecting the same, which said Fewsmith did as agent of said Harkness, up to the 23d day of May, 1888, when he accepted said order. Said oil, on account of its character, was not susceptible of being transferred from hand to hand, and all possession that could be taken was a general supervision and control, guarding it from danger of fire, paying taxes and insurance, which Fewsmith was doing at the time of the acceptance of said order. Upon this question of delivery of possession, Jones on Pledges (§ 36) says: "A symbolical delivery is sufficient wherever such a delivery would be sufficient in case of a sale of the same property. Such a delivery may be made of all property incapable of manual delivery. Thus logs in a boom may be effectually pledged by going in sight of them, and pointing them out to the pledgee." Jewett v. Warren, 12 Mass. 300, 7 Am. Dec. 74; Nevan v. Roup, 8 Iowa, 207; Whitney v. Tibbits, 17 Wis. 359. In the case of Nevan v. Roup it was held that "delivery and possession are essential to a pledge, but the delivery may be symbolical, and the possession according to the nature of the thing." In the case of Whitney v. Tibbitts, supra, it was held that, "where the question was whether, on a pledge of flour stored in a warehouse in Milwaukee, a delivery by the pledgeor of the warehouse receipt without indorsement constituted a sufficient delivery of the property to sus ain the pledge as against subsequent attaching creditors of the pledgeor, and it appeared that said receipt did not run to bearer, but stated that the flour was 'deliverable only on return of the receipt,' etc., held, that the plaintiff was entitled to show that by a general custom in Milwaukee flour in store was transferred by a delivery of such receipts without indorsement." In the case we are considering, however, there was an acceptance of the order by Fewsmith in accordance with the terms of the order, and Jones on Pledges (§ 37) says: "A delivery of a document of title which serves to put the pledgee in possession of the goods is equivalent to an actual delivery of them." In § 229 the same author says: "The delivery of a bill of lading is a symbolical delivery of the property represented by it. The person who takes a bill of lading for a valuable consideration, whether this arises at the time or rests upon a previously existing debt, has the right to the property without taking actual possession of it, or doing any further act to perfect this title." See Neill v. Rogers Bros. Produce Co. 40 W. Va. ——. So it is said: "Warehouse receipts, by custom, have long been considered as representing the property mentioned in them; and the assignment or indorsement of such instruments has long been regarded as equivalent to the delivery of such property." See Jones, Pledges, § 280. As we regard this transaction, the possession of Fewsmith before said written order was drawn on him and accepted was the possession of Harkness; by such acceptance he agreed to become the agent of said trustees in holding the possession of the oil and controlling the same, and did so become; and in this manner the possession was transferred from Harkness to said trustees, Harkness holding the possession by his agent facit per alium facit per se, transferred to Fewsmith as the agent of these trustees, and they held it, as did Harkness, through their agent. "Though a pledge be evidenced by a writing, it need not be recorded if the writing constitute a pledge and not a mortgage." Jones, Pledges, § 6.

The case under consideration by its record presents a contest between the defendant in error, the First National Bank, claiming the oil stored in this tank under an attachment, levied thereon subsequent to the date of said written request signed by W. W. Harkness, and directed to said C. S. Fewsmith, and accepted by him; and the question is, What right to said oil remained in W. W. Harkness at the time said attachment was levied, after pledging said property in the trustees of Samuel Simes, deceased? What right could said W. W. Harkness assert in any court to repossess himself of said 1,800 barrels of oil without paying said sum of $7,500, for which it was pledged? He certainly could maintain no such claim successfully, and the question is, If said Harkness had no right to said oil superior to said pledgee's, could the defendant in error, under its attachment lien, have or take more than Harkness had at the time of the levy? We find the law upon this question stated by Shinnon, Attachments, p. 611, § 318, who thus states the law: "A creditor cannot, by attachment, acquire any higher or better right in the property attached than the debtor himself had at the time of the levy of the attachment, unless he can show that there has been fraud or collusion to his detriment." The lien obtained by attachment is subject to all previous liens by bona fide creditors; therefore the effect of the attachment is to subject only the interest which the defendant has in the property at the time of its seizure, and, having reached the conclusion that the oil in said tank was pledged to the payment of said sum of $7,500, with its accrued interest, we hold that said attachment is subject to said pledge, and can only be satisfied out of the surplus remaining from the sale of said oil after the satisfaction of the said sum of $7,500, with its accrued interest; and the judgment of the court below dismissing the petition filed by the plaintiff in error is reversed, the judgment is reversed so far as it gives said attachment lien priority over said pledge as to the oil levied on thereunder, and the case is remanded, with costs to the plaintiff in error.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. The board of education of a school district, composed of the president of the board of education and two commissioners, is a public corporation, created by statute (Code, § 7, chap. 45), with functions of a public nature expressly given, and having no other; and therefore it can exercise no power not expressly conferred or fairly arising by necessary implication, and it can exercise its functions in no other mode than in that prescribed or authorized by the statute.

2. The members of the board, acting individually and separately, and not as a board convened for the transaction of business, cannot accept a proposal or make any contract whatever that will bind them as a corporation.

3. As a board it cannot incur any debt to be paid out of the school money of any subsequent year.

4. All who deal with the board of education are charged with notice of the scope of their authority, and that they can bind their district only to the extent and by such contracts as are expressly authorized by law.

5. The board of education may, under the head of "appliances," provide for the schoolhouses maps and charts; but it must be made to appear that they are not mere school books in some other form or under some other name, but something of which a few will answer the needs of all, suitable to the school, and reasonably necessary to enable the teacher to impart instruction to the pupils more efficiently in such branches as are required to be taught.

6. The giving of anything of value to a commissioner of the board of education of a school district, intended to influence him in the discharge of a legal duty, or his receiving anything of value in corrupt payment of an official act done or to be done, renders void any contract to the making of which he was thus induced in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, and to the validity of which his vote or assent was necessary.

7. A school commissioner of a district is notified to attend an adjourned meeting of the board of education, set to pass upon a proposed contract for the purchase of certain charts for the public schools of their district at the price of $750. He refused to go until the agent selling the charts handed him $2.50 in money to pay him for his time and reimburse him for loss sustained by closing his place of business. Then he attended the meeting of the board at the time and place fixed, and he and the president of the board voted for making the purchase and signed the contract; but the third commissioner voted against it, and refused to sign the contract. Held, such contract, thus procured and made, is against public policy, and void, for want of the sanction of a competent majority of the board to make it.

8. Where a principal sends forth his agent to conduct his affairs and contract for his benefit, and the agent procures a contract by fraudulent or corrupt practices, although the principal may not have been privy in any way to such conduct of his agent, yet the principal claiming the benefit of the contract must take it tainted as it may be with such practices.

9. A court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit by and on behalf of the resident taxpayers of a school district to set aside a contract made by and with the board of education, when the same is illegal, as made in fraud of the rights of such taxpayers, and so far as the same creates a debt to be paid out of the school money of any subsequent year, or is made for the purchase of things which the school board had no authority to buy; there being no other adequate remedy.

(April 8, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Putnam County in favor of plaintiffs in a proceeding to enjoin defendants from paying for certain apparatus purchased for the use of the school. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. H. Nash and J. B. Menager for appellants.

Messrs. Bowyer & Green, for appellees:

A court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit by and on behalf of the resident taxpayers of a school district brought to set aside and hold for nought a contract made by the board of education so far as the same creates and incurs a debt to be paid out of school money of subsequent years.

*Headnotes by HOLT, P.

NOTE.—The fact that a member of a board receives compensation for attending a meeting from a person who is interested in action to be taken at such meeting is clearly regarded by the court in the above case as amounting to unlawful influence, having the effect of bribery so far as to annul action taken by the aid of such member. The case in this respect makes an important precedent, especially in respect to school boards which are often convened to take action on a particular question. For other cases as to the necessity of the members of a board getting together and having a meeting in order to take valid action, see Cary Library v. Bliss (Mass.) 7 L. R. A. 765, and Stockton v. Powell (Fla.) 15 L. R. A. 42.

Corporations created by statute must depend, both for their powers and the mode of exercising them, upon the true construction of the statute creating them.

Pennsylvania Lightning Rod Co. v. Cass Twp. Bd. of Edu. 20 W. Va. 360.

It has no powers derived from usage not expressly confirmed by statute or which fairly arise by necessary implication.

Harris v. School Dist. No. 10, 28 N. H. 61; Frazier v. School Dist. No. 1, 24 Mo. App. 250.

In the purchase of these series the board created a debt in that year beyond its assets for the year, which, under § 45, chap. 45, was unlawful, and makes the contract illegal and one that cannot be enforced.

Yaggy v. Monroe Dist. Twp. 80 Iowa, 121.

The acceptance of the charts by the board cannot ratify the illegal contract; nor does the use of the series amount to a ratification of the contract or impose any obligation on the district.

The contract was void because obtained by bribery, fraud, and undue influence.

Holt, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

On appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Putnam county, pronounced on the 28th day of February, 1894, perpetually enjoining the Caxton Company from collecting and the school board from paying a debt for $750, which the board contracted in the purchase of school charts. The bill of injunction is based on three distinct grounds:

1. That the members of the board of education, in making this purchase in the year 1893, incurred the debt of $750, to be paid one half out of the school money of the subsequent year; and this was done in violation of § 45, chap. 45, of the Code. The plain and commendable purpose of this provision of the statute is to make the available funds of each year pay the demands of that year, and to protect the taxpayer from indebtedness beyond what each year's means will pay. Davis v. Ft. Spring Dist. Bd. of Edu. 38 W. Va. 382, 385. And a court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit by and on behalf of the resident taxpayers of a school district brought to set aside and hold for naught a contract made by the board of education, so far as the same creates and incurs a debt to be paid out of the school money of subsequent years, there being no other plain, adequate, and complete remedy. Shinn v. Ripley Dist. Bd. of Edu. 39 W Va. 497. This could hardly have been the ground on which the circuit court based its decree, for the written contract for the purchase of the charts as amended and finally executed was entered into on the 15th day of July, 1893. One half of the $750—the purchase money—was to be paid on the 1st of December, 1893, and the other half on the 1st of April, 1894, and provision was made for payment out of the school levy of the current fiscal year, that day laid by the board. But there is no question that the contract as first made did create a debt with one half of it to be paid out of the school money of the subsequent year.

Ground No. 2 is that the school law (chapter 45 of the Code) does not confer upon the board of education the power to buy such things; that they do not come within the meaning of the term "appliances," as used in the statute. The board of education of a school district is a corporation created by statute (§ 7, chap. 45), with functions of a public nature, expressly given, and no other; and it can exercise no power not expressly conferred or fairly arising from necessary implication; and in no other mode than that prescribed or authorized by the statute. Shinn v. Ripley Dist. Bd. of Edu. 39 W. Va. 498. It is a public corporation, created for public educational purposes (1 Thomp. Corp. § 25), laying throughout the United States annual levies of more than $160,000,000. All who deal with the board of education are charged with notice of the scope of their authority, and that they can bind their district only to the extent and by such contracts as are authorized by law. See Honey Creek School Twp. v. Barnes, 119 Ind. 213. And the members of the board, acting individually and separately, and not as a board convened for the transaction of business, cannot make a contract that will bind them as a corporation. Pennsylvania Lightning Rod Co. v. Cass Twp. Bd. of Edu. 20 W. Va. 360.

The evidence shows that this contract of sale as just made was in plain violation of this important rule of law, but was afterwards called in, and the present one was put in its place. Whether the law confers upon the board the power to make such purchase depends upon the scope and meaning of § 34 of chapter 45, read in connection with other sections and clauses bearing on the same subject. It reads as follows: "The board of education of every district shall provide by purchase, condemnation, leasing, building, or otherwise, suitable schoolhouses and grounds in their districts, in such locations as will best accommodate the inhabitants thereof, and improve such grounds and provide such furniture, fixtures, and appliances for said schoolhouses as the comfort, health, cleanliness, and convenience of the scholars may require, and keep such grounds, schoolhouses, furniture, fixtures, and appliances in good order and repair." Appliance is anything brought into use as a means to effect some end. An educational appliance is something necessary or useful to enable the teacher to teach the school children. No educational means of imparting instruction to school children is more essential than the proper school books; therefore, according to the argument in this case, it is the duty of the board to provide them. But no one, I believe, contends for the conclusion to which this reasoning leads us. There must be some additional qualifying restriction. The appliance must be something like a blackboard, map, or dictionary, in that one or two may be enough for the use of the whole school, and can be used by the teacher in giving instruction to the pupils. No person being required to furnish such common but necessary property for the benefit of the whole school, they can only be supplied by the board of education. See Honey Creek School Twp. v. Barnes, 119 Ind. 213, 217. But there are still other necessary restrictions. It must not be a school book in disguise. This is vitally important, for the opening for the sale of school books in the United States is so large, and the pressure brought to bear to make sales, whether the books be needed or not, so great, that it seems to be almost irresistible, and quasi-school books are gradually creeping in under the name of appliances. They must not only be genuine appliances, but they must be shown to be suitable and reasonably necessary for the use of the public schools, for the board has no authority to buy any appliance which is not suitable and necessary; for example, an appliance or apparatus suitable to some branch of learning not required to be taught. There is a distinct charge in the bill that the agent of the Caxton Company succeeded in palming off these charts on the board by false and fraudulent representations, and at a price fraudulently excessive, viz., $37.50 for each chart. The testimony of twenty witnesses was taken; and a dozen or more of high character and intelligence, who have had experience in such matters, and occasion and opportunity to observe and to know, testify with great unanimity that object teaching is of prime importance in teaching the young,—the very young,—and that without some such thing as these charts it could hardly be done. They also say that these charts are not mere school books in disguise, but aids essential to the teacher in teaching and to the pupil in learning; that one or two will answer for the whole school; and that they relate only to such branches as the law requires to be taught. As to the price, two say $5 would be enough; one says they ought to cost about $15; the others, who know them best, say that, as compared with other charts, the agreed price of $37.50 is not exorbitant. There is a lame and unsuccessful attempt to make good by proof the charge of misrepresentation, nothing more; and it needs no comment.

The third and last charge in the bill of injunction is that the Caxton Company, by and through its agents and salesmen, offered to the board of education and to the individual members thereof money and other things of value, and used various other undue, illegal, and fraudulent inducements, with the view and for the express purpose of securing an order and contract for the purchase of the Caxton School Series illegally and for an exorbitant price, to the great detriment of the plaintiffs and all other taxpayers of the school district. Bribery is defined as "the voluntary giving or receiving of anything of value in corrupt payment for an official act, done or to be done." 2 Bishop, New Crim. L. § 85. See Dishon v. Smith, 10 Iowa, 221; State v. Ellis, 33 N. J. L. 103, 97 Am. Dec. 707. The payment or offer of a valuable consideration to a public officer to influence him in the discharge of a legal duty constitutes the offense. See 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 532; Anderson, Law Dict. p. 136. See, on the subject, §§ 4 et seq. of the Code, and § 13 of chapter 45; Com. v. Callaghan, 2 Va. Cas. 460. A promise to pay for loss of time is bribery. Simpson v. Yeend, L. R. 4 Q. B. 626; Cooper v. Slade, 6 H. L. Cas. 746; People v. O'Neil, 48 Hun, 36, 43. Every public officer being a guardian of the public welfare, no transaction growing out of his official services or position can be allowed to inure to his personal benefit; and from such transactions the law will not imply a contract. Davis v. United States, 23 Ct. Cl. 329. When a contract grows out of and is connected with an illegal act, it will not be enforced. Jones v. Surprise, 64 N. H. 243. Courts of justice will not enforce any contract which is injurious to public rights, contravenes public policy, or violates public law. A contract with the state, procured by bribery upon the officers having power to make it, is against public policy and void. State, Bradford, v. Cross, 38 Kan. 696. An order by two of the trustees of a school district, one of whom is personally interested in it, and therefore incompetent to act, is void for want of the sanction of a competent majority of the board, whether the interested trustee has acted fairly or not. Shakespear v. Smith, 77 Cal. 638. The evidence shows without any attempt at contradiction that one of the commissioners of the board of education, when notified of the time and place of the meeting of the board for the purpose of passing on the proposed contract for the purchase of the Caxton Series, refused to go on account of the loss he would sustain by closing his place of business. Thereupon the agent of the Caxton Company paid him $2.50 in money to reimburse him for his loss, telling him at the time he did not do this to try to bribe him, or with the intention of influencing his decision in any way. The board is composed of three commissioners. The commissioner who was thus induced to attend and the president of the board signed the contract, the third one refused to sign it. The state pays the commissioner $1.50 per day. Code, § 6, chap. 45. It was his plain duty to attend the meeting and pass upon this important contract without being influenced in the discharge of such legal duty by requiring or receiving from the party who proposed the contract any pay for his time or his loss in closing his place of business. The people of the state take pride in their public schools, in their growing usefulness and efficiency, and to that end give of their means without stint and without complaint, until now it has reached the sum of $1,664,527 a year; and they have a right to feel indignant when they have reason to suspect the pressure of corrupt practices or tampering in any way with the school boards who control the school money of the districts. This contract was void because made by only two of the board, one of whom had rendered himself incompetent to act by accepting pay from the party contracted with for attending the meeting at which the contract was made. Without his vote in favor of it, it would not have been made; hence, so far from having the sanction of two of the board, the number required by the statute to constitute a quorum, it had under the law the sanction of but one, and therefore had only the semblance of a contract. Besides, it is a plain case of money demanded, given (and received) with intent to influence the commissioner in the discharge of the legal duty of attending the meeting and passing on the question of the acceptance of the proposed contract. I should be reluctant to believe that his signing the contract was also thus induced. The first is enough to require the contract to be held void, and that much is established by the concurrent testimony of both parties to the transaction. But it is proper to add that there is nothing in this record tending in the slightest degree to bring home to the principal in this contract knowledge or sanction of this conduct on the part of their agent; but, notwithstanding their innocence, when they come into court, and insist upon its validity and enforcement, they are met with the maxim upon which the law of agency rests, "What one does through another, that he does himself," so far as the illegality of the contract itself is involved. The doctrine of ultra vires, in that attitude of the transaction, does not apply. See 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1180. Although the principal may have had nothing to do with this tampering of their agent with a member of the school board in order to influence him in the discharge of his official duty, may not have been privy to the transaction in any way, yet the company sent him out to sell and contract in their name and for their benefit; therefore they were bound to see that it was so made as not to be a fraud on the rights of the taxpayers, and as they claim under it they must take it as tainted with these corrupt practices.

In our view of the facts of this case and of the law applicable thereto, the decree complained of is right, and must be affirmed.

NORFOLK & WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. Where a railroad company leaves its railroad uninclosed through a country where domestic animals are allowed to be at large, and thus exposed to the casualties of the animals getting upon the railroad track, it is the duty of the railroad company, through its agents, to use at least ordinary care to avoid unnecessary injury to the animals, when found in the way of a train on the road.

2. The paramount duty of the agents of a railroad company engaged in propelling a train is owed to the persons and property in their charge on the train; and if, in freezing weather, it is found that the use of salt on switches is the only effective mode of freeing them from ice, and thus protecting their passengers and themselves from the dangers consequent upon a wreck, they may avail themselves of this method, although it may have a tendency to lure stock to the track, and endanger their lives.

3. If the servants of the railroad company in charge of a train, by exercise of ordinary care, can see and save domestic animals which have wandered on the railroad, it is their duty to do so; but this duty must be exercised consistently with the paramount duties they owe to the passengers on the train under their charge.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Logan County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of cattle alleged to have been killed by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Campbell & Holt for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. B. Wilkinson, for defendant in error:

If the ox was on the track when the train came in sight the engineer must have seen him, if keeping a proper lookout, and should have resorted to the usual appliances for driving the ox away by giving the alarm, slackening his speed, and even stopping the train if necessary in order to avert the injury. If the ox was near the track when the train came in sight and started to go towards it as though to get on it then the same duties devolved upon the engineer as before, but so far as the evidence discloses he utterly failed to sound an alarm or even to slacken his speed, much less to stop his train.

It was held to be negligence in a company to let salt remain on its track after notice of it or after sufficient time elapsed to charge it with notice, and the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence in turning out his stock, knowing of the salt, upon the commons adjoining, having a right to pasture thereon.

English, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a civil action brought by G. W. Kirk against the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, before T. J. Mead, a justice of the peace of Logan county, for a wrong alleged to have been committed by the defendant, in which damages to the amount of $300 were claimed. In the complaint filed before the justice, the plaintiff alleged that between the 1st day of October, 1892, and the 1st day of March, 1893, the defendant killed three oxen, and crippled another one, which belonged to the plaintiff, of the value of $45 each for two that were killed, and $65 for the other, and $25 for the one that was crippled. On the 17th day of NOTE.—The above case is believed to be a novel one in respect to the liability of a railroad company for using salt upon its switches and thus attracting cattle. As to how far the statutes can make railroad companies absolutely liable for injuries to cattle, see note to Matthews v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (Mo.) 25 L. R. A. 161.

See also 32 L. R. A. 170.

June, 1893, the case was heard, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff for $160, with interest till paid and costs. An appeal was taken to the circuit court. An amended complaint was filed. The plea of not guilty was interposed. Issue was joined. A jury was waived, and the matters of law and fact were submitted to the court, and resulted in a finding for the plaintiff, and assessing his damages at $125. The defendant moved the court to set aside its finding, as contrary to the law and the evidence, and grant it a new trial, which motion the court overruled, and entered judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant excepted, and took a bill of exceptions, setting forth the evidence introduced upon the trial of said cause; and thereupon the defendant applied for and obtained this writ of error.

Now, the injuries complained of occurred at different times. The evidence shows that about the 15th day of December, 1892, the plaintiff found one of his work oxen had been killed, about 100 yards below the Vinson switch, on the Norfolk & Western Railroad, in Logan county, W. Va. The steer was badly bruised up, and some of its limbs broken, and it was lying by the side of the railroad track. He did not see it killed. It was worth $40. This was all of the evidence adduced in regard to the killing of this steer. The testimony is entirely silent as to the circumstances under which it was killed. So far as appears, it may have been killed in the night, when it could not have been seen. It may have come suddenly onto the railroad track, and no negligence could properly have been imputed to the defendant; and the burden of proving negligence rests upon the plaintiff, so that, as to this steer, the court surely would not be warranted in assessing any damages against the defendant. Another one of plaintiff's steers was found dead by plaintiff, lying near the railroad track, about two weeks after the first one was killed, at the Breeden switch, in said county, on the line of said railroad. This steer had both of its hind legs broken, and was lying on the switch. He identified the steer, but knew nothing of the circumstances attending the killing. A witness, however, by the name of Ferguson, who resides near the Breeden switch, states that some time in January, 1893, he saw an ox which belonged to the plaintiff struck by a train near said switch; that he heard the train coming down the creek, and looked out of the window of his house, and saw some cattle standing near the track; that one of plaintiff's steers was struck and thrown off of the main track onto the switch. It was badly crippled, but not killed, and shortly afterwards it was buried by the railroad hands working on that section. This train whistled just before or about the time it came in sight, and was running fast. He heard but the one whistle, which sounded like it was for a whistle post. If any other alarm was given before the steer was struck, he did not hear it. He was about 50 feet from the track where the steer was struck. That stock could have been seen about 175 or 200 yards from the direction of the approaching train. It was a passenger train, and did not appear to slacken its speed either before or after striking the steer. This occurred in the evening. Now, it will be perceived that the cattle, when seen by the witness Ferguson, were not on the track, but were standing near it. He was only 50 feet away, and could see the position of the cattle. At what time this steer came onto the track, so as to be in the way of the train, does not appear. He may have been alarmed by the whistle or the noise of the approaching train, and have attempted to cross the track. At any rate, he went on to it, and his hind legs being broken would indicate that he was moving along the track in front of the train, or attempting to leave it. How near the train was when this occurred does not appear, but it must have been very near, as it was a passenger train, and was approaching rapidly, while the ox was changing his position from near the track onto the track itself. From this testimony, we may readily infer that, when the cattle were first seen by the trainmen, they were near the track, but not on it, as Ferguson so places them when he heard the whistle of the rapidly approaching train. The cattle could have been seen, say, for 200 yards; Ferguson says, from 175 to 200. A train running at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour would run 200 yards in about 15 seconds, which would allow the steer but a quarter of a minute to change his position after the train came in sight; and, as the engineer states, the train could not have been stopped if he had had the entire 200 yards in which to stop after the steer came on the track, but, so far as appears, he must have stepped on the track immediately in front of the train, and no amount of diligence on the part of those in charge of the train could have prevented the collision or the death of the steer. Under these circumstances, we think the court erred in finding against the defendant the value of this steer.

About the 15th of January, 1893, the plaintiff had another steer killed, and a fourth one crippled, at or near Vinson switch, in said county. He did not see it done. The one killed was found lying near the track, and the crippled one was also found near the railroad track. The one killed was worth $40, and the damage done the crippled one was at least $25. The only testimony in regard to the circumstances of this last occurrence is that detailed by one William Kirk, who states that he was working near said Vinson switch, hauling saw logs; that a short time before the killing of this last steer and crippling another at said switch, about the 15th day of January, 1893, some salt had been used at said switch, and it attracted the cattle which were being used there to haul saw logs; that the railroad at that point, and for some distance above and below, was not inclosed in any way, there being no station or depot, only a switch to receive saw logs on the cars; that, on that evening, he noticed the cattle at the switch, licking where the salt had been used, and he drove them away, fearing a train would come along and kill some of them. After driving them away, he returned to his log shanty, on the opposite side of the creek. A few moments afterwards he heard a train coming down the creek, and stepped out of his shanty, and saw the engine run in among the cattle, which had returned and were again licking salt at the switch. He went across to the railroad track, and found one ox killed, and one crippled, both of which belonged to plaintiff. He describes the injuries received by the cattle, and says they were both found near the switch, and were part of the cattle which he had a short time before driven away from the switch. This was at or near dusk. The train consisted of a locomotive, baggage car, and two passenger coaches, and was running about twenty-five miles an hour, and, after striking the cattle, kept on at the same rate without stopping. Stock could have been seen a distance of about 200 or 300 yards on the track from the direction in which said train was approaching. If any alarm was sounded by either bell or whistle, he did not hear it. Now, it will be perceived that there is no evidence that these cattle were on the track at the time this train came in sight of the switch. They had been driven away by the witness Kirk a few minutes before, but when they returned he does not know, and does not state. He states that he saw the engine run in among the cattle when he stepped out of his shanty, but when they returned he does not know or say. So far as the evidence shows, the cattle may have gone on the track immediately in front of the approaching train. If they had been on the track sooner, it must be presumed that self-preservation, if nothing else, would have prompted the trainmen to do their duty by sounding the alarm; and the fact that no alarm was sounded strongly indicates that nothing was seen on the track; and it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the cattle were on the track, and were killed and crippled by the negligence of the defendant.

It is contended by counsel for the defendant in error that the use of salt in thawing out the switches, and thus preventing the accumulation of ice from throwing the train from the track or creating such a liability, which had the effect of attracting cattle to the switch, was negligence on the part of the plaintiff in error, and cites Brown v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 27 Mo. App. 394, and Morrow v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 29 Mo. App. 432, in support of his contention. An examination of said authorities however shows a very different state of facts. In the first named case the railroad company allowed quantities of salt to be piled on and near its track, and to remain there after it knew the salt was there, by reason of which a horse was attracted to it and killed. In the second case, several merchants had a refrigerator near the railroad track, and the brine running from said refrigerator caused the ground near the railroad to be saturated with brine, which attracted a cow to the track, which was killed. It was shown that the railroad had notice, and had neglected to take any steps to correct it, and this was held to be negligence on the part of the railroad, and that it was liable. It is, however, shown in the case under consideration that the use of salt at switches is an absolute necessity, to protect the lives of passengers and others that travel on railroad trains, and not to use it would, in case of accident caused by such failure, be regarded as an act of negligence. In the case of Blaine v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 9 W. Va. 252 (point 5 of syllabus), this court held: "There is no law in this state, of general operation, requiring any person to fence his land, uninclosed; but the person who leaves his lands uninclosed takes the risks of intrusions thereon, by the domestic animals of others running at large, and the owner of such animals, in allowing them to run at large, takes the risk of their loss, or of injury to them by unavoidable accident from any danger into which they may happen to wander." And in point 12 the law is thus stated: "Where a railroad company leaves its railroad uninclosed, through a country where domestic animals are allowed to be at large, and thus exposed to the casualties of the animals getting upon the railway track, it is the duty of the railroad company, through its agents, to use at least ordinary care to avoid unnecessary injury to the animals, when found in the way of a train on the road. The first and paramount duty of the agents of the company is a due regard for the safety of the persons and property in their charge on the train, for which they are held to a high degree of care; and, so far as consistent with its paramount duty, they are bound to the exercise of what, in that peculiar business, would be ordinary and reasonable care to avoid unnecessary injury to animals casually coming upon their uninclosed road, and, if the servants of the railroad company in charge of a train can, by the exercise of ordinary care, see and save domestic animals which have wandered on the railroad, it is their duty to do so, and for any injury to animals arising from a neglect of such care the company is liable in damages to the owner." See also Baylor v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. Id. 271, where this court held it to be the duty of the servants of the railroad company, so far as consistent with their other and paramount duties, to use ordinary care to avoid injuring cattle on the track. They are bound to adopt the ordinary precautions to discover danger, as well as avoid its consequences after it becomes known. And, applying these principles to the facts and circumstances of this case, we conclude that the court erred in fixing any liability upon the defendant by reason of imputed negligence upon its part.

On appeal, however, to the circuit court, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, in which he alleged that the defendant, on the last day of January, 1893, unlawfully killed and appropriated to its own use three oxen of the plaintiff, of great value, to wit, of the value of $125; and the testimony shows that one of said oxen was lying on the Breeden switch, with both of its hind legs broken; and, as it was in good order, he proposed to take charge of it, and use it for beef, but the section foreman refused to let him have it, and the steer was buried by said foreman, and workmen under his control. The witness also states that this steer was worth $60; but as we cannot say whether this valuation applied to the steer in its crippled and mutilated condition, to the value of its carcass for beef, or to the steer as it stood on the railroad when struck by the train, we are of opinion that the circuit court had before it no data by which to determine the value of said steer; and while we are of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to something for the dead carcass of the steer demanded by him, and refused by the section boss, we cannot determine the amount, and the court below was not warranted on the evidence in fixing any amount.

For these reasons the judgment complained of must be reversed, the finding set aside, and the case remanded.

Brannon, J., concurring:

We hold the company not responsible for killing or crippling the cattle, but we think it responsible for not yielding to the owner one of the cattle after it was killed, and demanded by the owner, and, as the complaint called for damages for its conversion, the plaintiff ought to have judgment for that much for its conversion. But no evidence showed its value when dead, and therefore only nominal damages could be given for it. As we do not know how much to subtract for that steer from the amount of damages found against the company, and could only subtract nominal damages, we cannot say the amount of grievance to the company is reduced below the jurisdictional amount of $100.

Dent, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the conclusion in this case, for the reason that in my view of it the plaintiff was entitled to recover not less than $30, which would reduce the residue of the recovery below the jurisdiction of this court, and therefore the appeal, in any event, should have been dismissed for want of jurisdiction, in accordance with the settled rule established in the case of Love v. Pickens, 26 W. Va. 341, as follows, to wit: "To give this court jurisdiction in a cause involving matters simply pecuniary the record must show not only that the party complaining has been prejudiced by the decree or judgment of the inferior court, but also that the amount in controversy in this court exceeds the value of $100, exclusive of costs." In short, every presumption in this court is in favor of the judgment, and the duty devolves upon the party complaining to show that he is prejudiced in excess of $100. If he falls one cent short, he is not entitled to his appeal. Greathouse v. Sapp, 26 W. Va. 87; Neal v. Van Winkle, 24 W. Va. 401; Bee v. Burdett, 23 W. Va. 744; Rymer v. Hawkins, 18 W. Va. 309.

But the merits of this case are with the plaintiff. It is the law that in the country where the railroad is not fenced, and cattle are legally permitted to run at large, the company must use at least ordinary care to prevent the injury of stock wandering on the track. The use of salt or anything else that attracts stock upon the track is not ordinary care. If the company would merely scatter the salt along its tracks without excuse for so doing, no one would for an instant pretend that such conduct was not negligence, in the highest degree criminal, creating a nuisance or trap to lure such domestic animals whose systems crave salt to their certain destruction. The company having done this the question is, Has it furnished an unavoidable, justifiable, and reasonable excuse for so doing? It introduced a witness Moloney, who testified, "that he was in the employ of the defendant as road supervisor on the Kenova division of said railroad, from Kenova to the mouth of the Pigeon; that the road where the injuries complained of occurred was under his supervision; that in cold, frozen, snowy weather the frogs at switches along said line of railroad would get frozen up, and would become dangerous to run trains along said road; that there had been some cold, snowy weather in December, 1892, and that he applied to the superintendent of the division for salt to apply to said switches, by which means they could be kept open, to avoid danger to running trains; that the superintendent refused to send it, unless it was absolutely necessary to use it, as the use of it would attract stock; that some time in January, during a severe spell of weather, it became absolutely necessary to use salt, for the safety of the trains, and several barrels were sent to him to use along his division, and that he distributed it along the line of said road, to be used at the switches and stations, and it was so used, part of it being used at the said Binson switch prior to the killing and crippling of the steers, about January 15, 1893; that the use of said salt was absolutely necessary for safety to trains; and that there was no substitute for it." This testimony shows that the company were fully aware of the danger of using salt, but the witness says that its use was absolutely necessary to keep the frogs and switches free from ice and snow in cold whether, and that there was no substitute for it. Admitting this to be true, then it was the duty of the company, in using it, to provide against the danger thereof, by providing, by necessary fencing or watchmen, to keep stock away from it, not only for the safety of the stock, but of the trains and passengers under its control; for stock, dead or alive, may derail a train as well as ice or snow, and, if a train should have been thus derailed, could the company have escaped liability to injured passengers by showing that the salt which attracted the stock, and caused the accident, was necessarily used in providing for their safety? Such a plea would be treated as ridiculous, on the theory that the company, in providing against a lesser evil, had no right to incur a greater, but that it also should have provided against the greater if it was in its power to do so; and it certainly was at small expense, comparatively, at least, to the risk it was assuming. In deciding such questions because of the testimony of witnesses, the court cannot devest itself of good common sense. It is plain to be seen that while the witness says the use of the salt was absolutely necessary and that there was no known substitute for it, yet that the real object in its use was to avoid the additional expense caused by the necessary labor involved in keeping the frogs and switches free from ice and snow in cold weather. In other words, it was a "penny wise and pound foolish" policy, causing the unnecessary destruction of other people's property, and increasing the dangers to its trains and passengers, which could have been avoided by a small outlay, less than the expense of defending this suit; for it alone will cost the company more than sufficient to have kept these particular frogs and switches free and clean from snow and ice, and properly lubricated, by manual labor, for many winters,—or if the salt was absolutely necessary, which sounds like mere foolishness to an untutored savage, at least, to have kept a man on guard for many cold nights and days, and secured the plaintiff and others from the loss of their stock, and avoided a decision by this court of that as law which must be repugnant to the sense of justice of every reasonable man not learned in the intricacies of railroad jurisprudence. To say that the use of salt is the only effective mode of freeing frogs and switches from ice and snow in cold weather is to close our eyes to ordinary human experience. But to say that the use of salt is the only effective mode of freeing frogs and switches from ice and snow in cold weather without an additional expense for manual labor and proper lubricants is, no doubt, true. If the company adopts the cheaper of two modes to accomplish the same purpose, it is no more than justice to require it to provide against the increased danger, occasioned by its choice, to the property of others. If, necessarily, I must maintain for my own benefit that which may be a nuisance to my neighbors, and I can provide against its dangerous character, it is my duty to do so, or be responsible to my neighbor for his loss resulting from my neglect. The company knew that the use of the salt in this instance would result just as it did. It, by a small additional expenditure of labor and money, could have provided against it. This it failed to do, and therefore it should be made to pay the damage. In my opinion, the judgment is just, and should be affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

CARSON-RAND COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
Meyer J. STERN et al., Respts.

(129 Mo. 381.)

An action by a foreign corporation which had not at the time of commencing it complied with the statutory requirements to enable it to do business in the state will not be dismissed on motion, if at the time of the motion it has so complied, under a statute providing that foreign corporations which have not complied with the requirements cannot "maintain" any suit or action in the state.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Boyle & Adams and William A. Kinnerk, for appellant:

The act of April 21, 1891, is highly penal and must be strictly construed.

State, Clinton County, v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 19 Mo. App. 104; Parish v. Missouri, K. & J. R. Co. 63 Mo. 284; State v. Bryant, 90 Mo. 534.

Barclay, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought an action against defendants August 25, 1893, to recover upon certain notes and accounts for goods sold and delivered, amounting to a total of more than $3,400. The action was in usual form, accompanied with an attachment under which some property of defendants was seized on the same day.

The summons was served on defendants, September 11, 1893.

The writs were returnable to the October term, 1893. At that time the defendants appeared, and moved the court to dismiss the cause on the ground that the plaintiff had omitted to comply with the conditions prescribed by the act of 1891, concerning foreign corporations (Laws 1891, p. 75). The motion specified the particular facts, showing the alleged omission. But it is not necessary to recite them at the moment.

The trial court sustained the motion and dismissed the cause. The plaintiff appealed after the usual formalities.

The motion, which formed the basis of the judgment on the circuit, was submitted on an agreed statement of facts. We need not quote it at length. The substance of it is that the plaintiff was a corporation, duly organized under the laws of Iowa, at all the dates mentioned in the case, and that it had not complied with the requirements of § 2 of the act of 1891, before beginning this action.

After the action was brought, the company did comply fully with said act in every particular, September 6, 1893, long before any motion, answer or plea was filed by defendants. On the date last mentioned the company received from the secretary of state the certificate of authority to do business, described in the 2d section of the act.

On these facts the question is whether or not the omission of the company to meet those requirements, before action brought, totally defeats its right to maintain the action.

The terms of the statute thus brought under construction are found in the 3d section, which provides that all such corporations, which shall neglect or fail to comply with the conditions of the law, shall be subject to a fine of not less than $1,000 to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction; ". . . in addition to which penalty, . . . no foreign corporation, as above defined, which shall fail to comply with this act, can maintain any suit or action, either legal or equitable, in any of the courts of this state, upon any demand, whether arising out of contract or tort."

At the time the motion to dismiss was filed, plaintiff had fully met the demands of the law. But it did not meet them before beginning the action. That is all there is in the objection to the proceeding as made by the motion to dismiss.

The statute does not, in express terms, forbid the bringing of an action by such a company. It declares that it cannot "maintain" an action, not having complied with the law.

What was the paramount object of the enactment? Not to exclude such concerns from participation in the business done in Missouri; but to compel a compliance with certain conditions by them. Those conditions were imposed with a view, probably, to please foreign and domestic companies on a footing of equality in the field of commerce.

The object of the law was rather to induce observance of those conditions than to deprive any foreign corporation of a right of action, or other property.

Keeping the general purpose of the law in view, what are we to understand by the word "maintain," as used in the 3d section? As its structure suggests, it signifies, literally, "to hold by the hand;" hence (in ordinary use) "to uphold, to sustain, to keep up." While in pleading it is defined to mean, "to support what has already been brought into existence." Anderson, Law Dict.

It is nothing new to the law that a party may maintain an action, although at its outset a legal barrier to it existed. This is illustrated by the law touching the defense of another action pending, which defense, though good when put of record, may be defeated by a dismissal of the prior action and a statement of that fact by way of reply to the answer containing that defense. Warder v. Henry (1893), 117 Mo. 530; 1 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 755.

It is not necessary at this time to consider whether this statute should receive a broad or narrow construction at our hands, or whether it should be viewed as penal or remedial. It certainly must have a fair and reasonable reading, and should not be enlarged beyond its natural meaning to accomplish the forfeiture of a right of action.

No corporation, having failed to obey this law, can maintain an action. The corollary is that, when it has complied, it may maintain the action. The prohibitory command does not reach the right to begin the action. We should not broaden the language to destroy that right. There is a well defined distinction between beginning and maintaining an action, viewed with reference to the facts of the controversy now before us.

We are bound to assume that the word "maintain" was chosen to express the exact shade of meaning intended by the lawmakers. It does not, with its present context, seem to us to include also the word "begin." Philpott v. Jones (1834) 2 Ad. & El. 41.

We are of the opinion that the learned trial judge was in error in sustaining the motion to dismiss, under the terms of the law, without entering into any of the constitutional questions as to its validity.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

As to fruit on overhanging branches, see note to Hickey v. Michigan C. R. Co. (Mich.) 21 L. R. A. 729.

The doctrine as applied in the principal case of CARPENTER v. LINGENFELTER is in accord with the prior decisions upon the question, and fully establishes the principles therein laid down.

I. General doctrine.

Accession has been defined as a manner of acquiring property in a thing which becomes united with that which a person already possesses. Mather v. Chapman, 40 Conn. 382, 16 Am. Rep. 46, 49.

In Zeller v. Southern Yacht Club, 34 La. Ann. 837, 838, it is said that accession is that which is united to, or incorporated with, the property, and under certain conditions belongs to the owner of the property to which it has become united, the term being generally applied to what is united to the property by artificial means.

And in speaking of rights by "accession" the authorities generally mean accession of other materials as well as skill or labor. Lampton v. Preston, 1 J. J. Marsh. 454, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

Title to personal property may be acquired by accession, but to acquire title by accession the accessory thing must be united to the principal so as to constitute part and parcel of it. Mather v. Chapman, supra.

The general rule is, that the owner of property, whether the property be movable or immovable, has the right to that which is united to it by accession or adjunction. Peirce v. Goddard, 22 Pick. 559, 33 Am. Dec. 764.

And the title applies not only to what is produced by one's own property, but also to that which is united to it, either naturally or artificially. Eaton v. Munroe, 52 Me. 63.

The right may accrue whenever materials belonging to several persons are united by labor into a single article; and the ownership of an article so formed is in the party to whom the principal part of the materials belonged. Ibid.; Pulcifer v. Page, 32 Me. 404, 54 Am. Dec. 582.

The rights of the parties, however, are made to depend to a great extent upon the intent with which the conversion of the property has been brought about. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 32 Ohio St. 571, 30 Am. Rep. 629.

The general doctrine of accession, and the foundation upon which it rests, is, Did the party have knowledge that he was violating the rights of another, and deliberately disregard such rights. Baker v. Meisch, 29 Neb. 227.

The animus of the taking and conversion is an important element, and if the parties taking it did so with a knowledge that they had no right, they obtain no title, although by the manufacture of such article they change its identity. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, supra.

Therefore the motive which prompted the act of the defendant, whether bona fide, or actuated by wilfulness and a disregard of the rights of others, should be considered. Heard v. James, 49 Miss. 236.

And this is so for the reason that the law makes a distinction, in acquiring title to property by accession, between a wilful and involuntary wrongdoer, and, as it will not permit any man to take advantage of his own wrong, so the former can never acquire any title, however great the change wrought in the original article may be, while the latter may acquire such title. Gray v. Parker, 38 Mo. 160, 166; Hyde v. Cookson, 21 Barb. 92, 104.

There are two comprehensive and fundamental rules pervading all the authorities consulted, on the doctrine of accession and of specification; from the first of which it is not known that there are any exceptions, and from the last of which, it is believed there cannot be many. These rules are: (1) That no trespasser, who takes property of another wantonly and without the owner's consent, can ever acquire a right to it, by any "accession" or "specification," whatsoever; (2) when the property of one comes to the possession of another, innocently, he may acquire the right to it, if by "accession" or "specification" the species be changed. Lampton v. Preston, 1 J. J. Marsh. 459, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

Every case must, however, depend upon its own peculiar circumstances, with only this guide, that the case must be an extreme one, which will authorize an exception to the general rule. Ibid.

In the above case it was stated that the rule for these cases was arbitrary, and must depend upon a pended his labor, the original owner to recover the value of the original article.

3. The owner of property which has been taken by another in good faith, believing he had a right to do so, may recover the value of the property at the time of the conversion, and not the value after the same has been improved by the other's labor and skill.

(November 20, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Pierce County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of certain hay. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. J. Frost, W. W. Quivey, and Wigton & Whitham for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. G. T. Kelley, J. B. Smith, and Frick & Dolezal for defendants in error.

Norval, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in replevin by Elmer Carpenter, John Carpenter, and I. W. Peed against Mary E. Lingenfelter and D. C. Lingenfelter, to recover the possession of 157 tons of hay. The property was taken under the writ and possession thereof delivered to the plaintiffs. The defendants recovered a verdict and judgment for the value of the hay, in the sum of $350, and $5 damages for withholding possession. The plaintiffs prosecute a petition in error.

The testimony introduced by the plaintiffs tends to show that one Hugh Spencer, who was the owner of the Se. W. ¼ of Sec. 28, T. 27, R. 3, in Pierce county, by his authorized agent, R. J. Spencer, rented the same to the plaintiff I. W. Peed for the year 1889 at a rental of $25; that in April, 1890, R. J. Spencer had a conversation with Peed about renting him the land for that year, in which conversation the former told the latter that if he would pay the taxes on the quarter section he could have the use of the land for 1890, and Peed replied that he would take the land if he could keep the cattle off; that subsequently Peed made a contract sound discretion, exercised on the peculiar circumstances of each individual case, and that therefore a decision in one case could not be conclusive authority for any other case of different circumstances; and further, that it was not the excess of the artificial over the natural value, but the degree of such excess, that was the controlling principle in such cases, which degree was not and could not be ascertained with precision, and therefore the decision could not be expected to present an exact conformity to any well-defined principle; and further, that all that could be known was that when the disproportion of the value of the material to that of the product was so great as to impress on the mind the justice of considering the material as accessory, and the products of the operator as the substantive species, the thing belonged to the producer of the new species.

So, if the materials of one person are united to the materials belonging to another by the labor of the latter, who furnishes the principal materials, the property in the joint product is in the latter by right of accession. Ibid.

But to acquire a title by accession, not only must the commixture be bona fide, but the materials, which belong to another, must be incapable of being restored to him in their original form; a material must not possess all its original distinctive qualities, as if it does there has been no specific change in the nature or elements of the thing. Ibid.

There is no forfeiture of ownership, except where one wilfully intermingles his property with that of another, or intermingles it so that it becomes impossible to distinguish what belongs to one and what to the other. Allen v. Kirk, 81 Iowa, 658.

Where the facts show an agreement between the plaintiff and another for the working of the land upon shares, and ouster by the defendant who harvested and removed the wheat and rye sown by the party working on shares with the plaintiff, possession being afterwards retaken by the plaintiff, it was held that replevin would not lie, but that the proper remedy was by action trespass quare clausum fregit. DeMott v. Hagerman, 8 Cow. 220, 18 Am. Dec. 443.

II. When severed under bona fide belief of title.

Where the plaintiff shows title in himself, and there is evidence leading to the conclusion that the defendant has severed the property in question in good faith, believing himself to be the owner, the question whether he so severed the property in question in good faith under the belief that he was the owner of the property should be left to the jury. Hungerford v. Redford, 29 Wis. 345.

In Gates v. Rifle Boom Co. 70 Mich. 309, where trover was brought against the company for the value of logs received from the plaintiff and delivered to parties claiming they had been cut from their lands, it was held that an instruction to the jury that if the plaintiff cut the logs innocently supposing them to be upon his own land, and mixed them with his own so that the logs cut from the owners' land could not be identified, then the owners had the right to select from the common mass a quantity of an average quality with their own equal to the quantity taken from their lands, was correct.

And in the above case it was further stated that if the plaintiff cut the logs and marked and mingled them with his own in good faith, believing them to be his own, then, if the owners took more than they were entitled to, the plaintiff might recover the excess.

So it has been held that where a person bona fide has employed materials not belonging to him in making another article, the owner of the materials has a right to claim the thing made out of them on reimbursing the price of the workmanship, but that there is an exemption where the workmanship is so important that it greatly surpasses the value of the material. Eastman v. Harris, 4 La. Ann. 193, 194.

Therefore where a party trespasses upon land of another, but in good faith, and under the supposed proper authority, takes therefrom property upon which by his own labor he bestows a value very greatly disproportionate to the value of the raw material, he acquires title by accession to the manufactured article, and the original owner can recover only the value of the material taken. Murphy v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 55 Iowa, 473, 474, 39 Am. Rep. 175.

It has, however, been questioned whether the owner of land was not entitled to recover possession of wood cut on the same by one in possession thereof in good faith, under color of title. Kimball v. Lohmas, 31 Cal. 154.

And where the appropriation of the property of another is incidental, as through mistake of fact, and labor has in good faith been expended upon it which converts it into something entirely different and very greatly increases its value, the original article being comparatively of but little value, the title to the property will be held to pass to the per-with one Kidd, by which the latter agreed to keep the cattle off the land; that Peed also paid the taxes about October 1, the tax receipt being delivered to R. J. Spencer at his special request; that in June or July, 1890, Peed sublet the land to the Carpenters, they agreeing to cut the grass growing thereon, stack and bale the hay, and deliver to Peed one half thereof, on board the cars; that the Carpenters commenced cutting the grass and making the hay in controversy during the latter part of August, and had it all in stack by September 25; that in November following, after they had baled a part of the hay, the defendants drove the plaintiffs off the land and took possession of the hay,—that which was baled as well as the portion which was then in stack. It further appears from the testimony that R. J. Spencer rented the land upon which the hay was made, on or about the 21st day of August, 1890, to the defendant Mary E. Lingenfelter. There is likewise in the bill of exceptions evidence tending to establish that Peed refused to take the land for 1890 upon the terms proposed by Mr. Spencer, and that, although the defendants knew the Carpenters were cutting the grass and making the hay early in September, no claim to the hay was made by the defendants until after it had been all stacked.

The first assignment of error is based upon son by whose labor the change has been wrought, and the original owner may recover the value of the article as it was before its conversion. Baker v. Meisch, 29 Neb. 227; Isle Royal Min. Co. v. Hertin, 37 Mich. 332, 26 Am. Rep. 520, 523.

Where the defendant proved that he purchased the right to make the hay of one who claimed to have authority to sell the grass, and that he entered upon the land, made and removed the hay in good faith, with the belief that he had a right to do so, it was held, in an action to recover the possession of such hay brought by the plaintiff, who claimed to be the legal owner thereof, that he was only entitled to recover the value of the grass and not the value of the hay, the defendant cutting in good faith and not as a wilful trespasser, the value of the grass before it was cut being small, and the defendant's labor and time expended thereon greatly increasing its value. Lewis v. Courtright, 77 Iowa, 190.

Where the logs were cut by mistake, and the party so cutting discovered it prior to mixing such property with his own, it was held that the owner might retake his logs or a quantity of the mass sufficient to replace his loss, no matter in what place or condition they were at the time of such retaking, without being liable to pay the diference in value between the stumpage and the value at the time and place of taking. Alpin v. Burch, 68 Wis. 619. Jenking v. Steanka, 19 Wis. 127, 88 Am. Dec. 675; Mowry v. White, 21 Wis. 418; Root v. Bonnema, 22 Wis. 539; Sterns v. Raymond, 26 Wis. 74; Single v. Barnard, 29 Wis. 463; Willard v. Rice, 11 Met. 493, 45 Am. Dec. 226, to the same effect.

And in an action to recover timber which had been made into hoops, it was held that the defendant had a right to show that he had manufactured the hoops in good faith and in the belief that he had the proper authority to do so, and that if he should succeed in making that showing he was entitled to have the jury instructed that the title to the timber was changed by a substantial change of identity, and that the remedy of the plaintiff was an action to recover damages for the unintentional trespass and not in replevin. Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311, 7 Am. Rep. 653.

In Isle Royal Min. Co. v. Hertin, 37 Mich. 332, 26 Am. Rep. 520, 523, the defendant had, by mistake and in good faith, expended labor upon a quantity of cordwood which he had taken and cut from the lands of the plaintiff and hauled and piled upon the bank of a lake, and it was held that the original owners were entitled to the same, and were not liable for the value of the labor expended upon such timber, although they availed themselves of its benefit, as the identity of the property was not destroyed, neither was it converted into an article substantially different, nor was its value greatly enhanced, the court distinguishing the case from that of Wetherbee v. Green, supra, upon the ground that in that case there was a great disparity in value between the standing trees and the hoops which were made from such trees.

Where industrial accessions had been made to property in good faith, by a person having the legal title to the property, so that the real owner was compelled to resort to chancery to assert his equitable title, it was held that equity, upon the civil-law rule of natural equity, would act upon, and compel the complainant to compensate the adverse party for such industrial accessions, or improvements, as a condition of granting the equitable relief asked for in the suit. Putnam v. Ritchie, 6 Paige, 390.

The rule of the civil law in regard to industrial accessions to the property of another, made in good faith by a bona fide possessor, has not been adopted in England or in the state of New York, except so far as to allow him to offset or recoup, in damages, the value of such industrial accessions against the owner's claims for rents and profits during the occupancy of the person who made the improvements upon the property. Ibid.

A purchaser when in possession of land under a contract of purchase on time may use the property as his own, as he would if he had the title, the only remaining interest of the vendor being a right to have the purchase secured, and therefore the purchaser in possession cannot be looked upon as proceeding tortiously per se, so that all who purchased wood, boards, etc., of him, taken from the land, would be liable to the owner of the soil for any value, much less that increased by the labor of the purchaser; and therefore if the articles so sold were raised and sold under such circumstances the vendor has no right to recover such articles in trover. Woolsey v. Seely, Wright (Ohio) 360.

In Martin v. Thompson, 62 Cal. 618, 45 Am. Rep. 663, the action was brought to recover possession of grain sown and harvested by the defendant upon lands to which he claimed title, and of which the defendant had the actual adverse and exclusive possession, and it was held the action would not lie.

III. When severed and converted with wrongful intent.

By the common law of England, as well as by the civil law, a trespasser who wilfully takes the property of another can acquire no right to it on the principle of accession, but the owner may reclaim it whatever alteration or form it may have undergone, unless it be changed into a different species and be incapable of being restored to its former state, and even then, the trespasser by the civil law can acquire no right by accession, unless the materials have been taken away in ignorance of their being the property of another. Peirce v. Goddard, 22 Pick. 559, 33 Am. Dec. 764.

the ruling of the trial court in admitting the evidence of D C. Lingenfelter, to the effect that, upon the trial in the county court of Pierce county of the case of State v. Lingenfelter, Elmer Carpenter, one of the plaintiffs herein, testified that he did not know who was the owner of the S. W. ¼ of Sec. 28, T. 27, R. 3. This evidence was offered and admitted for the purpose of impeachment, by showing that Mr. Carpenter had testified differently in the county court from what his testimony was on the trial of this case concerning his knowledge of the ownership of the land upon which the hay in dispute was made. Whether Mr. Carpenter knew or did not know who owned the land was not relevant to any issue in the case, since it in no manner tended to prove who had the right of possession to the property in controversy at the commencement of the action. The Carpenters claim the right to the hay as sublessees from Mr. Peed, who, it is insisted, is the tenant of Spencer, the owner of the land. The defendant Mary E. Lingenfelter claims under a lease from Spencer. One of the main points in the case, and the one to which the testimony was largely directed, was whether Spencer had rented the land to Peed for the year 1890, and the testimony above referred to sheds no light whatever upon the subject. It is only as to matters relevant

It is an elementary principle of the law that no man can be deprived of his property except by his own voluntary act, or by operation of law, and therefore the thief who sells a chattel or the trespasser who takes it by force acquires no title by such wrongful taking, the subsequent possession by the thief or trespasser being a continuing trespass, and if, during its continuance, the wrongdoer enhances the value of the chattel by labor and skill, as by sawing logs into boards, splitting timber into rails, the manufactured article belongs to the owner of the original material, and he may retake it or recover its improved value in an action for damages. Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 381, 53 Am. Dec. 307.

In Puffendorf it is stated that if a man, out of wilful and designed fraud, puts a new shape on my matter, that he may by this means rob me of it, he neither gains any right over the matter by this act, nor can demand of me a reward for his labor, any more than a thief who digs through my walls can desire to be paid for his great trouble in making a new door into my house. Puffendorf, Law of Nature, B. 4, C. VII., § 10, p. 186.

The acknowledged principle of the civil law is, that a wilful wrongdoer acquires no property in the goods of another, either by the wrongful taking, or by any change wrought in them by his labor or skill, however great that change may be. The new product in its improved state belongs to the owner of the original materials, provided it be proved to have been made from them; the trespasser loses his labor, and that change which is regarded as a destruction of the goods, or an alteration of their identity in favor of an honest possessor, is not so regarded as between the original owner and a wilful violator of his right of property. Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 378, 387, 53 Am. Dec. 307; Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311, 7 Am. Rep. 653. To the same effect are the cases of Hyde v. Cookson, 21 Barb. 104; Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend. 508, 24 Am. Dec. 66; Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 136, 137, 25 Am. Rep. 152; Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. 168, 5 Am. Dec. 204; Betts v. Lee, 5 Johns. 349, 4 Am. Dec. 368; Snyder v. Vaux, 2 Rawle, 427, 21 Am. Dec. 466; Riddle v. Driver, 12 Ala. 590; Martin v. Porter, 5 Mees. & W. 352, 2 Horn & H. 70; Wild v. Holt, 9 Mees. & W. 672, 1 Dowl. N. S. 876; Dunn v. Oneal, 1 Sneed, 106, 60 Am. Dec. 140.

And this is so no matter whether the property be movable or immovable, the owner having the right to that which is united to it by accession or adjunction as against a trespasser. Mitchell v. Stetson, 7 Cush. 435, 439.

The above principles are borne out by the following cases. Eastman v. Harris, 4 La. Ann. 193, 194; Ricketts v. Dorrell, 55 Ind. 470, 474; Reese v. Jared, 15 Ind. 142, 77 Am. Dec. 88; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 32 Ohio St. 571, 30 Am. Rep. 629.

There is no way in which an innocent person can be permanently and legally deprived of his property against his will by the wrongs and trespasses of others, so long as it remains within the power of such innocent person to reclaim his property without committing any serious or substantial injury to the person or property of any other person. Shoemaker v. Simpson, 16 Kan. 43, 48.

If the specific qualities and distinctive character remain unchanged, a trespasser by the mere modification of the material with a knowledge that it was not his cannot devest the original owner of his rights therein. Burris v. Johnson, 1 J. J. Marsh. 196.

The owner may reclaim it so long as its identity is not changed by conversion into some new product. Isle Royal Min. Co. v. Hertin, 37 Mich. 332, 26 Am. Rep. 520, 523.

If the original owner can prove that the improved article was made from the original material the trespasser can acquire no property therein. Murphy v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 55 Iowa, 473, 474, 39 Am. Rep. 175; Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 381, 53 Am. Dec. 307.

And if it can be identified so that it can be redelivered, the owner may recover it no matter whether it be changed in form or addition in value by the labor of the wrongdoer. Weymouth v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 17 Wis. 550, 84 Am. Dec. 763; Williams v. McClanahan, 3 Met. (Ky.) 420, 423.

The claim of the original owner extends even to the result of the thief's labor upon the ground that the thief is estopped from setting up any claim by virtue of his own wrong. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 32 Ohio St. 571, 30 Am. Rep. 629.

And the owner may pursue and reclaim it specifically by whatever remedy the law gives him for that purpose. Single v. Schneider, 24 Wis. 299.

There must, however, be no obstruction of the substantial identity. Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311, 7 Am. Rep. 653.

In Campbell v. Erie R. Co. 46 Barb. 556, it is stated that when property has been feloniously, tortiously, or fraudulently obtained, whenever the owner or creditor is entitled to reclaim, seize, or attach the property itself, if found and identified, the products or the proceeds of, or the substitute for, the original property or thing still follow the nature of the property or thing itself; and this right to take it as a substitute for such thing remains as long as the property can be traced, and only ceases when the subject is turned into money and mixed and confounded in the general view of the same description of property or its identity is destroyed.

A trespasser cannot complain if the owner elects to take his property if he can find it. Gates v. Rifle Boom Co. 70 Mich. 309.

Therefore a wrongdoer cannot, by changing the form of another's property, change the title Single v. Schneider, 24 Wis. 299; Brown v. Sax, 7 Cow. 95.

A stranger to the title, who is a mere trespasser, sowing crops upon the land of another without authority, acquires no title to such crops which belong to the owner of the soil. Freeman v. McLennan, 26 Kan. 151.

to some issue involved in a case that a witness can be contradicted for the purpose of impeachment. This rule is too well settled to require the citation of authorities to sustain it. Another familiar rule of evidence is that when a party is permitted, on cross examination, to ask a witness an immaterial question, he is bound by the evidence so elicited, and cannot rebut it. The statement made by the witness, which it was sought to contradict by other witnesses, was brought out by the defendants upon cross-examination. It follows that it was error to allow the defendants to introduce evidence to impeach Elmer Carpenter upon a matter collateral to the issue involved. For the reason stated above, it was likewise error to admit immaterial evidence offered by the defendants for the purpose of impeaching the witness John Carpenter.

Exceptions were taken to the giving of the sixth and seventh paragraphs of the court's charge to the jury and in the refusing to give plaintiffs' instruction No. 1. For convenience, these instructions will be considered by us at the same time. The sixth and seventh instructions given by the court on its own motion are as follows: (6) "To constitute a valid contract, the parties thereto must have agreed upon the

So, a trespasser cannot convey any title where the property remains in specie and can be identified. Rockwell v. Saunders, 19 Barb. 484.

And this is so for the reason that a wilful trespasser has no rightful possession against the true owner. Galvin v. Bacon, 11 Me. 28, 30, 25 Am. Dec. 258; Bryant v. Ware, 30 Me. 295; Nesbitt v. St. Paul Lumber Co. 2 Minn. 491.

And there is no rule of law which will preclude the owner from recovering the property itself or its value. Strubbee v. Trustees Cincinnati Railway, 78 Ky. 481, 39 Am. Rep. 251, 253; Nesbitt v. St. Paul Lumber Co. supra.

So he can maintain an action for its value against the one converting it. Dawson v. Powell, 9 Bush, 663, 15 Am. Rep. 745.

Therefore where timber is cut by a trespasser without the owner's assent, he may claim it as part of the freehold while it remains upon his premises. Altemose v. Hufsmith, 45 Pa. 121; Harlan v. Harlan, 15 Pa. 507, 53 Am. Dec. 612.

And a trespasser entering land and cutting the grass thereon acquires no title to such grass, or the hay made therefrom, as against the lawful owner. Lindsay v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 29 Minn. 411, 43 Am. Rep. 228; Murphy v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 55 Iowa, 473, 39 Am. Rep. 175.

And any removal of the hay from the land would, under the Iowa Code, § 3983, constitute a crime. Murphy v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. supra.

But it has been held that if a trespasser enters land adjoining a railroad and sows crops thereon he is the owner of such crops. Lindsay v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. supra.

Where a person claiming lands which really belonged to another sold the timber growing thereon, and the purchaser cut and removed the same, it was held that the person so selling was liable to the owner as a principal trespasser. Dreyer v. Ming, 23 Mo. 434.

So, in Snyder v. Vaux, 2 Rawle, 423, 21 Am. Dec. 466, the defendant, a trespasser, had converted the plaintiff's trees into rails and posts and the plaintiff was held entitled to recover them in replevin, as a wilful trespasser cannot acquire title to property merely by changing it from one article into another, as by working trees cut down into shingles, or into cordwood, logs, or rails.

In Betts v. Lee, 5 Johns. 349, 4 Am. Dec. 368, it was held that the title to trees cut down and converted into timber by a trespasser gave him no title to the shingles made out of such timber, the act of cutting down the trees and sawing them into lumber and shingles being considered wrongful, the defendant being a trespasser.

In Davis v. Easley, 13 Ill. 192, trees had been wrongfully cut and converted into boards, and the owner of the land was held entitled to replevin such boards. To the same effect, Ricketts v. Dorrell, 55 Ind. 470.

In the case of Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. 168, 5 Am. Dec. 204, the defendant cut timber upon the plaintiff's land and converted it into coal without the consent or knowledge of the owner. Although the timber by being cut and converted into coal had lost its primitive form, yet the identity of the original material was ascertained or admitted, and so plaintiff recovered.

So, in Riddle v. Driver, 12 Ala. 590, trover was brought to recover 1,500 bushels of coal which had been made by the defendant from wood claimed as belonging to the plaintiff and hauled and converted into coal by the defendant, and the court held the action would lie.

Where a field of growing corn was unlawfully converted, it was held that the trespasser was not entitled to compensation for labor expended by him upon such crop even though his services increased its value. Stuart v. Phelps, 39 Iowa, 14.

In Ellis v. Wire, 33 Ind. 127, 5 Am. Rep. 189, the defendant forcibly took possession of the plaintiff's corn as it stood in the field, drove the plaintiff away and harvested and sold the grain, and in an action to recover for the conversion of the wheat, the defendant claimed to be entitled to the value of his labor, but the court denied his claim and found for the plaintiff, following the principles laid down in Betts v. Lee, 5 Johns. 349, 4 Am. Dec. 368.

And in Hooser v. Hays, 10 B. Mon. 72, 50 Am. Dec. 540, it is said if a disseisor seize the ground and sever the corn, and the disseisee re-enter, he shall have the corn because he entereth in by a former title, and a severance or removing of the corn altereth not the case, for the regress is a continuation of the freehold in him in judgment of law from the beginning.

So, in Simpkins v. Rogers, 15 Ill. 397, it was held that trover might be maintained by the owner of real estate to recover crops which had been put upon his land without license or authority.

In Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 381, 53 Am. Dec. 307, corn had been taken by a wilful trespasser and converted into whiskey, and the court stated that the property was not changed and that the whiskey belonged to the owner of the original material (corn), and further that such whiskey was liable to be taken on an execution against the owner of the corn, overruling the same case reported in 6 Hill, 425, 41 Am. Dec. 753, where it was held that if one wrongfully takes another's grain and manufactures it into whiskey the property is so far changed that the whiskey belongs to the manufacturer, the nature and species of the commodity being entirely changed and its identity destroyed.

In Chandler v. Edson, 9 Johns. 362, it was held that a person who, with the written consent of the peace-makers of the tribe of Stockbridge Indians, entered and cut down trees and carried away the timber, of which he made shingles, was a trespasser, notwithstanding such license, and acquired no property in the timber or shingles.

In Stearns v. Raymond, 26 Wis. 74, logs had been unlawfully cut and intermixed by the trespassers so that they could not be distinguished from their own. It was held, it being clearly proved that the same thing, and in the same sense, and must not have left the matter open for future agreement. If you find from the evidence in this case that I. W. Peed and R. J. Spencer made and entered into a contract, by the terms of which Peed became the lessee of the land described in the petition, for the purpose of the hay and grass grown thereon in the year 1890, and thereafter Peed and the plaintiffs John and Elmer Carpenter made a contract by which the latter were to cut and bale the hay and grass growing on the said land for that year, and the parties to such agreement were to own the same jointly, and in pursuance to such last-named contract the plaintiffs John and Elmer Carpenter did cut and bale said hay and grass, then the plaintiffs would be the owners of the hay, and entitled to its possession, and you should so find by your verdict. If, however, Peed did not contract for the land for the year 1890, or the hay and grass grown thereon that year, with R. J. Spencer, or any other person having authority to contract with reference thereto, then any agreement that Peed may have made with John and Elmer Carpenter with reference to the hay and grass grown on said land for that year would not confer upon the plaintiffs any title to or right of possession intermixing was intentional so as to deprive the plaintiff of his property therein, that replevin would lie to recover the amount of logs belonging to him from the entire bulk.

If logs be fraudulently taken and made into boards, and intermixed with those belonging to the trespasser so as to become undistinguishable, with a fraudulent intent, the whole may be recovered by the owner of such logs in an action of replevin. Wingate v. Smith, 20 Me. 287.

And the difficulty of proving the identity is not a good reason why the wrongful conversion of the original materials into an article of a different name or a different species should work a transfer of title from the true owner to the trespasser, where the article can be identified, as it relates merely to the convenience of the remedy, and not at all to the right. Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 53 Am. Dec. 307, Overruling 6 Hill, 425, 41 Am. Dec. 753, 4 Denio, 332.

The plaintiff, however innocent, can acquire no property in logs he has cut upon the lands of another, or even acquire a lien upon them for labor or expense, as the conversion of trees into saw-logs by a trespasser does not change the title to the property nor destroy the identity of the same, the owners of the land being the owners of the logs, the trespasser having no title. Gates v. Rifle Boom Co. 70 Mich. 309.

And in such a case the owner is entitled to the enhanced value, and is not confined to the value of the timber as it stood in the woods or at the place where it was sawed into planks or boards. Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend. 505, 24 Am. Dec. 66; Rice v. Hollenbeck, 19 Barb. 664.

He is entitled to the full value of the property at the time and place of demand or of suit brought, without any deduction for the wrongdoer's labor or expense. E. E. Bolles Wooden Ware Co. v. United States, 106 U. S. 432, 27 L. ed. 250.

When, as against a trespasser, the owner regains possession, he has converted no property of the trespasser to his own use, and if the owner takes possession of the property while upon his lands he will be entitled to the materials as they are and no claim can be made against him by the trespasser for labor and expense in cutting, as in such a case the identity of the property would not have been destroyed and the subsequent intermingling, although innocently done, could not change the rights of the owner. Gates v. Rifle Boom Co. 70 Mich. 309.

If the article was taken mala fides, by theft or with a wilful purpose to do wrong, the consequences are different from those which follow for an act done under an honest mistake. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 32 Ohio St. 571, 30 Am. Rep. 629.

The rule is limited to wilful wrongdoers. Clement v. Duffy, 54 Iowa, 635.

If a party intending to commit a trespass on public land through mistake cuts down trees on the land of another, he is liable to the penalty for such trespass, but if his intention is to cut down trees upon his own land, and by mistake he cuts those on another's land, he will not be liable to the penalty but only for the actual damage done. Perkins v. Hackleman, 26 Miss. 41, 46, 59 Am. Dec. 243.

An instruction to the jury as to the difference between a wilful and an intentional trespass, in substance, that if the trespass was a wilful one, if the plaintiff knew he was cutting the logs of others, and so, knowing them not to be his, intermingled them with his own so that they could not be distinguished, the owner had a right to take more than his own, and if, in order to get all that belonged to him and without intending to take more than belonged to him, he did take a better quality of logs than he had lost, if he did not make the selection with that view, the plaintiff could not recover for such excess in quality, was held to be correct. Gates v. Rifle Boom Co. 70 Mich. 309.

If a trespasser takes a chattel into his own possession and the owner sues and recovers damages for the specific chattel so taken and detained, the recovery and execution done thereon will change the property, by operation of law, on the principle that solutio pretii emptionis loco habetur. Curtis v Groat, 6 Johns. 168, 5 Am. Dec. 204, in which case timber had been cut and converted into coal.

If the owner of timber cut upon his land by a trespasser gains possession of it increased in value, he has the benefit of the increased value, as the law neither devests him of his property nor requires him to pay for improvements made without his authority. Foote v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490, 20 Am. Rep. 153.

Labor and expense bestowed upon property by the trespasser, although they may have added to its value, are merely incidents which follow the right of property, and cannot be separated from it, and necessarily accrue to the owner. Mitchell v. Stetson, 7 Cush. 435, 439.

Yet the articles manufactured by another will not be confiscated to the owner of the original material, unless the facts justifying such confiscation are clearly established. Baker v. Meisch, 29 Neb. 227.

A wrongdoer is bound to account to the true owner for the value of the chattel in its changed or improved condition, and his recovery will not be limited to its value in the condition in which it was at the time of the conversion. Guckenheimer v. Angevine, 81 N. Y. 394, 397.

The reason for the rule is that if a wilful trespasser were able to protect himself by any change which he might communicate to the shape or form of the materials, an unbounded license would be given to plunder and the security of personal property would be exceedingly diminished. Snyder v. Vaux, 2 Rawle, 423, 21 Am. Dec. 466.

There is no injustice in holding that the trespasser must lose the labor he has expended in converting another's trees into logs, as such trespasses are the result of negligence on the part of the trespasser and there is no good reason why he should be com-of the hay, and your verdict should be for the defendants." (7) "If you find from the evidence that R. J. Spencer, having authority to do so, leased the land described in the petition, for the purpose of the hay and grass grown thereon in the year 1890, to the defendant Mary E. Lingenfelter, through her husband, as her agent, and that no lease of said premises had been previously made for said year to I. W. Peed, your verdict should be for the defendants." The following is the plaintiffs' request to charge, and which was refused by the court: (1) "If you shall find from the evidence that I. W. Peed claimed to be the owner of the grass which has been converted into the hay in controversy, and the plaintiffs, under the contract with said Peed, cut said grass, and converted the same into hay in the stack or bales, and, by the bestowal of such labor thereon, greatly increased the value of the grass, and that such work was done in good faith, believing that Peed was the owner of said grass when they made said contract with him, and while performing said labor and manufacturing said hay, then your verdict will be for the plaintiffs."

pensated for labor and expenses incurred in the trespass when it might have been avoided by proper diligence. Gates v. Rifle Boom Co. 70 Mich. 309.

To give to wilful trespassers, or those to whom they may sell the benefit of any increased value put upon it by the original vendor, and confine the owner to a nominal value, would encourage the commission of trespass and make purchasers careless as to the title they acquire. Tuttle v. White, 46 Mich. 485, 487, 41 Am. Rep. 175.

The fact that the trespasser loses the labor and expense he has put upon the property he has wrongfully taken results as a punishment to him for his act, and on this ground the original owner recovers the increased value, not because of any right in him, but because the law gives this infliction as a terror to offenders. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 32 Ohio St. 571, 30 Am. Rep. 629.

In the case of a tortious or fraudulent taking of a chattel out of the possession of its owner, actual or constructive, the party injured may, at his election, have trespass de bonis asportatis or replevin. Ely v. Ehle, 3 N. Y. 506.

The true owner of land is entitled to maintain trover to recover the possession of wood cut by one in possession of the land without lawful title, such wood belonging to the owner of the fee. Kimball v. Lohmas, 31 Cal. 154.

But where the owner of timber sued for conversion of the same against the employer of the trespasser whose trespass was not wilful, it was held he was only entitled to recover the value of the timber at the time and place of cutting. Ayres v. Hubbard, 57 Mich. 322, 58 Am. Rep. 361.

In Single v. Schneider, 30 Wis. 570, the court held that if the owner was entirely indemnified for the injury he had sustained, it was quite immaterial whether the logs in question were cut by mistake or intentionally, unless in the latter case the trespass was of such a character as to make the doctrine of exemplary damages applicable, the court adopting the view expressed by Justice Paine in Weymouth v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 17 Wis. 550, 555, 84 Am. Dec. 763.

In Webster v. Moe, 35 Wis. 75, 78, it was shown that the decision in the case of Single v. Schneider, supra, to the effect that the usual measure of damages was the value of the property before it had been improved by the skill and labor of the wrongdoer, even where the property had been taken by him knowingly, except where such taking was accompanied by acts of insult or malice which would justify exemplary damages, had led to the passing of the act of the legislature of 1873 (Laws 1873, chap. 263) which prescribed the value of damages for the wrongful cutting of timber, and changed the rule laid down in that case.

But if the article is annexed to or made a part of some other thing which is the principal the rule is different. Ricketts v. Dorrell, 55 Ind. 470, 474, following Davis v. Easley, 13 Ill. 192.

The wrongful taker cannot, by any act of his own, acquire title against the owner, unless he destroys the identity of the thing, or annexes it to and makes it a part of, some other thing which is the principal. Davis v. Easley, 13 Ill. 192, 198.

And he cannot acquire title unless he changes the property from personalty to realty. Brown v. Sax, 7 Cow. 95.

The rule, however, applies only to the owner of the property taken, and not to a stranger. Wincher v. Shrewsbury, 3 Ill. 283, 284, 35 Am. Dec. 108.

But in Moody v. Whitney, 38 Me. 174, 61 Am. Dec. 239, the defendants had cut timber from the plaintiff's land and converted it to their own use, and it was held that the original owner upon regaining possession of such property with its accretions after the conversion was entitled to the value of the property together with the accretions after the conversion in case it were again converted, both as against the original converter and a stranger.

So there must be some limit to the right to follow and reclaim materials which have undergone a process of manufacture. Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311, 7 Am. Rep. 653.

The right of the owner to retain the article does not exist where it has been so changed as to alter the title. Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend. 505, 24 Am. Dec. 66.

Where the owner and occupant was forcibly expelled from his premises, and the land was subsequently improved and a crop raised thereon by the trespassers, and the original owner was subsequently restored to possession under a process of forcible entry and detainer, and the crops raised by the labor of one of such trespassers were taken and converted by such original owner to his own use, it was held in an action brought against him in trover that he was under the circumstances legally entitled to the crops, and the action failed. Thomes v. Moody, 11 Me. 139.

Where a contract existed between the land owner and another person, whereby the latter was to cultivate the land and harvest the hay for a share thereof, it was held that the party seizing the whole crop, either before or after severance, and disposing of it in denial of the other party's rights, was liable for the share so disposed of in trover. Reed v. McRill, 41 Neb. 206.

In De Mott v. Hagerman, 8 Cow. 220, 18 Am. Dec. 443, it was held that, where a person enters and ousts the owner of land continuing in possession and occupying it, and cutting and removing off the crops, though sown by the owner, replevin would not lie by the owner to recover the crops so removed; that the only remedy was in trespass quare clausum fregit, after regaining possession by ejectment or by re-entry.

Under the Pennsylvania Statute of May 4, 1869 (Purdon's Digest, 1467, 1468), it is unlawful for any owner or owners of any undivided interest in timber lands to cut or remove, or to cause to be cut or removed, from the said land any timber trees, without first obtaining the written consent of all cotenants in the said premises; and by the 2d section of such act no sale of any such timber, cut or removed before or without such consent, passes any title thereto, and the parties injured may pro-

The vice imputed to the court's charge quoted above is that plaintiffs' right to recover was, by the rule announced by the court, made to depend wholly upon whether Spencer leased to Peed for the year 1890 the premises upon which the hay in question was made. Plaintiffs' right to the possession of the hay was not based alone upon the fact that a contract of lease had been made between Peed and the owner of the land, but as well upon the fact, established by the evidence, that they had entered upon the premises as the lessees of Peed, honestly believing that he had the right to make such lease, and in good faith cut the grass and made the same into hay, with the knowledge of the defendants, and without any objection or protest on their part until after the work was done. This feature of the case was entirely withdrawn from the consideration of the jury by the instructions given. An important inquiry, therefore, is whether the charge of the court was for that reason erroneous. Ordinarily a change in the form of property, by a person other than the owner, will not have the effect to change the title, but the original owner may sustain replevin if the property is ceed in law or in equity for the recovery of the said timber and the articles manufactured therefrom, and also for damages in like manner only as against an entire stranger; and it has been held under this statute that the parties injured by such removal may recover such value making no allowance for the trespasser's labor or expenses with regard to such timber. Duff v. Bindley, 16 Fed. Rep. 178.

The Pennsylvania Statute of 1871, May 15 (Pamph. Laws, 268), which gives the owner of realty power to bring action in replevin for timber cut, and also for lumber and coal severed from the property, even though the title may be in dispute, has been held not to include growing crops, such crops not being included in the words "other property" as used in the act, they being merely ephemeral. Renick v. Boyd, 99 Pa. 555, 44 Am. Rep. 124.

In Benjamin v. Benjamin, 15 Conn. 347, 39 Am. Dec. 384, it was held that a wife in charge of her husband's farm would have no implied authority to authorize or permit an attachment creditor of the husband to cut and remove and sell grass growing upon such farm, and that an action of trespass quare clausum fregit with account de bonis asportatis would lie.

IV. Distinguishable though changed or mixed.

The rule as to the right to property by accession, both in the civil and common law, would seem to be that no one by any operation upon or change of the materials of another, can make them his own, except the change is so great as to convert the materials themselves into a different species; thus the cloth of another which, without leave of the owner, is made into a coat or other garment, or his leather into shoes, or timber squared and fitted for use, does not vest in the operator; but all the owner has to do, to reclaim his property in its new shape, is to identify the materials. But if his corn be made into meal, his olives into oil, or his grapes into wine, the change is a new species, and is so great that the original materials cannot be reproduced out of the articles, and the new article belongs to the operator, who is only bound for the value of the original materials. Lampton v. Preston, 1 J. J. Marsh. 454, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

It is a settled principle, both in law and in equity, that the true owner of property cannot be deprived of his or her right to it by changing it into something else, as long as the identity can be ascertained and traced. Barry v. Brune, 8 Hun, 399.

Therefore so long as the owner of the article can identify it he can follow it into the manufactured article. Potter v. Mardre, 74 N. C. 36.

And this is so no matter what alteration or form any property may undergo, provided the owner can prove the identity of the original materials. Snyder v. Vaux, 2 Rawle, 423, 21 Am. Dec. 466. To the same effect, Firmin v. Firmin, 9 Hun, 572; Brown v. Sax, 7 Cow. 95; Gallup v. Josselyn, 7 Vt. 334; Riddle v. Driver, 12 Ala. 590; Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311, 7 Am. Rep. 653; Davis v. Easley, 13 Ill. 192, 198; Millar v. Humphries, 2 A. K. Marsh. 447, 449; Eaton v. Munroe, 52 Me. 63.

And this is so, even though the original substance may have received an accession of value by natural or artificial means. Millar v. Humphries, supra.

The civil law required the thing to be changed into a different species and to be incapable of being restored to its ancient form, as grapes made into wine, before the original proprietor could lose his title, nor even then did the other party acquire any title by the accession, unless the materials had been taken away in ignorance of their being the property of another, the civil law in its usual wisdom giving no encouragement to trespassers. Betts v. Lee, 5 Johns. 349, 4 Am. Dec. 368.

And the same doctrine is laid down in the Year Books, 5 Hen. VII., 15, 12 Hen. VIII., 10, as, if leather be made into shoes, or cloth into a coat, or a tree be severed into timber.

So, in Firmin v. Firmin, 9 Hun, 572, the doctrine was applied even though the trespass was wrongful but not wilful, there not being such a change of material as to make the logs the property of the defendant.

According to the admitted principles of the common law, so long as property wrongfully taken retains it original form and substance, or may be reduced to its original materials, it belongs to the original owner without reference to the degree of improvement or the additional value given to it by the labor of the wrongdoer; and the rule holds good against an innocent purchaser from the wrongdoer, although its value be increased by the labor of such purchaser. Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 53 Am. Dec. 307, Overruling 6 Hill, 425, 41 Am. Dec. 753, 4 Denio, 332.

This rule was applied in this case to whiskey made from corn wrongfully taken.

The right of pursuit and reclamation only ceases when its identity is lost and further pursuit is hopeless, but the law protects the interest of the true owner by giving him an action, as for the conversion of the chattel, against anyone who has interfered with his dominion over it, although such interference may have been innocent in intention and under a claim of right and in reliance upon the title of the felonious taker. Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 133, 136, 25 Am. Rep. 152, 5 Lans. 425.

Where the identity of the original article is susceptible of being traced, the ideal of a change in the property is never admitted unless the value of that which has been expended upon it is sufficiently great, as compared with the original value, to render the injustice of permitting its appropriation by the original owner so gross and palpable as to be apparent. Isle Royal Min. Co. v. Hertin, 37 Mich. 332, 26 Am. Rep. 520, 523.

The title to goods intermixed with others is not lost where they are distinguishable, even though so intermixed with the purpose of defeating and delaying creditors. Allen v. Kirk, 81 Iowa, 658.

susceptible of identification, unless the change has been wrought in good faith by an innocent party, who, by his labor and skill bestowed thereon, has greatly increased its value. But, where a chattel taken by a wilful trespasser is enhanced by his labor and skill, the manufactured article belongs to the owner of the original material, and he may recover possession by replevin. The rule stated above is in conflict with some adjudications which may be found, but is supported by the weight of authority in this country, and is in accordance with the principles of natural justice. The same doctrine was held and applied by this court in the case of Baker v. Meisch, 29 Neb. 227. That was an action for replevin to recover a quantity of brick manufactured by the defendant from clay belonging to the plaintiff. The defendant entered upon the land and manufactured the brick, in good faith, under a lease from one Palmer, who never owned the land, but who claimed to be such owner. There was judgment for the defendant in the trial court, which was affirmed by this court. We quote the third point in the syllabus: "The doctrine of the accession of property

And in all cases where the new product cannot be identified by mere inspection, the original material must be traced by the testimony of witnesses from hand to hand through the process of transformation. Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 53 Am. Dec. 307, Overruling 6 Hill, 425, 41 Am. Dec. 753, 4 Denio, 332.

In Reid v. King, 89 Ky. 388, lumber headings had become merged with other headings of the same description and value, and it was held that they might be recovered without identification of the particular headings belonging to the plaintiff, even as against a bona fide purchaser, where the timber was cut by a trespasser.

In Bent v. Hoxie, 90 Wis. 625, replevin was brought to recover pine lumber manufactured from standing timber sold to the defendant by the plaintiff, the title to which was retained by the plaintiff until payment of the purchase price, which lumber was taken by defendant and intermixed with his own which was the same in quality and value. It was held that the plaintiff retained the title to the lumber cut from the logs, or so much thereof as remained unsold, in its possession until the whole purchase price was paid. And in answer to the argument that the plaintiff could not replevin out of the common mass but must find and identify the lumber made from her own logs, the court held that as the common mass was being made up of lumber of the same quality and value drawn from two lots of logs, and the plaintiff's logs contributed to make up such common mass, she had a right to replevin from it a quantity considerably less than her contribution, the court relying upon the cases of Young v. Miles, 20 Wis. 615, and Mowry v. White, 21 Wis. 418.

Where the action was for the conversion of logs which had been manufactured into lumber, it was held that although the owner of the land from which they were taken might have treated the removal as a conversion, yet he was not compellable to do so, but might follow and retain such logs. Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218, 232.

So, where the defendant had cut down plaintiff's trees and made them into logs, it was held that the plaintiff was still the owner. Betts v. Lee, 5 Johns. 349, 4 Am. Dec. 368; Firmin v. Firmin, 9 Hun, 572.

And where a party took trees and sawed them into boards and plank, the owner of the trees was held entitled to take the boards or plank, or to bring trover for them. Brown v. Sax, 7 Cow. 95; Davis v. Easley, 13 Ill. 192.

And the same principles were applied in Snyder v. Vaux, 2 Rawle, 423, 21 Am. Dec. 466, where trees were converted into rails and posts; in Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. 168, 5 Am. Dec. 204; Riddle v. Driver, 12 Ala. 590, where timber was converted into coal; and also in Chandler v. Edson, 9 Johns. 362, where timber was made into shingles.

In Gallup v. Josselyn, 7 Vt. 334, timber had been cut and drawn on the plaintiff's land for the purpose of building a barn upon his premises under a contract, and it was held that the title to such timber remained in him as against the creditors of the contractor.

In such cases the inherent and distinctive qualities of the material remain the same, although there has been a "specific" but not an essential change, and although the identity of the thing has been lost, yet the essence of the material has undergone no change, the essential and constituent particles of each being the same. Lampton v. Preston, 1 J. J. Marsh. 454, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

In Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311, 7 Am. Rep. 653, a tenant in common of timber land conveyed his interest to a creditor upon the understanding that such interest was to be reconveyed to him upon payment of the debt, and afterwards his cotenant, pursuant to a previous consent, sold a quantity of the timber to a third person who cut and manufactured the same into hoops. Upon replevin being brought by the owners of the land to recover the hoops, the value of which greatly exceeded that of the timber, it was held that the defendant might show that he purchased and manufactured in good faith and was entitled to show that the title to the timber was changed by the substantial change of identity, therefore the plaintiff's action was in trespass and not replevin.

V. When article changed by process.

In the civil law it is said: "He that made the new species shall be master of the whole, if it cannot be easily reduced to its first state and condition; as when one shall press wine from your grapes, or build a ship from your timber, you cannot claim the wine or the ship." Wood, Civil Law, 111, bk. II.

But this doctrine only takes place in favor of the workman, where the work was designed for his own use, and where he erroneously and by mistake thought the matter was his own; for, if it was intended for the use of any other, it is his upon the same terms for whose use it was working; and if it is known that the grapes and timber are another's, and yet thereof he proceeds to make his wine or ship, he shall lose his labor and workmanship. The whole shall accrue to the owner and an action may be maintained against him. Ibid.

In Molloy, de Jure Mar., lib. 2, chap. 1, § 7, it is laid down as a settled principle of law that if a man cuts down the trees of another, or takes timber or plank prepared for the erection or repairing of a dwelling house, nay, though some of them be for shipping, and builds a ship, the property follows not the owners but the builders. Peirce v. Goddard, 22 Pick. 561, 33 Am. Dec. 764.

In Justinian it is stated "that if the species or manufactured article can be reduced to its former rude materials, then the owner of such materials is to be reckoned the owner of the species; but if the species cannot be so reduced, then he who made it is understood to be the owner of it; for example, a vessel can easily be reduced to the rude mass of brass, silver, or gold of which it is made; but wine, oil, or flour cannot be converted into grapes, olives, or corn, neither can mulse be separated into wine and honey. But if a man makes any species, applies where one has wilfully, as a trespasser, taken the property of another, and altered it in substance or form by his own labor. Where, however, the appropriation was through a mistake of fact, and labor has been expended upon it which converts it into something very different from the original article and greatly increases its value, and the value of the original article is insignificant in comparison with the new product, the title to the property in its converted form will pass to the person who has thus expended his labor, the original owner to recover the value of the original article." Mr. Cobbey, in his book on the Law of Replevin, at § 393, says: "If a person bestows his labor upon the property of another, thereby changing it into another species of article, the property is changed, and the owner of the original material cannot recover the article in its altered condition, but is only entitled to its value in the shape in which it was taken from him. It is not essential that it remain in its original form so long as it can be identified. But if the change has been wrought in good faith by an innocent party, and it has been materially increased in value or has become incorporated partly with his own, and partly with the materials of another, as if he should make mulse with his own wine and another's honey, or should make a garment with an intermixture of his own wool with that of another, it is not to be doubted in such cases but that he who made the species is master of it." Lib. 2, tit. 1, p. 75; Lampton v. Preston, 1 J. J. Marsh. 454, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

It was an established doctrine of the common law as early as the Year Books, that no change of mere form could devest the right of the owner of the materials, as leather made into shoes, cloth into coats, timber into planks, blocks, or shingles, in all of which cases the material is not altered in its qualities or kind and could be easily identified. Ibid.

The general rule of the common law in regard to title by accession, is that, whatever alteration of form has taken place in personal property, the owner is entitled to such property in its state of improvement, unless the identity of the original materials has been destroyed, or unless the thing has been annexed to, and made part of, some other thing which is the principal, or its nature has been changed from personal to real property; but if the thing itself, by such operation, was changed into a different species, it belongs to the new operator who has only to make satisfaction to the former proprietor for the materials which he has so converted. Aborn v. Mason, 14 Blatchf. 405, 409.

The common law and civil law agree that if the chattel wrongfully taken comes into the hands of an innocent holder, who, believing himself to be the owner, converts the chattel into a thing of different species, so that its identity is destroyed, the original owner cannot reclaim it. Such a change is wrought when wheat is made into bread, olives into oil, or grapes into wine, and in a case of this kind the change in the species of the chattel is not an intentional wrong to the original owner, and it is therefore regarded as a destruction or consumption of the original materials, and the true owner is not permitted to trace the identity into the manufactured article, for the purpose of appropriating to his own use the labor and skill of the innocent occupant who wrought the change; but he is put to his action for damages as for a thing consumed, and may recover its value as it was when the conversion or consumption took place. Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 385, 53 Am. Dec. 307; Wetherbee v. Green, 22 Mich. 311, 7 Am. Rep. 653.

If the manufacturer takes the material fraudulently as to the owner by converting it into another species, he acquires no title to the article in its new form, and the original owner may recover the manufactured article, but if he takes it by mistake believing it to belong to him, the article belongs to him and he is answerable only for the materials used. Reader v. Moody, 3 Jones, L. 372.

Even if things have been tortiously taken and have not lost their identity, the owner may recover them in their changed form unless they have been annexed to and made part of something which is the principal, or changed its form from personal to real estate; and where the nature of the thing is not changed they may be reclaimed by the original owner in their new and improved state. Worth v. Northam, 4 Ired. L. 102; Ricketts v. Dorrell, 55 Ind. 470, 474; Peirce v. Goddard, 22 Pick. 561, 33 Am. Dec. 764.

In Rockwell v. Saunders, 19 Barb. 484, it was stated that since the case of Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 53 Am. Dec. 307, where the form is changed and the value is materially enhanced by the labor of the possessor, the criterion is whether it was done in good faith, rather than whether the property can be identified.

Where the defendant had wrongfully cut and trimmed the plaintiff's trees, and it was impossible to separate the original property in them from the value subsequently added, the court stated that it was unnecessary to cite authorities to show that the plaintiff, after they were cut and trimmed, remained the owner of the timber made from them free from any lien or claim of the defendant for his labor, and that he might therefore lawfully take it peaceably into his possession. Foote v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490, 20 Am. Rep. 153.

In Chapin v. Freeland, 142 Mass. 383, 50 Am. Rep. 701, it is stated that the rule that the title of personal property is lost by wrongful conversion of it into some other species of property, or by making it a part of real estate, has its foundation in the impossibility or impracticability of tracing the property, or of severing it from the real estate, and when personal chattels are, without the consent of the owner and without right, taken by another and affixed to real property, the title of the owner is not lost unless the identity of the chattels has been destroyed, or they have been so affixed to the real property that it is impracticable to sever them.

If the thing itself be changed by the operation of the trespasser into a different species, as by making wine, oil, or bread out of another's grapes, olives, or wheat, it belongs to the new operator, who is to make satisfaction to the former owner for the materials he has so converted. Millar v. Humphries, 2 A. K. Marsh. 447, 449.

And the original owner must content himself with the value of the article in the shape it was taken from him. Potter v. Mardre, 74 N. C. 36.

The rule as laid down in the books is indefinite, and in some of the cases it seems to be twofold, (1) that there must be a changed form of the species; (2) that the thing changed must be insusceptible of reduction to the original quality and kind. Lampton v. Preston, 1 J. J. Marsh. 454, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

The reason why the material of one which has been changed into a different species by another is not to be restored to the original owner is that it cannot be returned in kind, as it is not the specific thing which belonged to him, and therefore is not his and cannot be his unless the original material can be restored without any intrinsic change, and therefore as long as it remains a new and essentially different species it cannot be recovered by suit from the person who effected the change in it. Ibid.

Some authorities hold that the proper test of the with another thing, which is the principal and it is only a part, replevin would not be allowed." The author cites numerous cases which sustain the text. The same doctrine is laid down in Wells on Replevin, in § 216; and, at § 217, Mr. Wells, in discussing the duty of the owner to reclaim his property before its value has been greatly enhanced by the labor of another, says: "The rule in Wisconsin seems to commend itself as well for its plainness as for the manifest justice which it seems to deal out to all parties. It is there held that the owner of chattels does not lose his property by mere change of form at the hands right of the first owner is the identity of the thing or material; while others hold the test to be its capacity for being converted into the original species; while another class hold that the nonaccession of adventitious value exceeding that of the original material is to be the test; and in others the retention by the material of its specific character or kind or quality is said to be the test. Ibid.

The property is changed by a change made in its species or substantial form, if made by one who is acting in good faith and under an honest belief that the title is in him. Potter v. Mardre, supra.

And if the elements of the material have not been changed, but the specific thing which they constitute cannot be reproduced identically by individual operation, the owner of the material does not own the new species. Lampton v. Preston, supra.

In Merritt v. Johnson, 7 Johns. 473, 5 Am. Dec. 289, it was held that when the materials of one are united with the material of another by the latter's labor, or by the labor of another, and the latter owns the principal materials, and those of the first person are only accessory, the latter acquires the right of property in the whole by right of accession.

In Wells v. Batts, 112 N. C. 283, it was held that a wife neglecting to see that crops raised upon her lands were not intermixed with those raised upon the land of her husband, could not claim them as against her husband's mortgagee where it could not be determined how much was raised upon the respective properties, and the crops could not be distinguished.

In Faulcon v. Johnston, 102 N. C. 264, the question was whether the owner of land in the adverse possession of another could assert a title to the crops grown thereon during such adverse occupancy, and in its assertion by waiving the tort pursue and recover the specific articles thus raised or their value in the hands of a stranger who might have received them and converted them to his own use, or the rent paid him by the tenants; and the court held that the crops, the product of the labor of the trespassing possessor and his agent, belong to him and are not the property of the owner of the soil.

In Potter v. Mardre, 74 N. C. 36, the plaintiff, a tenant for life, cut timber from the land, and used part of it in the repair of property and part for the purpose of making a canoe. It was held in an action brought by the reversioners that they could not recover the article in its altered condition, but were only entitled to its value in the shape in which it was taken from them, the court following its prior decision in Bennett v. Thompson, 13 Ired. L. 146, and Albea v. Griffin, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 9, upon the same point.

But a mere change in the external shape or in the bulk is immaterial. Lampton v. Preston, 1 J. J. Marsh. 454, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

The accession of mere value by the application of labor or skill alone is generally not sufficient to transfer the proprietorship to the operator; there must in general be the addition of some other material belonging to the possessor or operator before the product can vest in him. Ibid.

There may be such a modification of a material of one man by the operations of another as to change its name and its specific identity, or individuality, without a mutilation of its original qualities and ingredients, as the change effected by the conversion of timber into planks or shingles, although the shingles are not the trees but they are still the wood. Ibid.

Shingles, tables, or boards, etc., made out of the timber of another, contain, so far as they contain anything, the same particles which constitute the timber; the specific qualities of wood are the same, precisely; therefore the material is exactly the same, and the new species must still belong to the owner of the wood, when the accessory value has not been so great as on the ground, to change the title. Ibid.

In the case of Strubbee v. Trustees Cincinnati Railway, 78 Ky. 481, 39 Am. Rep. 251, 253, the action was for the identical property sold to the railroad company by the trespasser, without any change having been made in its condition, except such as had been caused by the labor of the wrongdoer, and the court stated that the rule was well established, with scarcely an exception, that where the identity of the original article could be traced, the right of property in the original owner continued to exist.

If the goods are of the same nature and value, although not capable of an actual separation by identifying each particular, yet if a division can be made of equal value, each may claim his aliquot part, where it does not appear there was any fraudulent intent in the mixing. Stone v. Quaal, 36 Minn. 46.

It is only where the identity of the original material has been destroyed, or where its value is insignificant compared with the value of the article manufactured from it, or to which it has been annexed, that the law is otherwise. Foote v. Merrill, 54 N. H. 490, 20 Am. Rep. 153.

VI. Position of purchaser.

With respect to the position of a purchaser of such articles, it has been held that a person purchasing personal property runs his risk as to the title he is acquiring, and if he purchases from a trespasser, or one who has no title and can give none, he must suffer the loss or look to his vendor. Tuttle v. White, 46 Mich. 485, 487, 41 Am. Rep. 175.

The purchaser from a thief, however honest and bona fide the purchase may have been, cannot hold the stolen chattels against the true proprietor, but the latter may follow and reclaim wherever and in whosesoever hands they may be found. Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 133, 136, 25 Am. Rep. 152, 5 Lans. 425.

Every purchaser of property must know at his peril of whom he is purchasing, and if his vendor has acquired the property as a trespasser; a purchase from him, although in good faith, cannot be relied on as a defense to the claim of the real owner, and no demand is required to be made of the innocent purchaser in such a case, because having obtained the property from a wrongdoer his possession is tortious. Strubbee v. Trustees Cincinnati Railway, 78 Ky. 481, 39 Am. Rep. 251, 253.

In Joslin v. Cowee, 60 Barb. 49, 55, it is stated that it is only innocent purchasers who purchase property converted into a different species that can be protected, and even an innocent purchaser of another, but he should reclaim it before the new possessor has greatly increased its value by the bestowal of his skill and labor, and in the event of his failure to do so he should be restricted in his recovery to the amount of damages he has actually sustained, unless the taking was accompanied with some circumstances of malice or insult that might make it proper to inflict exemplary damages. This rule, while it protects the owner fully, will be easy of application, and do justice to both parties, when such a result is attainable. In Michigan a somewhat similar doctrine prevails. When timber worth $25 had, by one in the ex-cannot be so protected where he takes the title from a trespasser or wrongdoer, for the reason that the trespasser has no title to give; and in such a case the owner of the original material may retake it in its improved state, or recover the improved value. To the same effect, Silsbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379, 381, 53 Am. Dec. 307.

And this is so for the reason that the right to the improved value in damages is the consequence of the continuing ownership. Nesbitt v. St. Paul Lumber Co. 21 Minn. 491, following Silsbury v. McCoon, supra.

In Strubbee v. Trustees Cincinnati Railway, supra, it was held that the true owner of trees which had been cut upon his land by a wilful trespasser and converted into railroad ties, could sustain an action against the railroad company, an innocent purchaser, for the recovery of such ties, as it is well settled that a trespasser acquires no title to property that he has taken and converted to his own use.

One of the grounds upon which the court based its decision in the case of Strubbee v. Trustees Cincinnati Railway, supra, was that the innocent purchaser had not converted the chattel into a different species, nor made any change in the timber since purchasing it from the trespasser, but held the property in the same condition it was in when purchased from the trespasser, the court stating that if the timber had been worked into the depot buildings of the company, or made part of the roadbed by laying it down as ties, this annexation to the principal improvements would have devested the owner of his title.

If, however, the chattel be converted by an innocent purchaser or holder into an article of a different species, it cannot be reclaimed by the original owner. Silsbury v. McCoon, supra.

In such cases the identity of the article is destroyed, the rights of the innocent purchaser are protected. Strubbee v. Trustees Cincinnati Railway, supra.

Therefore, as against an innocent purchaser from the thief the original owner has a title to his timber, but the estoppel which works in the case of a thief, being created by fraud or wrong, exists only as against the guilty party, which the purchaser is not; and while it is effectual against the wrongdoer, the reason of it does not exist as against the innocent man, as to whom it therefore fails; and as against such innocent purchasers, if the owner of the timber or other articles is compensated for what he has lost he is fully paid. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 32 Ohio St. 571, 30 Am. Rep. 629.

In all cases where the rights of the innocent purchaser have been upheld, there has been such a mechanical transformation of the article as to destroy its identity, and the mere fact that timber can be traced into a building or corn to the distillery in which the whiskey was made out of it, is not such an identification of the property as would authorize its recovery. Strubbee v. Trustees Cincinnati Railway, supra.

Where lumber was cut from adjoining lands by a trespasser and intermixed so as not to be distinguishable, and the owner of one tract seized and took possession of the whole, it was held that a party claiming under such trespasser could not maintain an action of trespass for such taking. Bryant v. Ware, 30 Me. 295.

In Fryatt v. Sullivan Co. 7 Hill, 529, one who had the use of certain personal property wrongfully converted it by annexation to and made it a part of his real estate, and then sold such estate to a purchaser who had no notice of the facts. It was held that the original owner could not reclaim the property from the purchaser, for his only remedy was against the wrongdoer.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hutchins, supra, a large amount of wood cut down upon plaintiff's lands was stolen and worked up by the thieves into cordwood and ties which increased its value three fold, and then sold to the company who were innocent purchasers for value. It was held, in an action of trespass by the original owner, that he could not recover the value of the timber as enhanced by the labor of the wrongdoers after it was severed from the realty.

But in Freeman v. Underwood, 66 Me. 229, where wild berries had been purchased by the defendants from trespassers who picked them from the plaintiff's land, it was held that they thereby assumed an ownership which rendered them liable in trover to the rightful owners, even though the purchase was made in good faith and without notice of the want of title, and that, even though there had been no demand made.

In Rockwell v. Saunders, 19 Barb. 473, 483, it was held that no title was acquired by a purchaser of logs from one in possession of land as assignee of a vendee, under a contract prohibiting the latter from cutting timber until certain payments had been made, even though the purchaser of the logs did not know what title the occupant had; but it was questioned whether, if such purchaser sawed the logs into lumber in good faith and without notice, he would acquire title to the lumber, and it has been stated that although altered in form, if what remains is the principal part of the substance the title is not changed, and the property will not be devested by a purchaser from one having no title.

In Nichols v. Dewey, and Nichols v. Cole, 4 Allen, 386, the actions were in replevin for hay, and the facts showed that the land from which the hay was cut was formerly owned in part by the defendants as tenants in common, and in part by the other defendant in severalty, and that the plaintiff purchased at sheriff's sale the equity of redemption and took open and peaceable possession and forbade the defendants from taking or interfering with the grass or growing crops, but defendants subsequently cut the grass and severed it. It was held that replevin would lie by the purchaser to recover such crops, as, by cutting and storing the grass after notice the defendants committed a trespass.

VII. When title in or derived from the states or the United States.

Where timber has been cut into logs upon the public land by one who knows that the land belongs to the government, or who has no reasonable ground to believe that it belongs to him, or to some one under whom he claims, and such logs are by him hauled to the water course and taken to a distant boom, by means of which labor of the wrongdoer their value is enhanced beyond their value when first severed, the government may replevy such logs in the boom, and may maintain an action in the nature of trover for their value, and in either ercise of a supposed right, in good faith, been converted into hoops worth $700, it was held that the title passed to the party who had, in good faith, expended his labor, and the owner of the timber in such case could not sustain replevin for the hoops. In Pennsylvania the plaintiff sought to recover, in trover, the value of coal dug out of his mine by mistake, and was allowed only the value of the coal before it was mined. The court says: 'It is apparent case may recover without deduction for the enhanced value which may have been given to the logs after the severance by the labor of the wrongdoer. Bly v. United States, 4 Dill. 464, 466.

In such a case the title of the government continues as against the wrongdoer and all persons, until, at least, there has been some greater transformation of the original property than exists while it remains in the shape of logs, and if the wrongdoer sells the logs to a person who has no actual notice that they were cut on the public land, still the government may maintain replevin against such vendee for the logs if they are in existence, or if he has sawed them into lumber, the government may recover from him the value of such logs when so manufactured into lumber, and is not confined to the "stumpage" value. Ibid.

In Brown v. Throckmorton, 11 Ill. 529, the evidence showed that the defendant made the rails in question from timber cut by him on a section of lands belonging to the United States, and that the plaintiff took and carried them away; and it also appeared that the plaintiff resided upon the land from a given date up to the time of the trial, and claimed a pre-emption on the land in question. The court held that the timber out of which such rails were made belonged to the United States, and, even admitting that the plaintiff had at the time a valid pre-emption, that did not confer on him any title to the land or the timber standing thereon, he having a mere license from the government to occupy the land, the timber in that case having been severed before he acquired the right of pre-emption.

In the above case the court followed its prior decision in Wincher v. Shrewsbury, 3 Ill. 283, 35 Am. Dec. 108, which was a similar case.

And in Boyer v. Williams, 5 Mo. 335, 32 Am. Dec. 324, it was held that the purchaser of lands from the United States acquired by the purchase the same title to the land, and to everything growing upon it, which the United States had before the sale, and was therefore entitled to the crops planted thereon by other parties, the doctrine of emblements not applying to a case where the party planting such crops had not the legal title.

One settling upon public lands belonging to the United States and planting a crop thereon cannot, as against a subsequent purchaser of the land, maintain an action of quare clausum fregit for the gathering and converting of such crop by such purchaser to his own use, as the sale in such a case carried the land with the improvements thereon. Floyd v. Ricks, 14 Ark. 286, 58 Am. Dec. 374.

In Brock v. Smith, 14 Ark. 431, the defendant, without license, felled and split timber into cordwood upon vacant lands belonging to the United States, and before he removed such timber the plaintiff purchased the land, obtained a receiver's certificate, and gave notice to the defendant not to remove the wood, which notice the defendant disregarded. It was held in trespass that the defendant acquired no title, either in the timber or in the cordwood manufactured thereout by his labor, the character of the materials not being altered, the title remaining in the owner of the soil who could maintain either trover or trespass to recover the same, the title in question being in that case in the United States.

Where, however, the plaintiff had made rails out of timber growing upon government land, which land was subsequently purchased by the defendant who converted the rails to his own use, it was held that trespass would lie against the defendant for such rails, as they did not pass with the lands. Wincher v. Shrewsbury, 3 Ill. 283, 284, 35 Am. Dec. 108.

So, in Carpenter v. Lewis, 6 Ala. 682, where boards, rails, and bricks had been cut and made from the timber and soil on lands belonging to the government and appropriated by the maker, it was held that such did not pass to a subsequent purchaser of the land from the United States, even though the chattels remained on it, and therefore trover would lie by the maker against such purchaser who showed no title as between himself and the United States to the chattels in question.

Again, where a quantity of wood was cut and corded upon public lands subsequently purchased from the government, of which the purchaser took possession, it was held that the parties cutting such wood might maintain trover for its value. James v. Snelson, 3 Mo. 278.

The above case would, however, appear to be overruled by the later case of Turley v. Tucker, 6 Mo. 583, 35 Am. Dec. 449, in which case it was held that a person cutting timber from public lands did not acquire any property, either general or special, in such timber, as such parties were merely trespassers and not actual settlers, and occupied only the same position that a trespasser would occupy in the case of a trespass upon private lands.

But in the still later case of Keeton v. Audsley, 19 Mo. 362, 61 Am. Dec. 560, where action was brought for wrongfully entering upon plaintiff's land and cutting and carrying away timber, and the evidence showed that the timber was cut prior to the plaintiff's title, and was upon property belonging to the United States, the court inclined to the doctrine announced in James v. Snelson, supra, and held that the action would not lie, the plaintiff's title not covering the property previously cut and lying upon the premises, as the logs had been severed from the freehold and no longer formed a part of it, and therefore did not pass under a conveyance of the land.

Where the title to land remains in the state, timber cut thereon belongs to the state, and while the timber is standing it constitutes a part of the realty; being severed from the soil its character is changed and it becomes personalty; but its title is not affected, and it continues as previously the property of the owner of the land, and can be pursued wherever it is carried, all the remedies being open to the owner which the law affords in other cases of the wrongful removal or conversion of personal property. Schulenberg v. Harriman, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 44, 22 L. ed. 551.

Where logs cut from the lands of the state without license have been intermixed with logs cut from other lands so as not to be distinguishable, the state is entitled, under the laws of Minnesota, to replevy an equal amount from the whole mass, the remedy afforded by the law of Minnesota in such a case being held to be just in its operation and less severe than that which the common law authorizes. Ibid.

In United States v. Cook, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 591, 22 L. ed. 210, it was held that the United States might bring action in replevin to recover possession of logs sold by Indians from their reservation to a third person, where the logs were not cut for the improvement of the land, the Indians having only a right of occupancy of the land; the presumption therefore is against their authority to cut and sell the timber, and every purchaser from them is charged with notice of such presumption. E. W.

that any other rule would transfer to the plaintiff all the defendant's labor in mining the coal, and thus give her much more than compensation for the injury done.'" There is ample evidence in the record before us tending to establish that the Carpenters entered upon the land under claim of right, and in good faith cut the grass thereon, and made the same into hay, believing they had a right to do so, and that the defendants made no effort to stop them, or to reclaim the hay before it was all made. In view of this evidence, we think it clear, under the authorities, that the instructions given by the court were erroneous, and prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs' request to charge was applicable to the evidence, and should have been given.

Upon the subject of the measure of damages, the court instructed the jury, substantially, that inasmuch as the hay had been taken and delivered to the plaintiffs under the order of replevin, and had since been sold and disposed of by them, the measure of the defendants' damage, in case a verdict should be returned in their favor, would be the highest market value of the hay which the evidence disclosed it possessed between the time it was replevied and the date of the trial. There is a conflict in the adjudicated cases as to the rule of damages where one's property has been changed in form by another. There is one line of cases which holds that, where the value of property has been increased by another, the owner may recover the value of the property in its improved and more valuable form. There is another line of decisions which states the rule broadly that the measure of the recovery is the value of the article before the same was improved by the other's labor and skill, and this whether the value was increased by a wilful wrongdoer, or by a person acting in good faith. The last rule seems to us the better one. It gives the owner full compensation, and to the other party the increase of value for his labor bestowed on the property. Single v. Schneider, 24 Wis. 299, 30 Wis. 570; Hungerford v. Redford, 29 Wis. 345; Herdic v. Young, 55 Pa. 176, 93 Am. v.
AURORA IRON MINING COMPANY.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Failure of miners or a shift boss to notify the timber men that a newly opened space in the mine is ready to be timbered is the negligence of fellow servants of a trammer who is injured by the fall of ore from the roof because of absence of the timber.
2. A temporary room in a mine, formed by excavating ore and used as a working place to get out ore lying around its sides, is not within the rule requiring the master to furnish a safe place for his servants to work in.

(September 27, 1895.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Gogebic County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clark & Pearl, for plaintiff in error:

It was the duty of the defendant to make a careful and thorough examination of the roof of the stope so as to prevent rock and ore from caving upon its employees. This duty was neglected. The plaintiff was assured that it was safe for him to return to the work. Plaintiff relied upon the assurance of safety and has a complete right of action which the proof sustained.

Mr. Charles E. Miller, for defendant in error:

The doctrine of "safe place" does not apply to the facts in this case at all.

The fact that a fellow servant is charged by the master with special duties, and has special authority with respect to a particular part of the work, in whom is vested supervision over it and whose duty it is to see that it is done, does not change the relation to the other employees as a fellow servant, nor does it place him in respect to the master in the position of superintendent or manager in the sense to make the master responsible for injury to a servant resulting from negligence.

We know of no rule of law whereby the plaintiff can recover in such a case unless the defect was a latent defect or one as to which the law presumes the principal to have a better means of knowledge than the servant.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, a trammer in defendant's iron mine, was injured by the fall of ore from the roof of the room in which he was at work loading ore into a car. The work was conducted as follows: The miners loosened and brought down the ore to the floor of the stope or room made by taking out the ore, which room was constantly being enlarged by the process. This ore was loaded upon cars, and removed by common laborers, called "trammers." As fast as the ore was removed, it was the practice to support the roof by timbers and posts set a few feet apart. These were called "sets," and were put in place by a force or gang of men who were called from place to place, as wanted, upon notice from the miners themselves, or through the shift boss or foreman, who had charge of the work of the mine. Above the shift boss was a captain, who had general supervision of the work in the mine. The posts were placed about 8 feet apart, a set being 8 feet square. The post, being 2 feet in diameter, was capped and braced, and covered with lagging to support the roof, which had a tendency to crumble. Sometimes large masses of ore would fall, as in this instance. The drift or vein was twelve sets wide, and the room in question was being mined across the vein, about 40 feet of the vein being its length, while it would be about 100 feet wide across the vein when completed. The miners had taken out sufficient ore to make room for five sets into the vein, and so much appears to have been properly timbered up. At the time of the accident they had mined a space in advance of the last set, which the plaintiff claims was wider than should have been taken without support. The testimony differs about its width, but there is evidence that it was not sufficiently cleaned out to permit of timbering at the time of the accident, and this does not seem to have been disputed. Some indications of danger were noticed by the trammers, who called the attention of the shift boss to it, but, after looking at it, he told them it was all right, and to "quit monkeying," and resume work, which they did. The accident occurred about thirty minutes later. The court directed a verdict for the defendant.

The claim of the plaintiff is that the master did not furnish a safe place to work. In our opinion, this place where the men were at work was an incident of mining. It was a result of the common work of the miner and the trammer, both of whose labor combined to make it. After the miner had loosened the ore, and the trammer had removed it, it was ready for the timber men, who followed up when notified, putting in sets, which enabled the process of mining to be carried further. The undisputed evidence shows that the trammers and miners had not put the newly opened space in condition for the timber men, and that the miners had not caused them to be notified that their services were required. If there can be said to have been culpable negligence, it was either in mining too large a space before cutting out the corners preparatory for the sets, or in failing to notify the timber men if sets could have been put in before the ore was still further removed. In either case, if the fault of the miner, it was the negligence of a fellow servant under the plainest rules. And the same is true if it was through a failure upon the part of the shift boss to cause timbering to be done earlier. He was a foreman, who directed when and where blasts should be put in, and where the men should work, and who was appealed to to settle questions arising as the work progressed. His relation to the men under him was similar to that of a foreman of a section gang upon a railroad to his men, or one in charge of workmen upon a train. Schroeder v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 103 Mich. 213, 29 L. R. A. 321. Unless it can be said that the duty to furnish a safe place to work is involved, the court was right in directing a verdict for defendant. There are duties which a master owes to employees, which he must perform; and, while he may confide the performance of such to another, the obligation is still the master's, and he cannot avoid it by authorizing another to perform the act. In such cases it is not an answer to say that he has provided a competent agent, although such agent may be a fellow servant, and in many things a fellow servant of the injured person. This question has been discussed of late, and authorities cited, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Montgomery in the case of Schroeder v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. supra. Also Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co. 103 Mich. 196, 27 L. R. A. 266. In the latter case the distinction between temporary places built to assist in construction, as stagings and permanent places, within which men are expected to perform labor, is pointed out. The only difference between the Beesley Case and this is that in the former the staging was preliminary to the work of construction, in this it was an incident of the work being done; and we see no difference in principle. The same distinction was made in the case of Consolidated Coal & M. Co. v. Clay, recently decided by the supreme court of Ohio, reported in 51 Ohio St. 542, 25 L. R. A. 848. See also Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 110; Benzing v. Steinway & Sons, 101 N. Y. 547; Stringham v. Hilton, 111 N. Y. 188, 1 L. R. A. 483.

This was a case of injury resulting from a failure to support the roof of a mine, and the court says: "We need not discuss this proposition, for we have not that case. Here the place was not furnished as in any sense a permanent place of work, but was a place in which surrounding conditions were constantly changing and instead of being a place furnished by the master for the employees, within the spirit of the decisions referred to, was a place, the furnishing and preparation of which was in itself part of the work which they were employed to perform. The distinction is shown in a number of cases" (which are cited in the opinion).

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

The other Justices concur.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, after which, on April 21, 1896, Hooker, J., handed down the following opinion:

The substance of the question which we are disposed to consider upon the rehearing of this cause is whether the fact that mining operations have proceeded beyond a given point in the stope, and the stope has been "timbered up" to that point, changes the portion so timbered so that it is to be treated as a place to work, within the decisions requiring a master to furnish the servant a reasonably safe place to work. The alleged inaccuracy of the court in stating that the testimony showed that the miners had not put the newly opened space in condition for the timber men, has no bearing upon this question; and we are satisfied with the proposition enunciated,—that the failure of the miners or boss to notify the timber men that the place was in readiness was the negligence of fellow servants of the plaintiff. But it was urged by counsel that in the discussion of the question the court neglected to consider the fact that, at the time of the accident, the last timbers set did not support the roof of the mine, the lagging being some distance below the roof, by reason of the caving or dropping of ore from the roof, above the lagging, until it left a space between the lagging and the roof of the mine, and that, as this increased the area of roof unsupported, it caused the ore to fall and injure the plaintiff. It is apparent that if we are to adhere to the holding that miners and trammers are fellow servants, and that the shift boss, like the foreman of a section gang, is not an exception, there can be no theory upon which the plaintiff can recover, except that, immediately the room was in readiness for timbers, it was the duty of the master to see that they were properly set and maintained. And it is obvious that this claim must be, as it is, planted upon the rule that, in appropriate cases, requires the master to provide a safe place. The operation of mining, in this and similar mines, is to sink a shaft, and from the shaft start a drift, from which stopes or rooms are excavated across the vein, from the lower to the upper or hanging wall. It is accomplished by caving down and removing the ore. It is manifest that this cannot proceed unless the roof is supported behind the miners, and this is done by putting up timbers to support the roof until the ore shall be excavated beyond. It is said that, when the room has been excavated sufficiently large, it is the practice to cave the room down into the mining sets, and place more timbers on top of the first. Now, if this room can properly be said to be a place furnished to the servants in which to carry on the master's business, and which he must, at his peril, keep in reasonably safe condition, as a factory or warehouse, then the case should have gone to the jury; but, if it is not such a place, then it falls within that other rule, that the duty of the master is performed by using reasonable care, or furnishing suitable material, and employing capable and efficient men to do the work. In view of the cases of Schroeder v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 103 Mich. 213, 29 L. R. A. 321, and Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co. 103 Mich. 196, 27 L. R. A. 266, cited in the former opinion, there is no doubt that a master must furnish a reasonably safe place for a servant to work, if a structure is required for the carrying on of his business; and the briefs furnished in this case upon the part of the plaintiff would render us more assistance, had they called our attention to cases establishing the claim that a master is obliged to make safe the place which the servant makes and occupies as a means of doing his work, or which results as an incident of the work, although it necessitates his presence in a place, to a greater or less degree, unsafe. In such cases, must the master stay with, or follow up, the servants, to be certain that they make the place safe, so that they or some of them be not injured? There are many cases which draw the distinction pointed out. Such a case is Beesley v. F. W. Wheeler & Co. supra. Several other cases are cited in the former opinion. In Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co. 45 Minn. 237, it is said, "An important consideration, often overlooked, is whether the structure, appliance or instrumentality is one which has been furnished for the work in which the servants are to be engaged, or whether the furnishing and preparation of it is itself part of the work which they are employed to perform." As we understand from the brief of counsel and the record,—and we do not discover a denial of it,—this stope or room starts from a drift at or near what is called the "foot wall," which is the bottom, as distinguished from the overlying stratum of the vein of ore. Both foot wall and top wall depart from the level, and dip sharply, so that, in running the stope on a level, it can go but a short distance until the top or overhanging wall is reached; and then the operation is repeated above the lagging, removing the lagging and caving down the roof,—supporting the new roof thus formed by new sets placed upon the first. Thus, so far as the lagging is concerned, it has a temporary use merely to enable the miners to push the breast through to the overhanging wall, by supporting the roof. It is a part of the operation of mining, as much as a blast or a staging, and is not a part of the permanent structure. The following cases confirm us in our opinion that, as an incident or means of excavating the ore, the master has only the duty of furnishing competent men, and furnishing suitable materials for the use of those engaged in the common employment: Hall v. Johnson, 3 Hurlst. & C. 589, where it was held that "an underlooker in a mine, whose duty it was to examine the roof, and prop it up if dangerous, was a fellow laborer with a workman." Waddell v. Simoson, 112 Pa. 567, where it was decided that "the operator of a coal mine fulfils the measure of his duty to his employees, if he commits his work to careful and skillful bosses and superintendents." And in Consolidated Coal Co. v. Scheller, 42 Ill. App. 619, the court held that if a master exercises reasonable or ordinary care in selecting men and materials, a mine owner is not liable if the roof falls. In Quincy Min. Co. v. Kitts, 42 Mich. 34, a workman was injured by a fall occasioned by the breaking of a bridge across a permanent opening, consisting of a winze or perpendicular shaft for ventilation in a mine. The timber man was held to be a fellow servant, which excludes the theory contended for in this case. A case substantially like the one before us is Consolidated Coal & M. Co. v. Clay (cited in the former opinion), 51 Ohio St. 542, 25 L. R. A. 848. We see no occasion to change or modify the opinion heretofore filed in this cause, which disposed of all questions necessary to a decision of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

Long, Ch. J., took no part in the decision. The other justices concurred.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to collect a personal property tax. Affirmed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

On the 5th of July, 1892, the Detroit Gaslight Company and Camille Weidenfeld, of the city of New York, executed a contract, the material parts of which are as follows:

"Whereas, said second party is desirous of purchasing so much of the property of said first party as is used for the purpose of making and distributing gas, and is also desirous of acquiring all of the capital stock of said first party, and has offered the said first party the price and terms therefor hereinafter named, and the directors of said first party deem it wise, and best for the interests of the stockholders of said first party, that such sale be made; and whereas, in order to consummate such transaction, it will be necessary to obtain the assent of all the stockholders of said first party: Now, therefore, said first party agrees that it will, as soon as practicable, present the said proposition to its stockholders, and use reasonable efforts to obtain the authority of all of them to the sale of said property and stock, and, if successful in such efforts, to notify the said second party, within ninety days from the date hereof, of its readiness to carry out the sale aforesaid. And, upon receiving such power and authority from its stockholders, said first party agrees to sell, by good and sufficient conveyance, to said second party and his associates, or to such person or corporation as he may designate: provided, that if such assent, ratification, and authority from such stockholders be not obtained within ninety days from the date hereof, then this agreement becomes void and of no effect, at the option of the party of the second part, to be declared within thirty days after the expiration of said period of ninety days, and he shall have the right to purchase the holding of the stockholders so assenting, for a pro rata proportion of said purchase money; and in any event the party of the second part shall have no cause of action against the party of the first part for its failure to obtain the assent, ratification, and authority of all of said stockholders. And in consideration of the premises the said second party agrees to purchase the said property and stock, and to pay therefor the sum of $1,450,000, in manner following: $450,000 within nine months after receipt of notice of the authority given by said stockholders as aforesaid, $500,000 on or before one year from the date of such first payment, and $500,000 on or before two years from the date of such first payment, such deferred payments to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, until paid, and to be secured by a purchase-money mortgage upon the property so transferred, executed by said second party to such persons as said first party shall designate to hold the same as trustees for the stockholders of said first party. Such mortgage shall contain the usual interest clause contained in the long-form real-estate mortgage in common use in this state. Concurrently with the payment by the party of the second part of said first payment of $450,000, and the execution and delivery of said purchase-money mortgage, the said party of the second part shall be entitled to, and shall be put into, the possession of said property and stock; and the board of directors of said party of the first part shall at once hold a meeting of said board of directors, and severally resign as such directors, and, as each resignation shall be accepted, the remaining members of said board shall elect such person to fill the vacancy as shall be named by the party of the second part, and continue to do so until all of said directors shall be persons designated by said party of the second part. All money on hand and accounts due to said first party at the time of the transfer shall be retained by the said first party, and transferred by it to the trustees, for the benefit of its stockholders. It is intended and understood that the property of said first party not expressly transferred hereby, and the purchase money aforesaid, shall be, by said first party, prior to the transfer of its capital stock to said second party, transferred to certain persons, to be designated by said first party (presumably, the persons named in said mortgage as trustees), to hold the same for division and distribution among the stockholders of said first party authorizing the sale of such stock; and wherever the word 'stockholder' is used herein, the stockholders authorizing such sale of stock to said second party are the ones meant, and not such as may be stockholders after such transfer." This contract, it appears, was carried out, the stock secured, transferred to the new corporation, and on February 1, 1893, Mr. Weidenfeld executed to the defendants and Charles B. Lothrop, all of Detroit, a mortgage for $1,000,000. The description of the property, and the terms of payment, are immaterial. The mortgage was in the usual form, but does not appear to have been accompanied by any note or bond. It specified that the parties of the second part held as trustees and as joint tenants, and not as tenants in common. It does not contain the provisions of the trust. On February 20, 1893, the Detroit Gaslight Company assigned and transferred to said trustees all their rights under the above contract, "particularly the covenant of said Weidenfeld for the payment of the within purchase price; the same being secured by mortgage executed and delivered at the date hereof, but dated Feb. 1st, 1893, to the trustees aforesaid."

The defendants are the surviving trustees. In 1894 the assessors of Detroit assessed this mortgage and two others to the same trustees amounting to $7,500, to the defendants, as trustees, at their face value; the total amount of the tax being $15,888.52. The defendants appeared before the assessor, and denied their liability, and appealed to the board of review, which decided against them. Upon their refusal to pay, the city instituted this suit, and recovered the full amount of the tax. The case was tried before the court without a jury, upon an agreed state of facts, of which, except as above stated, the material ones are these: There were 11,397 nonresident shares of the stock of the gaslight company, at $50 per share, $569,850; 8,603 resident shares, at $50 per share, $430,150. The statute under which this tax was assessed is subdivision 6, § 8, Act No. 206, Pub. Acts 1893, which provides that "for the purpose of taxation personal property shall include all credits of every kind belonging to inhabitants of this state, over and above the amounts respectively owed by them, whether such indebtedness is due from individuals or from corporations, public or private, and whether such debtors reside within or without the state."

Messrs. Cutcheon, Stellwagen, & Fleming, for plaintiffs in error:

The power of taxation, however vast in its character and searching in its extent, is necessarily limited to subjects within the jurisdiction of the state. These subjects are persons, property, and business.

A personal tax cannot be assessed against a nonresident; neither can the property of a nonresident be taxed unless it have an actual situs within the state.

Mr. John J. Speed, for defendant in error:

The legal relation of the trustees made them the legal owners of the mortgage and its proceeds, and they and their assignees were the only ones who could foreclose at law, and in equity they were the proper complainants to a bill of foreclosure.

It is the duty of trustees to pay taxes upon the trust property at the place of their domicil, and this is particularly true in the case of mortgages to trustees.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is important first to determine the exact status of the credit which is the subject of this litigation. At the time this mortgage was given the stockholders of the Detroit Gaslight Company, resident and nonresident, had assigned all their shares, under the agreement above referred to. Upon the giving of this mortgage they were not the owners, therefore, of any of the stock of that corporation, but had parted with their title to it. All their interests were then represented by this mortgage, which, when collected by the trustees, was evidently to be divided among the cestuis que trust, the former stockholders, in proportion to the amount of stock formerly held by each. There is no presumption that the interest of either the resident or nonresident parties had been assessed to them at their domicils in 1894. By their voluntary act the legal title was vested in three citizens of Michigan, as trustees, and remained so vested at the time the assessment was made. Under these facts the principal questions are: (1) Was it competent for the legislature to impose a tax on credits in the hands of resident trustees in trust for nonresidents of the state? and (2) Does the act of 1893 impose a tax on credits so held?

The learned council for the defendants contend that the legislature has no power to impose such tax, and cite and rely upon the following cases: State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 319, 21 L. ed. 186; Graham v. St. Joseph Twp. 67 Mich. 655; Kirtland v. Hotchkiss, 100 U. S. 491, 25 L. ed. 558; Davenport v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 12 Iowa, 539; People v. Eastman, 25 Cal. 603; Arapahoe County Comrs. v. Cutter, 3 Colo. 349. These authorities, and many others, have established the rule that the situs of a credit is the domicil of the owner, and that a credit due from a citizen of this state to a citizen of another state is not subject to taxation at the domicil of the debtor. In none of these cases, however, was the legal title to the credit invested in trustees resident in the domicil of the debtor. So, too, the fact that the credit is secured by a mortgage upon the land of the debtor, or that it is in the hands of an agent for collection merely, does not authorize an assessment against the nonresident creditor. Goldgart v. People, Goar, 106 Ill. 25; Grant v. Jones, 39 Ohio St. 506; Territory v. Delinquent Tax List (Ariz.) 24 Pac. 182; Arapahoe County Comrs. v. Cutter, supra; Herron v. Keeran, 59 Ind. 472, 26 Am. Rep. 87. In Goldgart v. People, Goar, however, it is said: "If the owner is absent, but the creditors are in fact here, in the hands of an agent, for renewal or collection, with the view of reloaning the money by the agent as a permanent business, they have a situs here for the purpose of taxation, and there is jurisdiction over the thing." See Burroughs, Taxn. 44. In Grant v. Jones it is said: "Whenever the person holding such choses in action resides in Ohio, he must list for taxation such credits, whether he holds them as owner, guardian, trustee, or agent. If they are held within the state in either capacity, they are within the jurisdiction of the state for purposes of taxation. If they are not so held, but are owned and held by a nonresident, they are not subject to taxation." Similar language is also found in Herron v. Keeran. We must not be understood to indorse the doctrine of the three cases last cited, in so far as they appear to hold that credits owned by a nonresident, and placed in the hands of an agent for collection and reinvestment, obtained such a situs in this state as will subject them to taxation. We are not dealing with such a case, but with one where the absolute legal title is in persons residents of this state. It is clear that these authorities, which are cited by the defendants, recognize a distinction between cases where the legal title is in the nonresident, and where it is in trustees, guardians, or agents at the domicil of the debtor. The question is little discussed by the text writers. Perry says: "In the absence of a statute, the law would look upon the trustee as the owner, and assess the property at his domicil." 1 Perry, Tr. § 331. Lewin says: "Trustees are liable to be rated for the property vested in them." Lewin, Tr. p. 214. Cooley says: "In general, personal estate in the hands of a trustee is to be assessed to him at the place of his domicil." Cooley, Taxn. p. 275. "Property in trust is, in the absence of a special provision of statute, taxed at the same place as though the trustee were the absolute owner." 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 153. Where trustees holding credits secured by mortgages resided in one county of a state, and the cestuis que trust resided in another county, an assessment upon the cestuis que trust at their domicil was held void, and the credits held assessable at the domicil of the trustees. Latrobe v. Baltimore, 19 Md. 13; Baltimore v. Stirling, 29 Md. 48. A cestui que trust residing in Massachusetts was held not taxable there for shares in corporations held in trust for her by trustees residing in another state. Dorr v. Boston, 6 Gray, 131. Funds in the hands of trustees were held assessable at their domicil, though they belonged to nonresident beneficiaries. Davis v. Macy, 124 Mass. 193. Where a judgment was rendered against trustees for maladministration, and they were directed to pay the amount into the hands of a receiver, to be turned over to a new trustee, it was held that the beneficiaries were not liable for taxes. Smith v. Byers, 43 Ga. 191. In Price v. Hunter, 34 Fed. Rep. 355, trustees in Pennsylvania were held liable for taxes upon a mortgage upon property in that state held in trust for a nonresident beneficiary. The same doctrine is held in the following cases: People v. Albany Assessors, 40 N. Y. 154; Lewis v. Chester County, 60 Pa. 325. See also Greene Foundation v. Boston, 12 Cush. 54; Greene v. Mumford, 4 R. I. 313; Catlin v. Hull, 21 Vt. 152. We are cited to no authorities, nor have I been able to find any, which hold that where the legal title and ownership of personal property, tangible or intangible, is vested in trustees, the beneficiaries or cestuis que trust are taxable, or that the funds in the hands of the trustees are exempt from taxation at their domicil in the absence of a statute making the property assessable to the cestuis que trust. It is, however, contended that the terms of the statute, "all credits of every kind belonging to inhabitants of this state," do not include trustees holding credits for the benefit of nonresidents. It follows from the authorities above cited—and we think the holding based upon sound reason—that the term "inhabitants" includes resident trustees, in whom is vested the absolute legal title to choses in action. Our statute, however, appears to control the question. It provides: "Personal property under the control of a trustee or agent, whether a corporation or a natural person, may be assessed to such trustee or agent in the township where he resides, except as otherwise provided." Pub. Acts 1893, Act No. 206, § 14, subd. 6.

It appears by the stipulated facts that the trustees have commenced foreclosure proceedings, and that one of the defendants in that suit has answered, denying all indebtedness upon the mortgage, and has interposed a cross bill charging fraud and deception on the part of the Detroit Gaslight Company in the sale of the property, and praying a cancelation of the mortgage. That suit is pending and undetermined. Counsel, in their brief, say: "If the pending foreclosure suit is decided in favor of the defendants in that case, can it be possible that the law will compel the defendants in this case to pay not only the large judgment in this case, but also like taxes assessed before the determination of the foreclosure suit, out of their individual property, when they have been remiss in no way?" That question may arise when the defendant trustees shall be called upon to account for the trust funds, provided the mortgage is declared void. It is not now before us. It is not claimed that they have not in their hands moneys sufficient to pay these taxes. In their appeal from the action of the assessor to the board of review, they set up this pending suit, and state that they have in their hands moneys paid to them as interest on this mortgage; and it is also a fair inference from the record that the $450,000 of the purchase price has been paid to them, and for which an accounting is asked in that suit. Several of the cases above cited appear to have been brought and decided upon the theory that the trustees, having legal title to the property, were obligated to pay the tax. In Latrobe v. Baltimore it is said: "That taxes assessed upon a trust estate constitute a legal cause of action against the holder of the legal title, we do not doubt, for at law the legal estate in the hands of a trustee has the legal incidents and obligations of an absolute title, subject only to the claims in equity of the cestui que trust." Such suits must, of necessity, be brought against the trustees; and, when judgment is rendered against them, they are entitled to pay the judgment from the trust fund, and credit themselves with the amount so paid. Where a court has adjudged the tax to be valid, it would seem to logically follow that the trustees will be protected in its payment from the trust fund.

The judgment is affirmed.

(.....Mich..... ..)

A chattel mortgage on horses, given in Canada by the owner of a half interest in them, and filed by the mortgagee, who takes possession of the horses and puts them in the care of the keeper of a hotel at a race track to hold possession for him, gives such mortgagee a better right to such interest in the horses after they have been taken without his consent from the custodian and shipped to Michigan by the owners of the other half interest in the horses, who did not know of his mortgage, than the latter can assert under another chattel mortgage from the same mortgagor, which they took in Michigan before the horses went to Canada, and recorded after their return.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Under the statement of facts by Mr. Justice Grant, it appears that defendant Millar had taken possession of the property, and placed it with a custodian (Biggs), and this with the assent of the mortgagor. The property was not detained by the custodian, but, as his agency was a special one, it is clear that he exceeded his authority in delivering it over to, or permitting it to be taken by, plaintiffs. We have, then, a case in which the mortgagee in Canada has taken possession of mortgaged property, and in which the mortgagor has, without his assent, regained possession, transported the property to Michigan, and a prior lien holder has asserted a lien which, while the property was so in the possession of the Canadian mortgagee, was inferior to the Canadian lien. To give the Michigan lien priority under these circumstances is certainly to go a step further than this court has yet gone. In the cases of Montgomery v. Wight, 8 Mich. 143; Boydson v. Goodrich, 49 Mich. 65, and Corbett v. Littlefield, 84 Mich. 30, 11 L. R. A. 95, it appears that the foreign mortgagee permitted the mortgagor to retain possession. In Corbett v. Littlefield it was said distinctly that the mortgagee had it in his power to protect himself by taking possession of the mortgaged property. It can hardly be said that it was intended to imply that he must, in addition to taking possession, stand guard over the property constantly, to see that the mortgagors do not take it out of his possession and to another jurisdiction. If, in fact, Millar was invested with possession, it is difficult to see how he could do more to protect himself, unless an absolute duty does rest upon him to see that no person with or without right shall take it beyond the jurisdiction; and I cannot understand why this duty should be imposed upon a mortgagee in possession any more than it is upon an absolute owner. Without regard to the record of the mortgage in Canada, it was good as against any but creditors who became such after the mortgage was made and before possession was taken, or prior creditors who had acquired a lien before possession was taken by the mortgagee. Waite v. Mathews, 50 Mich. 392.

Certainly, plaintiffs, as mortgagees, under a mortgage executed in Michigan, upon property which was, by their direct assent, taken to Ontario, were not entitled to priority over a mortgage given in Ontario, and under which possession was given to the mortgagee. Can it be said, then, that because Biggs, the custodian, did not withhold the property from them, and because they did not in fact know of the title acquired by Millar from Leroy, they are to be given priority for this reason? I cannot understand how they could occupy any better position then a purchaser from Leroy could occupy; and if the mortgage to Millar was taken by him in good faith, and the possession was actually transferred as testified to by him, I think the mortgage as to Leroy's half interest in the horses was good, and entitled to priority over plaintiffs.

Judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Long, Ch. J., and Hooker and Moore, JJ., concurred with Montgomery, J.

Grant, J., dissenting:

The following statement of facts is taken from the brief in behalf of the plaintiffs, and is correct. "On October 11, the plaintiffs, who were residents of Canada, advanced to one George Leroy, a resident of Illinois, at Detroit, Michigan, $1,600, and took from him a chattel mortgage covering a one-half interest in three trotting horses, which interest was then owned by Leroy. The other one-half interest in two of the horses was owned by the plaintiffs, and in the third horse by another person, not a party to this suit. The plaintiffs and Leroy, at or about the execution of the mortgage, agreed that these horses should be raced on joint account during the winter of 1892 and the racing season of 1893, the winter racing to be in the Southern United States; the plaintiff Vining to manage the horses, making all contracts and entries, collecting the moneys, and doing all the business, Leroy to do the driving, and the money for expenses to be furnished by the plaintiffs, the profits and losses of the racing to be equally shared among the three. This arrangement was not to affect the property rights of the several parties in the horses. At the time of the execution of the mortgage, it was contemplated by the parties that the horses should be taken out of the state, and they were then on board the cars in Detroit for shipment South, and went out of the state in the afternoon of the same day. After racing the horses in the Southern states through the winter and spring, they were shipped back from the South to London, Canada, on May 4, 1893, and passed through Detroit in transit for London, where they arrived on May 8. In order to get them into Canada, the plaintiff Vining gave a bond in the sum of $10,000, conditioned to return them to the United States within seventy days. The racing of the horses was continued in Canada under the same arrangement; but Vining fell sick, and was unable to remain with the horses personally. The horses were raced at various places in Canada, and finally at Toronto, at a race meeting beginning about the 3d of July. The plaintiff Ferguson attended at these races, and instructed Leroy to ship the horses on July 10 to Detroit, where they were next to race, and left him to do so. Instead of shipping the horses, Leroy disappeared; and, the plaintiffs learning from one Stilson, the assistant driver, who was in their employ, that Leroy had gone, Ferguson again went to Toronto, and on Saturday, July 15 (the period within which the horses were to be returned according to the condition of the bond being nearly up), shipped them back to Detroit, where Vining took charge of them. It appears that the horses, before coming to Toronto, were in Tilsonburg, which is about 100 miles distant, and in another county. Leroy had gone ahead to Toronto, and there met the defendant Millar on June 30, and represented to him that he had these horses at Tilsonburg, and wanted to get them down to Toronto for the races and wanted to borrow of Millar money to pay to bring and to keep them in Toronto during the races. Millar gave him some money then, and agreed to make further advances, taking a mortgage on the horses as security. This mortgage Millar filed in the county clerk's office in Toronto on July 5, 1893. Defendant testifies that on July 8, with Leroy's consent, he put the horses in the care of one Biggs, the keeper of an hotel at the race track, to hold possession for him. At the time when Ferguson returned to Toronto, after Leroy's disappearance, he found the horses in the possession of Stilson, the plaintiffs' assistant driver, at the stable of Biggs; saw Biggs, and paid him all his charges for feeding the men and horses, and told him he was going to ship the horses. Biggs made no claim of possession, and Ferguson learned nothing about Millar or his mortgage. On Monday, the 17th of July, when the horses arrived in Detroit, where they were to race, the plaintiffs recorded their mortgage; and, on the following day, the defendant Millar came to Detroit, and had the defendant Fox, who is a constable, seize the horses under his chattel mortgage. The plaintiffs, to whom this act was the first notice of Millar's mortgage, demanded the return of the property, and, on its being refused, brought this action of replevin, upon the trial of which a verdict was directed in their favor."

The principal question in the case is whether the defendant Millar's mortgage has preference over that of the plaintiffs, which was prior in date. The question is not new in this court. The principle governing it has been discussed and determined in the following cases: Montgomery v. Wight, 8 Mich. 143; Boydson v. Goodrich, 49 Mich. 65; Corbett v. Littlefield, 84 Mich. 30, 11 L. R. A. 95. In all these cases it was held that chattel mortgage laws have no force beyond the jurisdiction of the sovereignty enacting them, and that the notices, which the record of them is designed to give, have no extraterritorial force. The reasoning of Justice Campbell in Montgomery v. Wight is exhaustive and conclusive. It was followed in the other opinions. It may be conceded that the defendant Millar has a lien valid in Canada, and that plaintiffs have a lien valid in Michigan. The parties, therefore, have no other or different rights than they would have if there was no law in either country providing for recording mortgages, and declaring the effect of such record. It is sought to distinguish this case from the above, upon the claim that Millar had reduced the property to possession in Canada, and that it was illegally and surreptitiously taken from him. In the cases above cited, the property was left in the control of the mortgagor; and in Corbett v. Littlefield it was held that the attachment lien in this state prevailed, although the property was removed from the state of Kansas without the knowledge or consent of the mortgagee. The difficulty with the defendant's contention is that the facts do not support it. There was no actual or visible change of possession. The horses were at Mr. Bigg's hotel, and in his possession, at the time defendant claims possession was given to Mr. Biggs for him. This possession was only that of an hotel keeper in charge of the property of his guest. Millar testifies: "I went to the hotel man in whose possession these horses were, and I said to the hotel man, 'These horses remain as between you and me, . . . and you are to keep them for me.'" Plaintiffs were under a heavy bond to return the horses to the United States within a specified time, which had nearly expired. Leroy had been instructed to ship them to Detroit. He failed to do so. By telegram, plaintiffs ascertained that Leroy had left. Plaintiff Ferguson then went to Toronto, and found the horses in the care and control of their employee, Stilson, at the public stable of Mr. Biggs. He paid Mr. Biggs all he claimed for their care and keeping, and told him he was going to ship them. Biggs made no claim to their possession, nor informed him that Millar had, or claimed to have, a lien. Neither Stilson nor any other of the plaintiffs' employees are shown to have had any knowledge of the arrangement between defendant and Mr. Leroy. Neither was there anything to indicate any change of possession or the existence of any lien. Under such circumstances, the plaintiffs were rightfully in the possession of their property, and their rights must be determined without regard to any arrangement between defendant, Biggs, and Leroy. The horses were therefore lawfully in Michigan, and in the possession of the plaintiffs, as mortgagees and part owners, with their chattel mortgage on file in the city, where the property was then located, and without any knowledge of the defendant's mortgage. The question presented by the briefs is one exclusively of the priority of liens. The case, therefore, comes directly within those above cited, and the instruction of the court was correct. In view of this disposal of the case, the other questions raised become immaterial. Judgment should be affirmed.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs in error were indicted and convicted for a violation of the act requiring the weighing of coal at the mines, in force July 1, 1887, as amended by act in force July 1, 1891. Some of the counts upon which they were found guilty charged them with a failure to weigh all the coal delivered from the mine, and others charged them with not keeping a correct record of the weight of each miner's car. The portion of the act under which the prosecution was had, material to the same, is as follows:

"Sec. 1. That the owner, agent, or operator of every coal mine in this state at which the miners are paid by weight, shall provide at such mines suitable and accurate scales of standard manufacture for the weighing of all coal which shall be hoisted or delivered from such mines.

"Sec. 2. All coal so delivered from such mines shall be carefully weighed upon the scales as above provided, and a correct record shall be kept of the weight of each miner's car, which record shall be kept open at all reasonable hours for the inspection of all miners or others pecuniarily interested in the product of such mine. The person designated and authorized to weigh the coal and keep such record shall, before entering upon such duties, make and subscribe to an oath before some magistrate, or other officer authorized to administer oaths, that he will accurately weigh and carefully keep a true record of all coal delivered from such mine, and such oath shall be kept conspicuously posted at the place of weighing."

"Sec. 5. Any person, owner, or agent, operating a coal mine in this state, who shall fail to comply with the provisions of this act, or who shall obstruct or hinder the carrying out of its requirements, shall be fined for the first offense not less than fifty dollars ($50) nor more than two hundred dollars ($200); for the second offense not less than two hundred dollars ($200) nor more than five hundred dollars ($500); and for a third offense not less than five hundred dollars ($500), or be imprisoned in the county jail not less than six months nor more than one year: provided that the provisions of this act shall apply only to coal mines whose product is shipped by rail or water."

The constitutionality of this act is challenged by plaintiffs in error, and this is the only question that will be considered, although the application of the statute to this case is disputed, and questions of variance, and of error in the giving and refusing of instructions, are also raised. It is objected that the act is in violation of art. 2, § 2, of our Constitution, which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, because it singles out operators of one class of coal mines and imposes restrictions upon them not required to be borne by operators of other mines, or by persons engaged in other business, and also, by interfering with the right of employer and laborer to contract with each other. The Consolidated Coal Company had owned and operated the mine where plaintiffs in error were employed for six or seven years. The greater part of its product was shipped from the mine by rail, on the Wabash Railroad, and sold in other markets. All the coal so shipped was correctly weighed on scales of standard manufacture by the company, at the mine, before being dumped into the railroad cars, and a correct record was made of the weight of each miner's car, and that record was posted and kept open at all reasonable hours for the inspection of the miners or any person interested. During this time the company had also furnished the Wabash Railroad Company with coal for its locomotives, which was delivered at the mine, into the tenders of the locomotives, as they stopped there for coal. There were about 250 miners employed, and the average output of the mine was from 700 to 950 tons of screened coal per day. The miners were paid 55 cents per ton for screened coal. About the last 100 miners' cars that came up in the evening of each day would be placed on the storage tracks, for the purpose of coaling the locomotives during the night and the next day. This last coal was not weighed, but each miner was given the average weight of the cars sent up by him and weighed during the day as the weight of his last car, crediting him with the average weight of the cars mined by him that day that had been actually weighed. By the act under consideration its provisions are applied only to coal mines whose product is shipped by rail or water, and the learned attorney general and counsel for the people construe the provision as making the law applicable to each mine where the major portion of its product is so shipped. However that may be, it is plain that the act not only singles out the operator of a mine, and imposes restrictions and burdens upon him, as to the use and enjoyment of his property, that are not imposed upon other branches of business similarly situated and conducted, but it divides the operators of mines, and only applies its provisions to those whose product is shipped in a certain manner. In the various Constitutions the phrases "due process of law" and "the law of the land" are used interchangeably, sometimes one being employed and sometimes the other; but they are synonymous, and the meaning is the same in every case. Cooley, Const. Lim. 353. In Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 869, it was said of this phrase, p. 301: "And this means general public law, binding upon the members of the community, under all circumstances, and not partial or private laws, affecting the rights of private individuals or classes of individuals,"—citing Janes v. Reynolds, 2 Tex. 251; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 378; Vanzant v. Waddel, 2 Yerg. 269. And the same declaration was made in Frorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492, where the statute prohibiting engaging in keeping a truck store was held unconstitutional, and in Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340, where the same conclusion was reached as to an act to provide for the weekly payment of wages by a corporation.

The right to enact such a statute does not arise out of the police power, where much latitude is allowed in determining what may tend to insure the comfort, safety, or welfare of society; and it is not authorized by § 29 of article 4 of the Constitution, providing for laws to secure safety to coal miners. Millett v. People, supra. Each person subject to the laws has a right that he shall be governed by general public rules. Laws and regulations entirely arbitrary in their character, singling out particular persons not distinguished from others in the community by any reason applicable to such persons, are not of that class. Distinctions in rights and privileges must be based upon some distinction or reason not applicable to others. In Braceville Coal Co. v. People, supra, it is said (p. 72): "And it is only when such distinctions exist that differentiate in important particulars persons or classes of persons from the body of the people, that laws having operation only upon such particular persons or classes of persons have been held to be valid enactments." No possible reason or distinction, affecting any interest, justifying the division of mines made by the act, has been suggested, except that it might be intended to reach mines in which the larger number of miners were employed. But this is not the division or distinction made, and does not in any manner follow from such division. It is not the language or purport of the act, and, if such had been the intention of the legislature, it would certainly have been made manifest by basing the division or distinction upon the number of miners employed. The act applies equally to the owner of a small mine, where the product may not exceed a car load per day, and the owner of a mine such as that of the Consolidated Coal Company. The distinction is based solely upon the fact of the product being shipped by rail or water, and counsel have been able to suggest no reason why the legislature should require the product of such a mine to be weighed in the manner specified, and not that of another mine where the product is sold on the spot. The distinction between operators who sell their product at the mine to some shipper, who ships it away to the market, and those who themselves ship their coal by rail or water, is purely arbitrary. Any reason that would apply to one, calling for a restriction upon the manner of doing business, would be equally applicable to the other; and special burdens and restrictions upon one class, not imposed upon the other, constitute an arbitrary deprivation of rights. As the act makes that an offense, if committed by a person engaged in one branch of mining, which, if done by persons in another branch of the same business, is lawful, without any reason for distinction between the two, we must regard it as unconstitutional.

In Millett v. People, supra, and Ramsey v. People, 142 Ill. 380, 17 L. R. A. 853, where provisions similar to those of the act now under consideration were held to be unconstitutional and void, the general right of the laborer and employer to contract in regard to the price of labor, and the method of ascertaining the price, was asserted; and the rule was laid down that any restriction upon that right is a deprivation of both liberty and property within the meaning of the constitutional provision. In view of the discussion of the principles involved in those cases, no extended statement of them will be necessary here. This act makes it an offense against the law for the employer and laborer, at any coal mine at which the miners are paid by weight, to determine upon the weight of any miner's car, or any lot of coal, by any other method than that pointed out by the statute. A failure to weigh a car, and to keep a correct record of the weight, renders the operator liable to the penalties prescribed by the act, although he and the laborer may have agreed upon the weight of the car, or contracted for other methods of determining the weight. This is well illustrated by the facts of this case. The last cars that came up in the evening of each day, designed for coaling the locomotives, would not be weighed until the coal was dumped into the tenders, so that the miners could not obtain the weights until the next day, and they wanted them the same evening. For this reason, and at the instance of the miners, it had been the custom for six years to give each miner the weight according to the system above stated. When the company attempted to change this system and weigh the coal, the miners objected, and insisted upon the custom of averaging weights. No objection was ever made by any miner to this manner of arriving at the weight, instead of weighing the cars on the scales. Here was an arrangement, amounting to a contract between the parties, with which all the contracting parties were satisfied, and the testimony upon which plaintiffs in error were convicted came from miners who left during the miners' strike of 1894, and were not again employed by the company. It seems that a law which deprives men engaged in the business of mining from contracting with each other for the purpose of ascertaining the weight of the coal mined, or the amount due them, in any manner mutually satisfactory, cannot be sustained. That such is the effect of this law is the contention of counsel for the people, and it is only upon the assumption that the law does so control the power to contract, that a conviction could have been had in this case; for, as already seen, the parties had contracted otherwise. The act takes away the freedom of contracting by the parties for the ascertainment of the weight of coal, except by a certain method; and, in our opinion, it is unconstitutional.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the circuit court to discharge the defendants.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

P. M. HILARY, Admr., etc., of John Kennedy, Deceased, Respt.,
v.

(.....Minn.....)

Held, upon the facts, that the ticket agent at the Union Depot in Minneapolis was "an acting ticket agent" of the defendant, within the meaning of Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5202, providing for the service of process in civil actions upon railroad companies.

(May 11, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling a motion to set aside a service of process. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. W. E. Dodge, B. D. Townsend, and C. F. Alderson, for appellant:

One who acts ostensibly and in fact as the sole agent of another who is in turn the sole agent of another and first principal is not the acting agent of such principal but the agent of the agent of such principal.

Since the relation of principal and agent did not exist between the defendant and Jones he was not an acting ticket agent of the defendant within the meaning of the statute.

This provision being remedial in its nature, its construction should be such as to give to it the force and effect intended, and like all similar statutes should be liberally construed.

Peoria Ins. Co. v. Warner, 28 Ill. 429.

Fairly construed it means that when a person is lawfully engaged in the business of selling tickets or managing freight for a railroad company within this state, in the lawful and usual manner, at a regular place of business of such railroad company or at a place where such company lawfully and habitually transacts business, whence it derives the proceeds in the usual and customary manner, such person is an acting ticket or freight agent for the purposes of its provisions.

State v. Northwestern Endowment & L. Asso 62 Wis. 174.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case is whether the ticket agent in what is known as the "Union Depot" at Minneapolis was "an acting ticket agent" of the defendant, within the meaning of Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5202, providing for the service of process in civil actions upon railroad companies. The facts, as distinguished from mere legal inferences, are practically undisputed, and are quite fairly and fully stated in the memorandum of the trial judge. They may be summarized as follows: The Union Depot is owned and operated by the Minneapolis Union Railway Company. A number of lines of railway, including that of the defendant, use this depot for general depot purposes, and as a regular station on their respective roads, under contracts with the Union Railway Company, whereby, for a specified compensation to be paid to it by each of the other railroad companies, it is to furnish each of them trackage facilities into and through the Union Depot, transfer its cars, transfer and deliver baggage, furnish accommodations for passengers arriving or departing, and also sell tickets for each company; maintaining for that purpose a ticket office in the depot, where tickets are regularly sold at all hours of the day. The Union Railway Company employs the agents selling tickets at this ticket office, and such agents are responsible, and under bonds, to that company for the faithful performance of their duties. The different railroad companies furnish their tickets to these ticket agents, who report the sales thereof daily to the respective companies, and account to them at regular intervals for the proceeds of such sales.

*Headnote by MITCHELL, J.

NOTE.—The question, What constitutes an acting agent of a corporation on whom process may be served?—has many illustrations in the note to Foster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co. (S. D.) 23 L. R. A. 490, on the question, Who may be served with process in suit against a foreign corporation?

It also appears from the affidavits used on the motion that the defendant, in its folders and otherwise, holds out and represents to the public the ticket office in this depot as one of its ticket offices, and the ticket agent in that office as its ticket agent. We are of opinion that under these facts the ticket agent in the Union Depot was "an acting ticket agent" of the defendant, within the meaning of the statute. The contention of defendant is that the word "agent" means "an agent in the eye of the law arising from a contract of employment; one responsible to his principal, and subject to be discharged by it,"—and that within this definition the "ticket agent" at this depot is not its agent, but the agent of the Union Railway Company. We do not concur in this view. While the ticket agent is hired by, and under the control of, the Union Railway Company, yet he is performing all the duties of a ticket agent of the defendant, and the defendant is availing itself of his services for that purpose. The word "acting" must have been used in the statute for a purpose, and it seems to us that the essential thing, under the statute, is not the existence of a contract of service, but the actual performance of the duties of ticket agent for the railroad company. As bearing more or less on this question, see Van Dresser v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 48 Fed. Rep. 202; Norton v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 61 Fed. Rep. 618; Union P. R. Co. v. Novak, 9 C. C. A. 629, 61 Fed. Rep. 573, 15 U. S. App. 400; Georgia Southern R. Co. v. Bigelow, 68 Ga. 219; State v. Northwestern Endowment & L. Asso. 62 Wis. 174.

We do not wish to be understood as intimating that scalpers or ticket brokers to whom a railroad company may furnish its tickets for sale would be its "acting ticket agents," within the meaning of the statute. The service in this case was made on the assistant ticket agent in the office, while performing its duties during the temporary absence of the head ticket agent, to whom, on his return, he delivered the copy of the summons. We think this service was regular, and, even if irregular, there was, under the facts, no ground for setting it aside on motion. Union P. R. Co. v. Novak, supra.

Order affirmed.

v.
COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF SOMERSET COUNTY.

(.....Md.....)

1. A witness who can but will not give security for his appearance, and is committed for his refusal, will not be entitled to a per diem fee during any part of the time he may be detained to secure his attendance.
2. A witness unable to find security because of his own misconduct or bad character will not be entitled to a per diem fee when detained to secure his attendance.
3. A witness will be entitled to per diem fees for the term of his detention to secure his attendance in default of a recognizance, when his inability to give security arises from his misfortune, and not his fault.
4. Assumpsit will not lie to recover per diem fees of a witness for the time of his detention to secure his attendance, but the appropriate proceeding is by mandamus, if anything is due him.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this appeal arises on a demurrer to the sixth count of the plaintiff's declaration; the other counts having been withdrawn. The action is in assumpsit, and was instituted by the appellant against the county commissioners of Somerset county.

It appears by the record that the plaintiff, who is an infant under the age of twenty-one years, was on the 8th day of June, 1894, required by a justice of the peace to give security for his appearance as a witness for the state against one Isaac Kemp, charged with the murder of a certain Edward Carver; that being unable to furnish a bond for his appearance to give testimony, he was committed to the custody of the sheriff of Somerset county, there to be detained and kept as a witness for the prosecution; that the record of the case was removed from Somerset county to the criminal court of Baltimore city, and upon its transmission the plaintiff was taken by the sheriff of the county and delivered to the sheriff of Baltimore city, and was held in custody as a witness by the latter, until the trial of the accused, when, on the 4th of February,

NOTE.—In connection with this case, see note to Robinson v. Chambers (Mich.) 20 L. R. A. 57.

In July following, he, by his mother as next friend, brought suit against the county commissioners to recover his per diem of $1 for each of the 242 days he was so detained as a witness. The court below held upon demurrer that that he could not recover, and from the judgment entered against him this appeal was taken. The inquiry presented is whether the plaintiff is entitled to the compensation which he claims.

The provision of the Code relating to the compensation of witnesses is in these words: "There shall be allowed to each witness attending the circuit court for the counties the sum of $1 for each day such witness shall attend for the discharge of his duty." . . . Code, art. 35, § 10. By § 7 of art. 25 of Code, which defines some of the duties of the county commissioners, it is declared that "they," the county commissioners, "shall provide for the support of the courts, compensate jurors and county or state witnesses, . . . and pay and discharge all claims on or against county which have been expressly or impliedly authorized by law." And by § 13 of art. 35 of the Code, which is almost a literal transcript of the act of 1752, chap. 13, it is enacted: "Where a witness against any person accused of crime cannot find security for his appearance to testify against the person so accused, and for want of such security shall be committed to prison, the county where the prosecution shall be carried on shall be chargeable with and pay the imprisonment fees of such witness; and the county commissioners or the mayor and city council of Baltimore shall levy the same from time to time, as the case may require."

Lord Hale (2 Hale, P. C. 282) states that there are two compulsory means to bring in witnesses, which are (first) by process of subpœna issued in the King's name by the justices of the peace, oyer and terminer, gaol delivery, or King's bench, where the plea of not guilty is to be tried; and (secondly) which is the more ordinary and more effectual means, the justices or coroner that take the examination of the person accused, and the information of the witnesses, may at that time, or at any time after and before the trial, bind over the witnesses to appear at the sessions, and in case of their refusal either to come or to be bound over, may commit them for their contempt on such refusal.

Now, whilst § 13 of art. 35 of the Code clearly recognizes the power of a magistrate to commit a witness in order that his attendance to testify against a person accused of crime may be secured, it is a power which can only be exerted after the witness fails to give such reasonable security for his appearance as may be demanded of him. He may fail to enter into a recognizance for his appearance, either because, though able to furnish it, he becomes contumacious, or because, though willing to give it, he is unable to do so. This inability may arise from his poverty or other like innocent cause, or from his bad character and ill repute. If he belongs to the first category and is imprisoned, his imprisonment is obviously the consequence of his voluntary choice, and, under such circumstances, he would have no claim to be compensated out of the public treasury for a detention resulting solely from his own deliberate election. Not being a witness who could not find security for his appearance to testify, he would not have been entitled under the act of 1752 to have even his imprisonment fees paid by the county. If, on the other hand, his imprisonment has grown out of his nonculpable inability to find security for his appearance as a witness, quite a different condition is presented. His inability to enter into a recognizance is, or may be, his misfortune rather than his fault, and his subsequent commitment, in such an event, would in no sense be the result of his own misconduct or fault.

If he be poor, a stranger without acquaintances in the community where by accident he happens to witness a violation of the law, and because of being so circumstanced he finds himself unable to furnish the security required of him, and is thereupon detained in custody as a witness for the state, the gravest injury might be inflicted upon him and upon those who are dependent on his toil and labor for their sustenance, if he were denied compensation for the period whilst involuntarily restrained of his liberty for the benefit of the public, but for no crime or misprision of his own. For an honest, law-abiding but poor and friendless individual to be confined in a common jail, and there forcibly made the companion of criminals and of the depraved, merely because he is unable, through no fault of his own, to find security for his appearance as a witness in behalf of the commonwealth, is bad enough; but when, in addition to this, by that very confinement he is deprived of pursuing his avocation, and then is refused compensation as a witness except for the few days he may be actually within the court room whilst the trial is in progress, his situation is made immeasurably worse. He is subjected to the same treatment that a criminal is, though confessedly not guilty, or even accused of crime; and he is deprived of his liberty and his means of livelihood, and denied compensation as a witness, though charged with no transgression of the law.

To warrant such a result, even if it ever could be justified, there ought to be the most unequivocal statutory sanction. The plaintiff was committed and held distinctively and exclusively as a witness for and in behalf of the state. It was in his capacity as a witness for the prosecution, and solely because he was such a witness, that he was or could have been detained at all; and this detention must be treated as a constructive attendance upon the court, unless the flagrant injustice and great hardship which the contrary view will inevitably entail be deliberately inflicted and sanctioned. As, then, the plaintiff was held in custody only because he was a witness for the state, and as it is the duty of county commissioners to compensate state witnesses and to pay all claims against the county which have been expressly or impliedly authorized by law, and as he must be considered while in custody as constructively in attendance upon the court, he is entitled to the per diem fee allowed by law for each day he was thus in attendance "for the discharge of his duty," as well as for the days he was actually in the court-room during the trial, if he was, through no fault of his own, unable to furnish the bail required.

A direct precedent for this conclusion is found in Higginson's Case, 1 Cranch, C. C. 73, where the court allowed compensation to such a witness for the whole period of her detention. The attorney for the United States relied upon the Maryland statute of 1752, chap. 13, heretofore alluded to, and contended that its provisions only embraced the payment of prison fees and did not include an allowance for the time of the witness; but the court, in deciding in favor of the witness, made no reference to the statute, and treated her inability to enter into a recognizance as her misfortune rather than her fault. And so in Robinson v. Chambers, 94 Mich. 471, 20 L. R. A. 57, it was held that a witness detained by the court in default of bail to appear in a criminal case is to be deemed in attendance upon the court during the entire period of detention within the Michigan statute, which by §§ 9064, 9065, How. Stat., entitles witnesses attending in a court of record to the sum of $1 for each day. See also Hutchins v. State, 8 Mo. 288, where a Louisiana case directly in point is referred to and is thus stated, though the names of the parties are not given: "McFall was on a trading voyage from Kentucky, and recognized and detained till the trial, not having time to go home. His per diem fees were allowed from the date of his recognizance, but not mileage."

In Markwell v. Warren County, 53 Iowa, 422, it was held that a witness whilst detained in jail was not in attendance on court, but the decision is founded on the theory that the detention of the witness was due, not to his inability to find a surety, but to the fact that he could not be trusted to perform his duty as a citizen voluntarily and without compulsion. The Iowa court conceded the hardship to the witness, but treated him as to some extent in fault, because it assumed that the magistrate must have found that the witness could not be trusted to appear without security. "But this," as justly observed in the note to Robinson's Case, 20 L. R. A. 57, "depended entirely on the impression which the witness made upon the magistrate, and it is easy to see that, in many cases, the magistrate might have a bad impression as to the trustworthiness of the witness without any fault of the latter."

If it should appear that a witness could not find security for his appearance because his character is so bad that those who know him refuse to become bound for him, he will have no claim to be compensated, if he should be detained as a witness. His inability to furnish security would then be the result of his own fault, and not of his misfortune, and the reason for treating him as entitled to a per diem whilst in custody would not exist. He will not be allowed to invoke and rely on his own bad character to secure for himself compensation as a witness when but for that bad character he would not have been compelled to undergo a detention.

We hold, then, first, that if a witness can, but will not, give security for his appearance and is committed for his refusal, he will not be entitled to a per diem fee during any part of the time he may be detained to secure his attendance. Secondly, that if his inability to find security results from his own misconduct or bad character he will equally not be entitled to a per diem fee. Thirdly, that if he be committed because of his inability to furnish a recognizance, and if this inability arises from his misfortune and not from his fault, he will be considered as in attendance on the court and entitled for the term of his detention.

We have said the pending action was in assumpsit, and in this respect we apprehend the form of the remedy has been misconceived. There is no element of assumpsit in the case. The appropriate proceeding was by mandamus to compel the county commissioners to make a levy for the amount due to the appellant, if anything was, in reality, due to him. If, upon such a proceeding, it should appear that the witness had refused, though able, to give the security, or that he was unable to give it by reason of his misconduct, he would not be entitled to compensation; but, if it should be shown that he failed to furnish a bond because he was unable, by reason of his misfortune and by reason of no fault of his own, then he would obviously be entitled to relief, provided he has brought himself within the provisions of § 10, art. 35, of the Code, by having procured from the clerk of the court, within thirty days after such attendance was rendered, a certificate or order, showing the amount due him for such attendance.

As in the present form of action a recovery cannot be had, the court below was right in sustaining the demurrer, and its judgment must therefore be affirmed, but without prejudice to the right of the appellant to invoke the appropriate remedy, if he sees fit to do so.

Judgment affirmed, with costs above and below, but without prejudice.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

William BARR, Appt.,
v.
Milton F. LAMASTER.

(.....Neb.....)

1. The right of partition, whether in equity or under the provisions of the Code, is confined to joint tenants and tenants in common of an estate in land.

2. Adjoining lot owners in a city may by grant impose mutual and corresponding restrictions and conditions upon the land owned by each, the mutuality of the covenants in such case being a sufficient consideration for the respective grants.

*Headnotes by POST, Ch. J.

NOTE.—For some authorities on the subject of easements in hallways and stairways, see Hahn v. Baker Lodge No. 47, A. F. & A. M. (Or.) 13 L. R. A. 158, and note.

3. Mutual covenants imposing such rights or restrictions will be construed as the grant of reciprocal easements, which may, when the remedy at law is insufficient, be enforced and protected by a court of equity.

4. The plaintiff and defendant, owners in severalty of adjoining lots, pursuant to a mutual agreement, erected thereon buildings corresponding in size, having the stairs, hallways, skylight, and heating apparatus in common. Held, a grant to each of an easement in so much of the stairs, halls, and skylight as is situated upon the lot of the other; that the easement of each in the property of the other is owned in severalty, and the mere existence of such cross-easements does not authorize the partition of said lots at the suit of either party.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the District Court for Lancaster County granting the relief demanded in a cross-petition in a suit for the partition of real estate which required the construction of a division wall through a building a part of which had been used in common by plaintiff and defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pound & Burr, for appellant:

There can be no partition of real property owned in severalty.

Anderson School Twp. v. Milroy Lodge F. & A. M. No. 139, 130 Ind. 108; Johnson v. Moser, 72 Iowa, 523.

Only joint tenants or tenants in common of an estate in the land can institute the proceeding.

Hurste v. Hotaling, 20 Neb. 178.

Not only is it impossible for Lamaster to build a wall and destroy the easement of Barr in his building, but he could not pull down his building during the existence of Barr's easement, and if he suffered his building to decay Barr could enter and repair it to preserve his easement though he might not be able to charge Lamaster with the repairs.

2 Washb. Real Prop. *79; Loring v. Bacon, 4 Mass. 575; Pierce v. Dyer, 109 Mass. 374, 12 Am. Rep. 716.

Lamaster cannot compel Barr to remodel his building and virtually ruin it after Barr has built on reliance upon his written agreement. Even a tenant in common may by contract estop himself from claiming partition.

Eberts v. Fisher, 54 Mich. 294; Latshaw's Appeal, 122 Pa. 142; Baldwin v. Humphrey, 44 N. Y. 609.

And the situation of the property may be such as to prevent even a joint owner from obtaining partition.

Anderson School Twp. v. Milroy Lodge F. & A. M. No. 139, supra.

Parties to a partition have a right to insist that the property be viewed in its "existing physical condition," and if the condition of it presents insurmountable obstacles to a partition in kind it cannot be compelled.

Soniat v. Supple, 48 La. Ann. 296.

Messrs. R. D. Stearns, J. H. Broady, E. H. Wooley, Cobb & Harvey, and E. J. Murfin for appellee.

Post, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the month of May, 1887, the plaintiff and defendant being the owners in severalty of adjoining inside lots in the city of Lincoln, and being desirous of improving the same, mutually agreed to so build thereon as to have the entrance, hallways, and skylight in common, thus saving valuable space to each. It was further agreed that the two buildings should be heated as one, and by means of a single furnace. Pursuant to such agreement, three-story brick buildings were erected on the lots mentioned, separated by a partition wall one story in height, the upper halls or courts being reached by a common stairway, and receiving light and ventilation from a common skylight, and each party paying one half of the cost of the heating plant subsequently owned and used by them in common. This controversy was instituted by the plaintiff, Barr, in the month of January, 1892, who alleged, in the petition filed by him, in addition to the facts above stated, that the defendant, taking advantage of the common hallway, was destroying the value of his (plaintiff's) property by maintaining a nuisance therein, and by encouraging and permitting his (defendant's) tenants to harbor therein lewd and disreputable characters, etc. The prayer of the petition was for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and lease the premises and to manage the heating apparatus therein; also, for a decree permitting the plaintiff to erect a partition wall upon his own premises, from the cellar to the roof of his said building, and to set aside and cancel the written agreements, three in number, under and by virtue of which the said buildings were constructed. An answer was in due time filed, in which, after setting out one of the several agreements relating to the buildings in controversy, it is alleged that said agreement remains in full force and effect, and expressly denying the plaintiff's right to erect a wall as prayed by him, and denying the jurisdiction of the court to award the relief sought. Accompanying the answer is a cross-petition in the following language: "The defendant consents to the erection of a brick wall between the said lot of this defendant and the said lot of said plaintiff, and that the heating fixtures, including the smokestack, furnace, boiler, pipes, and utensils, owned jointly by and between plaintiff and defendant, be sold. Defendant insists that the court shall sell said joint property above mentioned and erect said brick wall on the true line between the said lots, through the medium of a receiver or master commissioner or the proper officer appointed by the court for that purpose, and that such officer, by the aid of the county surveyor or other proper person, locate the true line between the said two lots prior to putting the said partition wall thereon; and defendant asks that said partition wall be built through the entire length and height of said building. Defendant therefore prays for the sale of said joint heating fixtures, and the erection of said partition wall as aforesaid, and for judgment for damages as aforesaid, and for costs." The agreement to which reference is made in the answer is as follows:

This agreement, made and entered into this 7th day of November, 1890, by and between William Barr and Milton F. Lamaster, witnesseth: That whereas, Milton F. Lamaster is owner of lot six (6), block fifty-eight (58), city of Lincoln, and William Barr is the owner of lot five (5), block fifty eight (58), city of Lincoln; and whereas, said parties have erected a three-story building upon each of said lots; and whereas, the stairway and hall of the second and third floors are joined for the purpose of use and occupancy: It is therefore stipulated and agreed that the said hall and stairway shall always, during the existence of said buildings, be used and occupied by said parties jointly and severally. And it is further stipulated and agreed that the title to each party's lot shall not in any way or manner be affected by the use of said joint occupancy by the said parties hereto, and that said halls and stairways, being located equally upon said lots, are to be used jointly by the said parties, for the convenience of both of them, to the end that they may get a wider and more commodious hallway and stairway in said buildings; it being stipulated and agreed that the occupancy by one party of a portion of the other's lot shall not in any way affect or becloud the title of the other party. And it is further stipulated and agreed that said buildings shall be heated jointly, and each of the parties to this agreement to pay one half of the expense for the same, whether the buildings or any portion of them are occupied or vacant; also, that each party is to pay one half of all expense for repairs to heating apparatus. It is further stipulated that all the heating apparatus in the halls of said building, and boiler and all heating apparatus in the boiler room, is owned jointly by the parties hereto. It is further stipulated that the halls and stairway of said building shall be lighted jointly, and that each of the parties to this agreement pay one half of the expense of lighting the same. Neither of said parties shall have the right to remove or appropriate to his own use any of the heating or lighting apparatus belonging to said building, or any other property or thing to said building belonging, or owned in common by the parties to this agreement. It is further stipulated that this agreement shall be and remain in force for the period of twenty years unless sooner canceled by the mutual consent of the parties hereto. Witness our hands this 7th day of November, A. D. 1890.

[Signed] Wm. Barr.
M. F. Lamaster.

Witness, A. D. Burr.

In an amended and supplemental reply to the defendant's answer and cross-bill, it is alleged that to erect a wall on the line between said buildings is wholly impracticable, since it would necessitate the remodeling of the interior of said building at great expense; that it would destroy the hallways, reduce the size of the rooms, and otherwise irreparably injure the plaintiff's property, to his damage, etc. Subsequently the plaintiff, by leave of court, dismissed his petition, and the cause proceeded to final decree upon the defendant's cross-bill and reply thereto.

The decree mentioned, and from which the plaintiff has prosecuted an appeal to this court, is as follows: "And now, on this 1st day of July, 1893, the court, being well and fully advised in the premises, doth find, from the testimony, that the plaintiff, William Barr, is the owner of lot five (5), and the defendant, Milton F. Lamaster, is the owner of lot six (6), in block fifty eight (58) in the city of Lincoln; that upon said lots a three story brick building is erected, and that said buildings contain a joint stairway and hallway on the second and third stories, said stairway and hallways being one half upon each of said lots; that each of the said parties own the building upon their respective lots, but that, in the construction of said building, it was intended to be lighted and heated jointly, and that the boiler pipes and chimney, etc., were paid for by the plaintiff and defendant jointly, and that the boiler was placed upon the lot line between the said lots, and that the other portion of the joint property was placed upon lot 5, except heating pipes and radiators, which the court finds were placed equally in each of the said buildings. The court further finds that it is impossible for the plaintiff and defendant to continue the joint use of said stairway and hallways, and that a partition wall should be erected between said buildings the entire length of said buildings, the center of said wall to be on the true lot line between said lots, and that the erection of said wall shall be commenced on the 15th day of August, 1893, or as soon thereafter as possible. The court further finds that a partition wall has been erected between the said buildings extending to the second story thereof, except where the stairways are, in front, and the boiler now stands. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that a partition wall be built through said stairway, and extend through the hallways on the second and third stories, and from the basement in front for the entire length of the building, including the space where the boiler now stands, to the skylight in said building, on the lot line, and that each of said parties pay for one half of the expense of the same, and that James Tyler, architect, be and is hereby appointed special commissioner to erect said wall,— said special commissioner to advertise for bids for having said wall built for at least ten days in a newspaper of general circulation in Lincoln, and said work to be let to the lowest responsible bidder, with power reserved to reject any and all bids, and readvertise. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said James Tyler shall appraise the property owned in common by said plaintiff and defendant, and may call to his assistance, at his option, any persons acquainted with the value thereof, and notify each of said parties of said appraisement; and if either of said parties desire to take said property at said appraisement to pay James Tyler the one half of said appraised value, and shall have the privilege so to do, each party having first choice of taking joint property at appraised value situate on his lot; otherwise, said James Tyler shall advertise and sell said property as upon execution, except the chimney, which shall be taken down and used in the erection of said partition wall, if neither of said parties will pay the appraised value thereof, and except also the sewer, which was erected on lot five at the joint expense of the plaintiff and the defendant, which shall be taken at the appraised value of the same by the owner of lot five (5), William Barr, at his option, and also other permanent water pipes and other fixtures that are the joint property of said Barr and Lamaster, and located upon said lot five (5), and said Lamaster shall take, at its appraised value, any such property located on lot six (6), at his option. Either party to have the right to appeal from the appraisement of property on his lot solely situated to the district court on giving bond in double the amount to prosecute the appeal and to pay the appraisement determined at the end of the litigation. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said plaintiff, William Barr, and the said defendant, Milton F. Lamaster, each pay one half of the costs of this action; the costs of the plaintiff being taxed at $———, and the costs of the defendant being taxed at $———, and for all of which execution is hereby awarded."

The proceeding, as submitted to the district court, appears to have been regarded as an equitable partition, between the parties to the decree, of the property thereby affected, and in that light it must be viewed for the purpose of this appeal. It is first argued by the appellant that the cross-bill failed to state a cause of action, since there can be no partition of property owned in severalty. It may be stated, as a general proposition, that, where the parties are neither joint tenants, tenants in common, nor copartners, but each owning distinct and several parts of the property described, an action for partition thereof will not lie. Freem. Coten. §§ 87, 431, et seq.; Russell v. Beasley, 72 Ala. 190; McConnel v. Kibbe, 43 Ill. 12, 92 Am. Dec. 93; Johnson v. Moser, 72 Iowa, 523; Anderson School Twp v. Milroy Lodge F. & A. M. No. 139, 130 Ind. 108. The foregoing general rule is in strict accord with the provisions of our Code for the partition of real property, viz.: "When the object of the action is to effect the partition of real property among several joint owners, the petition must describe the property and the respective interests, and the estates of the several owners thereof, if known. All tenants in common or joint tenants of any estate in land may be compelled to make or suffer partition of such estate or estates in the manner hereinafter prescribed." Code Civ. Proc. § 802. In Hurste v. Hotaling, 20 Neb. 178, the court, by Maxwell, Ch. J., after quoting the foregoing section, says: "The controlling principle in partition, therefore, without regard to the extent or quantity of the interest, is that the parties shall be joint tenants or tenants in common of an estate in the land. . . . Only joint tenants or tenants in common of an estate in land, however, can institute the proceeding." In Johnson v. Moser, supra, the plaintiff had, by purchase at sheriff's sale, acquired title to the first and fourth stories of a certain brick building; also, the cellar thereunder, except that portion used by the execution defendant for the storage of vegetables and provisions for the use of his family. It was held that an action for the partition of the cellar by metes and bounds could not be maintained, the parties being neither joint tenants nor tenants in common, but owners in severalty of distinct and separate portions thereof. In Anderson School Twp. v. Milroy Lodge F. & A. M. No. 139, supra, the parties had erected a building under an agreement whereby the plaintiff was to own and control the ground and first story, subject to the defendant's right of entrance to the third story, to be owned and occupied by it. Elliott, Ch. J., speaking for the court, after holding that partition should be denied on the ground that it would destroy the defendant's right of access to its lodge room, adds: "But this is not the only reason why the appellant is not entitled to partition, for there is this additional reason, namely, each party owns its part of the building in severalty. As each party owns its part of the property in severalty, it is legally impossible that partition can be awarded, for there is no community of interest."

By virtue of the agreements under which the buildings were erected, each party to this controversy has an easement in so much of the halls and skylight as is situated upon the lot of the other, and, in the language of plaintiff's counsel, such easements "are in no way inconsistent with entire several ownership of the two buildings, and the mere existence of cross easements does not authorize the court to make partition, because each party owns his easement in the property of the other in severalty." The defendant, it is shown, granted to the plaintiff the easement in the hallways and skylight voluntarily, and for a valuable consideration, viz.: the grant to him of a cross easement therein. Such easement is real property, an incorporeal hereditament, and as much a part of the plaintiff's estate as the building itself. The defendant is not merely prohibited from interfering with the access of the plaintiff and his tenants to the building of the latter by means of the common hallways, and their free enjoyment of the common skylight, but equity would interfere to prevent the tearing down or destroying by him of his own building during the existence of such easement. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 12th ed. § 927; Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440, 26 Am. Rep. 615; Henry v. Koch, 80 Ky. 391, 44 Am. Rep. 484. And, should he suffer his building to decay, the plaintiff would have the right to enter for the purpose of repairing, in order to preserve his easement therein. 2 Washb. Real Prop. p. 79; Washb. Easem. 654; Prescott v. White, 21 Pick. 341, 32 Am. Dec. 266; McMillan v. Cronin, 75 N. Y. 474.

But the decree is defended upon the ground that the plaintiff, by the petition to which reference has been made, and by which he sought permission to erect a partition wall on his own premises, abandoned whatever easement he enjoyed in the defendant's property, and that he is accordingly now estopped to call in question the power of the court to grant the relief awarded. But to that contention there are two sufficient answers: First, the allegations of the petition, in so far as they relate to rights of the parties under the agreements mentioned, are in substantial accord with the statements of the answer, and the alleged estoppel is predicated, not upon any statement of fact, but upon the pleader's conclusion from the facts stated by him; second, the plaintiff, for reasons not disclosed, but presumably because he was not entitled to the relief prayed, dismissed his petition previous to the hearing of the cause in the district court. A party will not, it is true, be permitted to shift his position during the trial by pleading one cause of action or defense and recovering upon another. But that doctrine can have no application to the case before us, where the alleged variance consists in the mere assertion of a legal proposition in a proceeding previously dismissed on the plaintiff's own motion.

The decree is reversed, and the action dismissed.

I. Rights of vendor.

a. To collect the balance after the vendor retakes possession.

In SEANOR v. MCLAUGHLIN it was held that a seller of chattels by conditional sale on a renting contract reserving the power to take possession upon default, who also receives a judgment bond as collateral security, cannot enforce such bond after he has rescinded the sale by taking possession of the chattels. The rescission of the contract by the vendor gave the vendee the right to the collateral.

There appears to be conflict of authority in regard to the right of the vendor to collect the purchase money after retaking the property under a contract of conditional sale, reserving title until payment in full. Where the retaking is construed to be a rescission, his right to enforce payment is gone, as held in SEANOR v. MCLAUGHLIN. Some cases hold that an election of one remedy precludes the other; some hold that the consideration has failed, and some deny the cumulative right by the terms of the contract. But other cases hold that the remedies are not inconsistent and that obtaining possession by a judgment, levy, and sale, or by a resale or notice after taking by replevin, or by retaking under a chattel mortgage, or by retaking under the contract, will not prevent the vendor from collecting the balance. This is a construction that the retaking is the enforcement of the security. If there is but a small part of the debt due, and the property is valuable, it seems that the inclination of the courts is to relieve the purchaser from the entire loss of his investment. The proceedings are now regulated by statute in some states.

Some of the cases deny a recovery to the vendor on the ground of rescission.

The vendor was refused a recovery of the balance of the purchase price, after retaking possession on default under a conditional sale, where he resold the chattel, as he was disabled from performing the contract. It was said that if the contract provided for retaking and resale and crediting of the proceeds, leaving the vendee expressly liable for the balance, there would not be a rescission by the exercise of the power, and if the property was destroyed without fault of the vendor, he might possibly recover. Sawyer v. Pringle, 18 Ont. App. Rep. 218.

And where the vendees refused on the trial of a machine to accept the same or give their note, and the vendor resumed possession and sold the chattels and brought suit to enforce a lien on land under the contract for the balance. There was no independent covenant to pay the price, and electing to take the machine was a rescission. The vendor may sue for a breach of the contract. Sawyer v. Baskerville, 10 Manitoba L. Rep. 652.

The vendor was refused a recovery on the contract where he had resumed possession on the failure of the purchaser to take the article from the express office, and the contract provided that on failure to pay any instalment, the vendor might take possession. The retaking by the vendor was a rescission. The delivery to the express office was a delivery to the purchaser. White v. Smith, 28 N. S. 50.

And so where the suit was upon a note given on a lease and was not given for hire, but the lease and notes were one transaction, and was rescinded by resuming possession, and there was no consideration for the notes, the lease not being for any definite time nor the price per month for hire fixed at any definite sum. Campbell Printing-Press & Mfg. Co. v. Hickok, 140 Pa. 290.

And where the contract was in the form of a lease and to secure the payment of said rentals a judgment bond was given as collateral, and on default the lessor might resume possession, the lessee having the right to purchase, rentals paid being allowed as a credit. Such remedies were distinct and not cumulative. If the bailor rescinded by repossessing himself of the property, the right of personal action against the bailee was at an end, and the omission of the word "rescind" in the contract sustaining a demurrer to the declaration in a a suit brought to recover damages for defendant's alleged trespass in taking goods out of the possession of plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. H. Bowen for appellant.

Mr. W. B. Trundle, for appellee:

The defendant had the plain and unequivocal right under the contract, after default by the vendee, to enter the premises of the plaintiff, without previous demand or notice, and remove the goods.

North v. Williams, 120 Pa. 109.

A promise to forbear, without legal consideration, is a nullity—is no more than mere forbearance; hence such promise has no effect whatever upon the right of the party not in default to proceeding against the other who has made default.

was not material. (This case was not referred to in the opinion in Durr v. Replogle, infra.) SEANOR v. MCLAUGHLIN, 165 Pa. 150.

In SEANOR v. MCLAUGHLIN, the case of Campbell Printing-Press & Mfg. Co. v. Hickok, supra, was distinguished, although the word "rescind" was used in that contract. The stipulation and the action of the lessor in this case were the same as a rescission.

And a recovery was refused the vendor upon purchase-money notes where they were given as security for an extension of time and he took possession and sold the goods on default under an executory contract of sale, providing that the title did not pass until paid for, and that on default the vendor might retake the same into his possession, and that as compensation for the depreciation in the value of the property all payments made were to be retained. The resale was an election to treat the contract of sale as broken. The remedy is by an action for breach of contract. Distinguishing Brewer v. Ford, 54 Hun, 116, infra, I., d, which was an action of trover, as that case only held that the vendor might retain possession of the property and at the same time enforce the agreement to pay the purchase price. It was said that if the vendor in this case had simply rested upon a possession, the failure to pay the notes entitled him to retake possession of the goods and hold them as trustee of the vendee, and then the notes and security given might have been enforced. Earle v. Robinson, 91 Hun, 363, Affirming 12 Misc. 536.

And where the purchaser in a conditional sale, in consideration of the vendor's promise to extend the time of payment, executed a note, and as security, a mortgage on other property, and the suit was to foreclose the mortgage, the vendor having taken possession of the property sold. But there was no finding in this case that the extension of time and the grant of the right to use the engines and appliances sold did not constitute a sufficient consideration for the notes and mortgage, and a new trial was granted. Sinker v. Green, 113 Ind. 264.

On a subsequent trial of the same case an additional answer was filed alleging that the only consideration was as an additional security for the original notes, which were surrendered and the debt canceled by the enforcement of the condition in the agreement of sale. The vendor, exercising the option to retake the property and surrender the notes representing the consideration, could proceed no farther. Green v. Sinker, 135 Ind. 434.

As to waiver by extension of time, see infra, V.

In Mott v. Havana Nat. Bank, 22 Hun, 354, it was said that the vendee would not be liable to pay the whole face of the note in a conditional sale while the vendor at the same time retained his title and resumed his possession of the property which formed the entire consideration of the note.

In Rodgers v. Bachman, 109 Cal. 552, it was said that the vendor in a contract reserving title and to give a bill of sale on full payment, with right of possession on default, could not maintain an action for the price where there was no agreement to pay; and that if the vendor had taken possession on default and resold the goods, he could not maintain an action for the price.

In Helby v. Matthews [1895] A. C. 471, it was said that the lessee was at liberty to determine the contract by returning the thing hired to its owner, and was under no obligation to purchase the thing or pay a price for it, where the piano was let on hire on monthly instalments, and providing that the hirer might terminate the hiring by delivering up the piano to the owner, remaining liable for all arrears, and until full payment of the piano to continue the sole property of the owner.

In Smith v. Gilmore, 23 Wash. L. Rep. 717, it was said that on default by the vendee in a conditional sale, the vendor could recover the balance unpaid from vendee, or recover the property, but that an election of the former would preclude the latter.

In Third Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 25 Minn. 530, it was said that if prior to a default on a conditional sale note the vendor had retaken possession of the property and disposed of it, so that upon the maturity of the note a performance of the condition on the part of the vendor was impossible, no action could be maintained against the purchaser upon his promise.

In Dowdell v. Empire Furniture & L. Co. 84 Ala. 317, it was said that a continuing liability for the purchase price after the failure to perform the condition and after the vendor has reacquired possession of the property was inconsistent with a conditional sale, and the vendor's claiming both the furniture and the notes of the vendees and the notes of subpurchasers as security was a claim of antagonistic rights unless the agreement operated as a mortgage, and then to be valid it would have to be in writing.

Some cases deny a recovery on the ground of failure of consideration, and they might also be classed as coming under a rescission.

A recovery upon a purchase-money note under a conditional sale was denied after the chattel had been returned, where the contract was in the form of a lease, providing that if the lessee shall have paid all of said rent he should be entitled to a bill of sale, and on failure to pay any of said rent all his rights should terminate and the said H. might take possession. This was not a lease but a conditional sale; it was not signed by the lessor. The forfeiture of the money paid was ample compensation for its use, and H. obtained the organ and the forfeited payments, which was all that was contracted for, and the consideration of the note failed. Hine v. Roberts, 48 Conn. 267, 40 Am. Rep. 170. See Beach's Appeal, 58 Conn. 464, infra, I., c.

And where the action was upon a real-estate mortgage forming part of the consideration of the ing? Does it suspend the payee's right to sue during the month of April? By all the authorities it does not. The payee has, by the contract, the right to the money on April 1. The benefit of receiving it on May 1 is no more than he was entitled to on April 1. The promise is a nullity.

Neither the promise to do, nor the actual doing, of that which the promisor is by law or subsisting contract required to do, is a sufficient consideration to support a promise in his favor.

Esterly Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Pringle (1894) 41 Neb. 265; Schuler v. Myton (1892) 48 Kan. 282; Widiman v. Brown (1890) 83 Mich. 241; Robinson v. Jewett (1889) 116 N. Y. 40; Dennis v. Piper (1886) 21 Ill. App. 169; Little v. Rees (1885) 34 Minn. 277.

The contract shows that thereby the plaintiff gave the defendant, in case of default, "an irrevocable license, or rather a license coupled with an interest," to enter his premises and remove the goods.

Briscoe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

purchase, and the vendor had taken the property by replevin for default of an instalment provided for in a lease, representing part of the consideration, as the mortgage being a part of the consideration fell with it, and there was no consideration for the same. Scott v. Hough, 151 Pa. 630.

And where the contract provided that the payments should be for rent, and the title was expressly retained by the plaintiff until the notes should all be paid. The right to exact rent ceased when "the lessor" repossessed himself of the property rented. This was not a sale but a lease. Campbell Printing Press & Mfg. Co. v. Henkle, 8 Mackey, 95.

And where he had taken the chattel from the purchaser and sold the same and applied the proceeds toward the payment of the note cost and expense. There was a total failure of consideration. Minneapolis Harvester Works v. Hally, 27 Minn. 495.

And where, after the property had been taken by the vendor, the purchaser promised to pay the note. The plaintiff having elected to take back the property and treat his title as unconditional, the purchaser would not be required to pay for it. Aultman v. Olson, 43 Minn. 409.

A recovery of damages for a breach of the contract, or the value of the use of the chattels, or the unpaid instalments, was refused to the vendor who had taken the property back on a conditional sale contract in the form of a lease and agreement to sell when payments should have been made, conditioned that upon default of any payment the plaintiff would have the right to rescind the contract, and take possession, and the sums paid were to become the property of the plaintiff. The sale was to be consummated when the purchase price should be paid. A subsequent oral agreement to pay after default gave no right of recovery. It was said that if, on a default, the purchaser prevented the vendor from asserting his right by a promise, a different case would have been presented. Loomis v. Bragg, 50 Conn. 228, 47 Am. Rep. 638.

See Beach's Appeal, 58 Conn. 464, infra, I., c.

But other cases hold that the pursuit of the property as a security only will not defeat an action on the notes.

In a suit on a conditional sale note by the vendor, the title to remain in the vendor until the note was paid, an answer that the vendor took possession and sold the property, at which time it was worth $600, and that by reason thereof the note was "paid off and discharged," was not a good answer, as the vendor had the right to take possession of the property, sell it, and apply the proceeds to the note, which he did, and there were no equities to adjust. Ascue v. Aultman, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 497.

In that case it was said that if property was sold for $1,000,—$500 down and a note for the balance payable in twelve months,—and the use of the property for five months was $100, and the vendor then retook possession and sued on the $500 note, he could only recover the $100, and the purchaser could recover back $400, the excess over the rental value of the property.

In Durr v. Replogle, 167 Pa. 347, where the contest was with another creditor and possession was taken by the vendor after judgment on confession in his favor was entered, it was held that the bailor may take judgment on confession or reclaim the property, and may do both where the agreement was in the alternative. The entry of the judgment was not a satisfaction nor an affirmance of title under an agreement providing that no title shall pass until the instalments are paid and a bill of sale delivered. The two remedies were not inconsistent, and the partial pursuit of one does not preclude the other. It was said that where the party had retaken the goods into his possession he could not then collect the judgment. The fact that it was left open amounts to little. But see SEANOR v. MCLAUGHLIN.

A vendor was allowed a recovery on a purchase-money note where he had made a levy, sale, and purchase under a prior note, although he afterwards sold the property at an advance, as his election to levy made the sale complete and passed the title to his vendee. Tanner & D. Engine Co. v. Hall, 89 Ala. 628.

And where he had previously taken the property by replevin and sold the same at public sale after notice to the vendee under a contract providing that the title was to remain in the seller, and on default of payment he could retake the chattel, and payments made should be for the use of said machinery, and nothing should constitute a defense or set-off, or delay prompt payment of the note. The enforcement of the contract was not a rescission. Dederick v. Wolfe, 68 Miss. 500.

And where the suit was on a renewal note, and a chattel mortgage was executed to secure the same, and the property was taken by the vendor on a chattel mortgage, and at the mortgage sale the vendee purchased part of the property. The execution of the chattel mortgage was an election by both parties to treat the same as absolute, but proper credit was required of the proceeds of the sale. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Lewis, 52 Kan. 358.

In Mott v. Havana Nat. Bank, 22 Hun, 354, which was an action for damages against the holder of a conditional sale note against a bank for neglecting to notify an indorser, where the plaintiff had recovered a judgment on the note against the purchaser, had taken possession of the property, levied the execution on the property and purchased it for $68 when it was worth $600, this note was held to be the same as a chattel mortgage, and after forfeiture it was the satisfaction of the debt provided that the property was of sufficient value. If upon a fair sale the property realized less than the debt the mortgagee could sue for the balance; if there was no sale the mortgagor was entitled to have the Hines in the court of common pleas of Baltimore city, and the declaration is in these words: That on the 4th day of April, 1893, the said Noah Lee Cole obtained from said Julius Hines merchandise, consisting of "one suit of furniture, 18¾ yards of carpet, and one mattress," upon the terms and conditions set forth in the paper hereto attached, for which he, the said Noah Lee Cole, agreed to pay $50.10 to be paid in monthly instalments of $4 each, in the manner and at the times stated therein. That said Noah Lee Cole accordingly paid, on account of said $50.10, the sum of $20, so that on the 15th day of October, 1893, being in arrear in his payments $8, he received from said Julius Hines a promise to wait two weeks for the payment of said sum of $8, namely, until the 29th of October, 1893, and an extension of the time specified in the contract for payment until said 29th October, 1893. That two days before the expiration of said two weeks, namely, on the 27th day of October, 1893, the said Julius Hines, by his agents, and knowing the said Noah Lee Cole to be away from home, and therefore unable to prevent the wrongful seizure, and make payment, forcibly entered whole property applied in satisfaction of the debt, and as the plaintiff became the purchaser at the sale the amount would still remain in his hands in the nature of a pledge, and the party sued for neglecting to protest a note, could show that the loss of plaintiff had been less than the obligation of the maker.

In Brewer v. Ford, 54 Hun, 116, it was said that the claim of a vendor that he might retain possession of the property and at the same time enforce the purchase price, where the contract provided that the chattel should remain the property of the vendor until paid for, was not inconsistent. See Earle v. Robinson, 91 Hun, 363, supra, I., a.

b. To recover purchase price where the property is destroyed after delivery.

The rule seems to be that the purchaser is liable on his contract notwithstanding the destruction or loss of the property after delivery without fault on his part, although there is some conflict of authority.

The vendor was allowed a recovery on the notes for the purchase price, although the property was destroyed after delivery without fault of the purchaser, where the note provided "that the title to the above-mentioned property does not pass to me, and that until all said notes are paid, the title to aforesaid property shall remain in" the vendor. Burnley v. Tufts, 66 Miss. 48; Tufts v. Griffin, 107 N. C. 47, 10 L. R. A. 526. But see Cobb v. Tufts, infra.

In Tufts v. Griffin, supra, the case of Swallow v. Emery, infra, was distinguished, as in that case upon payment of the price the vendor was to execute a bill of sale to the vendee.

In Cooper v. Chicago Cottage Organ Co. 58 Ill. App. 248, a recovery was allowed on a note having written on it "Title not to pass until this note is paid in full," where it was claimed by the defendant that it was given by him for a piano which was destroyed by fire, but this was not shown by the record.

In Hintermister v. Lane, 27 Hun, 497, it was said that the purchaser of an organ on a conditional sale in the form of a lease would be bound to pay to the assignee of an instalment note the purchase price whether the organ was destroyed or not, where the contract provided that on payment of said note at maturity the said note was to be a receipt in full against said instrument.

But in Cobb v. Tufts, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson), § 153, in a suit on an instalment note for a chattel, the title to remain in the vendor and not to vest in the vendee until the notes were paid, the destruction of the property by fire after delivery, without fault of the purchaser, was held to be a good defense on a plea of failure of consideration, as the sale was incomplete and the right of property was not vested in the vendee.

In Swallow v. Emery, 111 Mass. 355, where there was an agreement to sell two horses, a wagon, and a pair of harnesses, and one horse died and part payment was made, and then the vendor took possession of the other horse, it was said that if the purchaser had paid full value of the remaining property he could hold the same, as acceptance of the payment operated as a severance.

For destruction of property, see Jones v. Pullen, 66 Ala. 310, infra, I., d; Sawyer v. Pringle, 18 Ont. App. Rep. 218, supra, I., a.

c. To recover on unpaid notes or contract where the vendor does not resume possession or accept a return of the property.

Generally the purchaser is liable on his purchase-money note or contract according to the terms in a conditional sale or lease, the title to vest in the purchaser on full payment, if the vendor does not exercise his option to retake the property. The exceptions appear to have been where the contract to sell was an executory contract, and where the purchaser had an option.

The vendor was allowed a recovery of the balance of the purchase price in a conditional sale, the title to remain in the vendor until payment in full, where the conditions were solely for the benefit of the vendor, as he could waive the forfeiture and treat the title of the purchaser as absolute. Bissell v. Bissell, 4 N. Y. Week. Dig. 338.

And where the right to take possession did not give the vendee the right to offer to return the possession and defeat a recovery on the purchase-money notes. Fleury v. Tufts, 25 Ill. App. 101.

And where the purchaser refused to accept the article after delivery under a contract that the vendor shall not relinquish the title, but shall remain the sole owner thereof until the sum is fully paid. Marvin Safe Co. v. Emanuel, 21 Abb. N. C. 181, Reversing 12 N. Y. S. R. 134.

A vendor was allowed a recovery for the whole purchase price of an article where the contract provided, payable in instalments of $10 on delivery at the express office, and on default of any payment the whole should become due, as the default of the first payment matured the whole debt, although the purchaser refused to receive the article and the express company left it at plaintiff's place of business without their assent. White v. Solomon, 164 Mass. 516, 30 L. R. A. 537.

And where an assignee for creditors of the purchaser on conditional sale had not the option to tender back the chattels, and rescind the contract, and the vendor had taken out an attachment and proved his claim against the estate, under a contract providing that A agrees to deliver and B shall be permitted to take possession and to hold the machinery as the property of the party of the first part until the notes or renewals thereof are fully paid, when the machinery shall be sold to and become the property of the party of the second part; and the party of the first part is hereby bound to sell and agrees to consider the same as sold, and deliver when said notes or renewals are paid. The party of the first part shall have the right to resume possession on default, and the amount paid shall be for the use of said machinery, and said notes shall then be canceled and delivered up. Beach's Appeal, 58 Conn. 464, distinguishing Hine v. Roberts, 48 Conn. 267, supra, I., a, and Loomis v.

the premises of said Noah Lee Cole, and removed the goods and merchandise purchased as aforesaid, to the great inconvenience, humiliation, and injury of the said Noah Lee Cole and his family.

To this declaration the following contract was attached and was made a part thereof:

This indenture witnesseth that I have this day rented from Julius Hines the articles hereinafter mentioned, upon the following conditions: That I shall pay to him the sum of $1 cash, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and $4 in monthly instalments, each and every 12th from day or date hereof, until the sum of $50.10 shall be fully paid. The said Julius Hines will, upon the final payment, sell to me the said property, and execute and deliver to me a receipted bill of sale thereof. And I also agree to retain them, as his goods, at 2017 Oak street, in the city of Baltimore and state of Maryland, for my own use, but nevertheless in trust for and as the property of Julius Hines, who neither parts with, nor do I acquire, any title thereto until the said sums are fully paid. I further agree

Bragg, 50 Conn. 228, 47 Am. Rep. 638, supra, I., a, for in both of these cases the acts of the vendees in returning the property after default were coupled with the corresponding acts of the vendors in accepting the property, and this constituted a failure of consideration.

And where the plaintiff had the option to take back books sold, and retain all instalments paid, as this did not give the defendant the right to return them. A tender of the books after default did not release the purchaser from the contract obligation. Appleton v. Norwalk Library Corp. 53 Conn. 4. But see White v. Smith, 28 N. S. 5, supra, I., a.

As to refusal of the purchaser to keep the property, see Root v. Lord, 23 Vt. 568, infra, II., b; Sawyer v. Baskerville, 10 Manitoba L. Rep. 652, supra, I., a; White v. Smith, supra, I., a.

And where the stipulation was that the notes were given as price for a business and if not paid or satisfactory arrangements made the business should belong to the vendor, as this gave to the vendor and not to the vendee the option in case the note was not paid. Geist v. Stier, 134 Pa. 216.

And where there was no tender back of the article purchased, or a showing that it was worthless, and the purchase-money note provided that the title, ownership, or possession did not pass from the vendor until this note and interest were paid. Fleetwood v. Dorsey Mach. Co. 95 Ind. 491.

And where the vendor sued on a rent note according to its terms, and the lease by which the renter might become an owner was a sale and was not repugnant and void. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Cole, 4 Lea, 439, 40 Am. Rep. 29. See Meagher v. Hollenberg, 9 Lea, 392, infra, I., d.

And where the vendor sued upon a contract in the form of a lease, and the purchaser was in default and was in possession. (The case of Hawley v. Kenoyer, infra, was cited in the argument, but the opinion does not discuss the right of the parties or the case, and only holds that the complaint stated a cause of action.) Singer Mfg. Co. v. Hatley, 3 Wash. Terr. 198.

In that case the complainant alleged that at the time of the execution of the note the plaintiff sold and delivered a sewing machine, and that the defendant took the machine and had retained possession ever since, and refused to pay the same, and that there was due $100. It was claimed that the plaintiff must allege and prove performance or tender of performance on his part; but the court does not discuss this question. (The difference in the contracts between this and Hawley v. Kenoyer, infra, was that in the latter case the vendors agreed that on performance by the vendee they would sell and transfer. And in the case of Singer Mfg. Co. the contract was simply that the title was to remain in the vendor until the note was paid.)

The vendor was allowed, on winding up a partnership in a printing outfit by a receiver, the value of the "goodwill" where a printing establishment was sold on conditional sale, "the party of the second part to have full ownership when the conditions and stipulations of this agreement are fully performed." Boon v. Moss, 70 N. Y. 465.

But a recovery was refused a vendor upon a contract where the vendor failed to show in his complaint either a sale or tender and the contract was in the form of a note, promising to pay B a certain sum of money. Conditioned that the above note is given for the consideration that B agrees and promises that upon the payment of said note and interest "they will sell and transfer to the undersigned at the price of said principal and interest" the engines which the said B has this day intrusted to the care of the undersigned. Said property is the property of B, the legal title is in B, and shall remain until they make the sale and transfer after the note is paid, and the vendee agrees to return the said engine to B if requested at any time before said sale and transfer, and such return shall not extinguish or alter the liability to pay the note. The promise to pay and the promise to transfer legal title, are independent promises. Hawley v. Kenoyer, 1 Wash. Terr. 609. See Singer Mfg. Co. v. Hatley, supra.

And the vendor was refused a recovery on a purchase-money note where the sale was in the form of a lease, providing on the part of the lessees, "but when said rent has all been paid at the times thereof, should we so elect, the title of said property shall be transferrod to us, or order, by a bill of sale, in consideration of the payment by us of the sum of 1 per cent, otherwise the same shall be returned to them at their expense." This contract was terminable by the lessees, and this resulted from their failure to pay any one of the obligations. It was said that the lessors then became entitled to the possession of the property and the defendants to the surrender of the unpaid notes, and their exoneration therefrom was effected. A. D. Puffer & Sons' Mfg. Co. v. Baker, 104 N. C. 148. See A. D. Puffer & Sons' Mfg. Co. v. Lucas, infra, II., a.

In Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Jacobs, 2 Misc. 236, it was said that an action on contract could not be maintained against an infant purchaser under a conditional sale.

d. To recover from the purchaser the possession or the value of the property on default.

The vendor may recover from the purchaser the possession or the value of the property sold on conditional sale with reservation of the title until payment in full, if the vendor has not waived his right and the purchaser is in default.

The vendor in a conditional sale was allowed a recovery in replevin where he obtained an order of sale of the property and to apply the proceeds to the payment of the debt, although this was not claimed in the complaint, and it was contended that such a judgment prevented a defense against the debt. But the vendor could not recover $100 damages for detention, as the interest allowed covered the damages. Keitt v. Counts, 15 S. C. 493.

And where the contract was for the sale of machinery, although such machinery may have been attached to a building by the purchaser. Ott v Specht (Del.) 11 Cent. Rep. 244.

And where the contract provided that the title in the property was to remain in the vendor until not to remove the same from said premises, or sell or attempt to sell without the consent of Julius Hines; and in case of any default in any payments, or the falsity of my accompanying statements in any one particular, or in other violation of this contract, this agreement shall, at his option, be deemed annulled; and he is hereby authorized to enter my premises and remove said property; and be it distinctly understood that I have rented these goods from Julius Hines upon the truthfulness of these representations. Julius Hines reserves the right to refuse to send the articles mentioned in this contract, if not satisfactory to him. He also reserves the right to give more time than that agreed upon, if it suits his views, without vitiating this contract by such extension of time.

all the payments were fully paid, and default and demand were made, although the contract contained no express provision authorizing the vendor to retake possession on default. Wiggins v. Snow, 89 Mich. 476. Distinguishing Adams v. Wood, infra, as there no demand was made.

And where the contract provided that the title to a stock of goods was in the vendor until the whole purchase price was paid, and the right of possession in the purchaser, but this latter was limited to the period that he should not be in default. Ryan v. Wayson (Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 916.

And where the vendor accepted part of an instalment after a default, and the contract provided that the purchaser had the right to the use and possession of the chattels until default in the payments of the instalments, but after default the vendor might at once resume possession. The rules of forfeiture were held not to apply to the question of the right of possession of the property. A tender of the payment after suit in replevin did not avail where it was not pleaded. Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 597.

And the vendor, in an action of detinue, was allowed a recovery and damages of the value of the hire from the time of refusal to deliver the property on demand till the trial, for property substituted by his consent, where the contract provided that on default of performing work at so much per month, the property was to be surrendered. The vendor could demand possession on the first default. The vendee could not abate damages by proving the amount paid. McGinnis v. Savage, 29 W. Va. 362.

And the vendor was allowed a recovery in trover after default, demand, and refusal, where the contract was in the name of the agent and the title was to remain in him as agent until paid for. Jowers v. Blandy, 58 Ga. 379.

And where the contract was an agreement to sell on payments, "time to be considered of the essence of the agreement," and if default occurred all moneys paid to be forfeited, and the vendor to have the right of possession. Sere v. McGovern, 65 Cal. 244.

The lessors were entitled to an order from the bankruptcy court for property let for hire on instalment to the bankrupt, upon payment in full to become the property of the lessee, but until payment in full to remain the property of the lessors, giving to the lessors the right to resume possession on default of lessee or on his becoming bankrupt, and providing that if possession was taken by the lessors the loss by nonperformance by the lessee might be proved against the estate in bankruptcy. McEntire v. Crossley Bros. [1895] A. C. 457.

The vendor was allowed to recover possession from the vendee where the purchase-money note was for "steam, saw, and grist mill, the title to vest in said P (the vendor) until said sum of money is paid with interest," where a deed of trust on land and said machinery was also given as security, and the house containing the machinery was burned and the remnants of the machinery rebuilt and refitted by the vendee, and the deed of trust had never been enforced. Jones v. Pullen, 66 Ala. 310.

The vendor was allowed a recovery in conversion, where a bicycle was sold on a conditional sale and after default the purchaser had left the rear wheel with the vendor, and on demand of payment the purchaser claimed the right to deduct the sums paid elsewhere for repairs, but defaulted on next payment. The offer by the vendor to return the wheel on condition that the payment in default and the payment not due be made, was not a waiver of the default. Equitable General Providing Co. v. Stein, 16 Misc. 582.

And where the suit was against a lessee and her husband after she was in default and demand was made of her for the machine in the presence of her husband and the surrender was refused, under a contract providing that A rented to B a sewing machine, that A agreed not to demand the return unless default was made, and B agreed to return the machine at the expiration of the time, B having the option to purchase the machine within ten days thereafter, if not in default, by paying $1 purchase money, and A to sell by bill of sale, on default B to have no equitable title on account of any payments made. This was a bailment and not a sale. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Heil, 115 Pa. 487.

The vendor's assignee was allowed a recovery in assumpsit against an assignee for creditors of the purchaser of chattels on conditional sale, for the value of such goods sold by the assignee, where the contract provided that the vendor shall keep, hold, and retain its title and ownership of the property until the full and complete performance, and on full payment then the purchaser shall become the owner of all the right, property, and effects of the vendor. Edwards v. Symons, 65 Mich. 348.

That the vendor had not returned the consideration received or the unpaid notes will not defeat an action by him for the recovery of the possession or the value of the goods sold on conditional sale, the title to remain in the vendor until full payment, if the purchaser is in default.

And the vendor may recover in trover without tendering back the purchase money already paid, where the contract was in the form of a lease and on certain payments the plaintiffs were to make title. But the action may be defended by showing that full value was paid owing to the article having been defective. Guilford v. McKinley, 61 Ga. 230. See also Hamilton v. Singer Mfg. Co. 54 Ill. 370, infra.

And where the contract of conditional sale provided on default that the vendor might resume possession, but did not provide that the vendor should first return the money paid. The retaking was not a rescission. Fairbanks v. Malloy, 16 Ill. App. 277.

And where a return of the notes was not provided for in the contract for the use of a machine which was to remain the property of the vendor extension of time for the payment of the two instalments being a voluntary promise, without consideration, was not binding, but that, notwithstanding such promise, he was at liberty to annul the contract, retake the goods, and forfeit the purchase money already paid by the appellant. It will be observed, however, that this is not like the cases cited by the appellee, where there is a debt absolutely due and payable, and the creditor gratuitously promises to grant an extension of time for the payment. By the express terms of this contract, the vendor, in the event of a default by the buyer, had a right either to declare a forfeiture and retake the goods or to waive the default and continue the contract in force. The declaration alleges conduct by the seller which, as will be subsequently seen, did amount to a waiver of the default, and the question is whether the defendant was bound by that waiver, or whether he could subsequently, and for the same defaults that were so waived, enforce the forfeiture. It is therefore not the case of a mere promise to give indulgence to a debtor or to waive a future default, but one involving the consideration of the effect of an actual waiver.

In all contracts where time is of the essence, a breach of the contract in that respect by one of the parties may be waived by the other and on default of payment was to be returned to the vendor with pro rata pay for its use of $3 per month, and the title was to remain in the vendor until paid for in full. When the answer admitted the right to recover and did not claim a return of the property, a judgment for the defendant of return was erroneous although the jury found that he was entitled to the possession. Kirby v. Tompkins, 48 Ark. 273.

The rights of the vendee in a conditional sale could not be tried in a replevin suit brought by the vendor after default and a refusal to surrender the property on demand, as the remedy must be sought elsewhere, if the title was in the vendor and the contract expressly gave him the right to retake upon condition broken, and the money paid was to be forfeited for the use, wear, and tear, etc. Thirlby v. Rainbow, 93 Mich. 164, Distinguishing Preston v. Whitney, 23 Mich. 260, infra, II., b, as there the contract contained no provision for a forfeiture, and in New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Bothane, 70 Mich. 443, subd. 2-a, the vendor attempted replevin without having declared the contract forfeited by proper demand.

A recovery in replevin in favor of the vendor was allowed on default of an instalment payment, without requiring a tender back of any part of the amount previously paid, where the contract provided that the title should remain in the vendor until paid for, and that on default of any payment he should be entitled to the possession. This was decided on an objection to evidence, that the vendee offered to deliver possession on being allowed credit. It was said, whether the vendor held the title and the right of possession merely as security for the amount of the balance, or whether the property became absolutely his, and the debt extinguished, and whether the vendor owed the vendee anything, was not necessary to determine. Fleck v. Warner, 25 Kan. 492.

In Duke v. Shackleford, 56 Miss. 552, which was an action of replevin against a subpurchaser, it was said that the vendor may recover a chattel in replevin from the vendee on default of a conditional sale note without offering to refund payments made where the contract reserves the title in the vendor until paid,—distinguishing Ketchum v. Brennan, 53 Miss. 596, which was a suit against a third party, as in that case there had been a tender to the vendee which was not necessary to be kept alive to a subvendee, and the question as to the necessity of a tender was conceded, and the court was misled by Story on Sales, that a vendor cannot recover property on failure of the vendee to perform the condition "until he had made demand of the performance of the condition and rescinded the contract." In order to rescind he must tender back what he has received; but this language only applies to sales on condition subsequent and not where the title does not pass until the performance of the condition.

The vendor was allowed a recovery in replevin against an infant after default, and a counterclaim of the amount paid was not a valid defense where the contract of conditional sale provided that the instalments actually paid were to be regarded as money paid for the use of the machine. Besides, the conditional bill of sale was regarded as an executed contract as to actual payments, and infants cannot recover on such contracts. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Jacobs, 2 Misc. 236.

The vendor was allowed a recovery in trover without requiring a tender of the notes where the contract provided, "said machinery shall be the property of said" vendor until paid for, as the seller was confined in his remedies neither to a repossession of the property or to the notes, but could avail himself of both. In this case the vendor offered to place the notes in the hands of the court and to credit the purchaser with the proceeds of the verdict. Brewer v. Ford, 54 Hun, 116. After a new trial the same question arose on another appeal, but the former decision was held to be res judicata, and the court held that the former adjudication could not be reviewed "though the present majority of the court are committed against it." 59 Hun, 17, Affirmed without opinion, 126 N. Y. 643. See Earle v. Robinson, 91 Hun, 363, supra, I., a.

In Johnston v. Whittemore, 27 Mich. 463, a vendor was allowed a recovery against the vendee in trover for the value of the property only to the extent of the last unpaid instalment, although the contract provided that payments made should be retained as damages on nonperformance of the contract, but this provision was intended to apply only to the contingency of declaring the contract void and retaking the property. It was said that the law would not enforce such a provision as stipulated damages not based upon just compensation. In this case the purchaser gave the organ to his wife and the vendor in a replevin suit had to pay her the full value of the organ to regain it, and then sued the vendee in trover for its full value. In that case there was no showing that the vendors had declared void the agreement or offered to cancel it or to surrender the unpaid notes or had made a demand for the organ except after the judgment in a replevin suit and when plaintiffs had the property, but plaintiffs produced the unpaid note and the agreement on the trial, and before proofs were closed gave them to the court to be surrendered to the defendant, who refused them.

Some cases hold that the pursuit of other remedies by the vendor will not defeat a recovery.

And a recovery was allowed a vendor where the action was detinue notwithstanding he had foreclosed a mortgage given on land, as an additional security which brought him less than the balance of the debt due. The contract stipulated that all payments made before default in the payment of notes should be treated as payment for the use of the machinery and on default of any note the vendor might take possession or might sue on all of the notes and the title should remain in the vendor party's subsequently treating the contract as still in force. Pinckney v. Dambmann, 72 Md. 178; Webb v. Hughes, L. R. 10 Eq. 281; Black v. Woodrow, 39 Md. 194. In these cases of conditional sales, the acceptance by the seller of an instalment of the purchase money, after default, is a recognition of the contract as still subsisting, and a waiver of the forfeiture. Hutchings v. Munger, 41 N. Y. 158; Hurst v. Thompson, 73 Ala. 158. And other acts than acceptance may have the same effect. A party cannot take two inconsistent positions. If he has a right either to rescind a contract on account of a breach by the other party or to continue it in force, and he elects to continue it in force, he thereby abandons the right to rescind, and is bound by the election so made. Bollman v. Burt, 61 Md. 422; Maryland Fertilizing & Mfg. Co. v. Lorentz, 44 Md. 233; Lawrence v. Dale, 3 Johns. Ch. 23. And so a vendor of chattels, where a fraud has been practiced, has a right either to affirm the contract and sue for the price or to rescind it and retake the goods, but he is bound by his first election. Troup v. Appleman, 52 Md. 456. In like manner a cause of forfeiture in a lease may be waived. In 1 Addison on Contracts, *260, it is laid down that "the right of entry for forfeiture of a lease is governed by the general law that where a man has got a right to elect to do a thing, to the injury of another, his election, when once made, is final and conclusive, and he cannot afterwards alter his determination. If, therefore, a lease has been forfeited, and and not become vested until all of said notes were paid. Montgomery Iron Works v. Smith, 98 Ala. 644.

And where the action was in replevin and the vendor reserved the title in himself to secure the payment of notes which were in default although he had indorsed the notes and suit was pending on the same. On a recovery the vendor must apply the money realized from the security to the payment of the debt secured. It was said that the purchaser will be protected by a proper order against double payment, and that if he paid the note it would be a defense even now against the prosecution of the replevin suit. McPherson v. Acme Lumber Co. 70 Miss. 649.

In Aultman v. Mallory, 5 Neb. 178, 25 Am. Rep. 478, it was said that a sale and delivery of goods on condition that the property is not to vest until the purchase money is paid or secured, does not pass the title to the vendee until the condition is performed and on default the vendor has the right to repossess himself of the goods. See also Vaughn v. Hopson, 10 Bush, 337; Coggill v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 3 Gray, 545; Wentworth v. S. A. Woods Mach. Co. 163 Mass. 28; St. Paul Furniture Co. v. Sauer (Minn.) 63 N. W. 110.

In Sanders v. Keber, 28 Ohio St. 630, it was said that the vendor may reclaim the goods when the price has not been paid, or may maintain an action for their conversion against the vendee where the title is not to pass until the purchase money is paid.

In McRae v. Merrifield, 48 Ark. 160, it was said that under a contract of conditional sale reserving title in the vendor until fully paid for, when the condition is broken the seller may elect to reclaim the property or treat the transaction as a sale, and bring an action for the agreed price.

In Hunter v. Warner, 1 Wis. 141, it was said that where the right of possession is in the vendor until the whole price is paid, and the right of possession in the vendee to be taken away upon default, the vendee must make an actual tender unless dispensed with by the vendor, and unless made, the vendee's right of possession is gone.

In Heinbockle v. Zugbaum, 5 Mont. 344, 51 Am. Rep. 59, it was said that if negotiable notes were taken in a conditional sale, and transferred by the vendor for value, he could not recover the goods or the price, but if he has the notes in his possession and they can be delivered up, or canceled upon his recovery of the goods or a judgment for their value, the mere fact that notes were given for the purchase money would not defeat the right of the vendor to recover the goods if the title did not pass. The seller is bound to account for the notes before he can recover the goods or the price.

In Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Heil, 115 Pa. 487, it was said that if a lessor was bound by the terms of a lease with a privilege of purchase, a married woman was not bound by the terms of her contract as lessee, and on default the lessor could recover the chattel.

In Gerow v. Castello, 11 Colo. 560, it was said that the vendor may recover possession on default of payment on a contract for a lease of chattels, providing that on the default the chattels shall be returned to the lessor, and that no agreement of sale is implied, nor shall a sale or purchase be deemed valid without a written receipt from the lessor. This contract was a conditional sale.

In Haak v. Linderman, 64 Pa. 499, 3 Am. Rep. 612, where the contract was a conditional sale, the vendor reserving the title until fully paid but the vendee to have the use from this date, and on default the vendor to have the right to take the property and the vendee to forfeit the amount paid, it was said that no doubt this might be a valid lien or arrangement as between the parties.

The failure to make a demand after default will prevent a recovery in replevin.

And a vendor not having made a demand was refused a recovery in replevin where he claimed a mare obtained by his vendee, in exchange for a horse sold to him by the vendor, "to remain the property of the vendor until the purchase money was paid." The omission to pay the purchase money at maturity would not operate as a forfeiture of his rights under a contract, in the absence of a demand on the part of the seller of payment, or the property for nonpayment of the price. On demand after the purchase money was overdue, the purchaser can retain the property by paying the purchase price. Nattin v. Riley, 54 Ark. 30.

As to demand, see Heath v. Randall, 4 Cush. 198, infra, II., b.

And where neither demand for the money or the property was made, and the time of payment had been extended. Kimball v. Farnum, 61 N. H. 348. See Proctor v. Tilton, 65 N. H. 3, infra, II., b.

And where only a small part of the purchase money was unpaid. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Bothane, 70 Mich. 443; Adams v. Wood, 51 Mich. 411. See Wiggins v. Snow, 89 Mich. 476, supra.

And where he did not refund the money already paid, and the purchaser refused to make further payments because the machine was not such a one as was contracted for. A demand is a condition precedent to an action of replevin. Hamilton v. Singer Mfg. Co. 54 Ill. 370. Distinguished Singer Mfg. Co. v. Treadway, 4 Ill. App. 57, infra, II., a.

See, as to warranty, Haviland v. Johnson, 7 Daly, 297, infra, II., a; Guilford v. McKinley, 61 Ga. 230, infra.

And where the chattel was purchased on condition of payment monthly of a royalty and on default to forfeit the machine, where the purchaser's check was taken after default, which was not paid; as there must be a new demand after the taking of the check. Smith v. Newland, 9 Hun, 553.

there is an election on the part of the landlord to enter and defeat the lease or not, as he pleases, and he by word or act manifests his intention that the lease shall continue, he waives the forfeiture, and cannot afterward annul the lease." Leake, Cont. 3d ed. p. 583, to the same effect. In such cases of a waiver of a forfeiture or of a right to rescind a contract, their is no necessity for a consideration, but the question turns rather upon the principle of election between two inconsistent rights. Bishop, Cont. § 805; Johnston v. Whittemore, 27 Mich. 466; Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Teetzlaff, 53 Wis. 220; Deyoe v. Jamison, 33 Mich. 94.

A case similar in some respects to the case at bar is that of Albert v. Grosvenor Invest. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. 127, where Lord Cockburn said: "This is the case of a mortgage whereby the mortgagor transfers the property in certain goods to the mortgagees, but subject to the mortgagor's right of redemption; and there are certain clauses in the deed, the result of which is, that the mortgagees cannot seize and sell the goods unless the mortgagor makes default in paying the instalments of £2, which he is bound to do on each successive Monday, till the loan is repaid. Now the facts are, that the plaintiff's wife went to Bayne (who must be taken to have had full authority . . .), and told him that her husband had difficulty in meeting the instalment due on the 28th of August, and Bayne extended the time for the payment of that and the next instalment

And where the vendor sold horses on conditional sale and hired the purchaser and was to pay him one half of the value of his labor until the chattels were paid for by the amount unpaid, and on refusal of the vendee to labor, the horses were to be returned and he to "forfeit the balance of cash remaining" with the vendor as collateral security. Notice that work was wanted, given to a carter of the vendee, was not notice to his employer. The vendor might have recovered if the vendee refused without excuse to work, but could not recover if the vendee was not in default. A forfeiture of the vendee's rights to ownership of the horses would not be the result of default but he would only be liable to pay the vendor such damages as he had sustained. Huhn v. Long, 2 Whart. 200.

And where the contract provided that the purchaser did not acquire any title until fully paid, and on default the vendors were at liberty to take away the machine at their option, and any payment which had been made previous to such forfeiture was to be retained as liquidated damages. A notice given to the wife did not dispense with notice and demand on her husband who was the purchaser. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Teetzlaff, 53 Wis. 211.

And where time was not fixed to complete the payment, the purchaser was entitled to a reasonable time before the vendor could demand the goods and replevy them. Adams v. Wood, 51 Mich. 411.

So, in trover the vendor was refused a recovery where he had not made any demand of the vendee before suit, although he had made a demand for the property of the defendant with whom the purchaser had left the same. A demand must be made and reasonable notice given to surrender the property or perfect the title. The contract provided that the chattel was to remain the property of the vendor until paid for, and then it became the property of the purchaser. Davis v. Emery, 11 N. H. 230. See Proctor v. Tilton, 65 N. H. 3, infra, II., b.

A vendor in an executory contract for the sale of chattels providing that the title shall not pass until the agreed price is fully paid, which is payable in instalments, cannot seize the property and terminate the contract for nonpayment until he has demanded payment of the vendee where he permitted him to remain in possession, and make other payments after the whole contract price was due. O'Rourke v. Hadcock, 114 N. Y. 541, infra, II., b.

In Gibbons v. Luke, 37 Hun, 576, it was said that accepting further payments after default rendered ineffectual a previous demand as a rescission of the agreement of sale or to support an action founded upon it. But the breach of the agreement by the removal of the piano to another place justifies the action by the vendor for possession without further demand.

In Ketchum v. Brennan, 53 Miss. 596, it was said that a rescission of a contract of conditional sale was a condition precedent to the vendor's right to sue for the property, and to rescind he must offer to return to his vendee what was paid, where the contract was a conditional sale on instalment, and that the title should remain in the vendor until fully paid for.

In Meagher v. Hollenberg, 9 Lea, 392, an injunction was granted to a purchaser against the prosecution of a replevin suit by the vendor in a lease contract on the ground that although the utter failure of the purchaser to comply with the terms of the contract entitled her to nothing more than her strict legal rights, she acquired by her payments an interest in the piano which the court must recognize. It was further held that being a married woman her contract to turn purchase money upon a future contingency into rent would be executory and not binding. And it was said that some courts have held that in cases of sale and delivery of chattels an agreement to pay for the use was repugnant to the contract, citing Singer Mfg. Co. v. Cole, 4 Lea, 439, 40 Am. Rep. 20, supra, I., c. (But that case holds that a lease contract, is a sale, and the fact that it is called a renting does not make it so; and the purchaser was liable on such contract; refusing to follow Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. v. Anderson, 23 Minn. 57, which it claimed held that an agreement to pay for the use was repugnant to a contract of sale, and void. But the Minnesota case was based on the proposition that there had been a previously absolute sale without condition, and therefore a subsequent receipt embodying a conditional contract was without consideration.)

But some cases refuse the vendor a recovery if he has elected to pursue other remedies, or waived his right.

A recovery of possession was refused where the vendor in a conditional sale, the title to remain in him until paid, had taken a judgment against his vendee on the purchase-money debt. Button v. Trader, 75 Mich. 295.

And where the sale was in the form of a lease and the vendor had foreclosed a real-estate mortgage given as security. The pursuit of one remedy excluded the other. Park & L. Co. v. White River Lumber Co. 101 Cal. 37.

And where the vendor had exercised an option to enforce the payment of the note by taking out an attachment, and afterwards presented his claim against the trustee in insolvency of the purchaser. Crompton v. Beach, 62 Conn. 25, 18 L. R. A. 189.

In Montgomery Iron Works v. Smith, 98 Ala. 644, it was said that if the vendor had sued on the notes, obtained a judgment, and levied an execution and sold the property, he would be held to have abandoned his claim to title and could not maintain an action of detinue.

to the 11th of September. Now, the bill of sale provides that if the mortgagor shall make 'default' in payment of the sum of £62 10s, or any part thereof, the whole amount shall be then immediately due and payable; and it shall be lawful for the mortgagees to take possession of the goods, and to sell and dispose of them. Now 'default' must be taken to mean a nonpayment by the party bound to pay, without the consent of the parties having a right to waive the payment. And I see nothing which goes to show that if, by the consent of the person who is to receive payment, the time for payment is extended, the omission to pay within the time specified must be a 'default' within the meaning of the word in the bill of sale; and it would be monstrous to hold that it was a default, for the mortgagee might always lead the mortgagor into a snare by consenting that the time for payment should be extended, and then coming down upon him by insisting that there had been a default." It is true that this case, so far as the meaning of the word "default" is concerned, was questioned by Lord Justice Bramwell in Williams v. Stern, L. R. 5 Q. B. Div. 412; but the bill of sale before the court in Williams v. Stern gave to the vendee a right to remove the property and sell it in the event of a failure to pay the instalments when due, and such failure made the whole debt due. Unlike the case at bar, it did not provide for an election between a right to declare a forfeiture and a right to continue the contract in force. In Carpenter

And the vendor was refused a recovery in trover, on a contract of conditional sale in the form of a lease, the property to become the vendee's when fully paid for, where the vendor allowed the vendee to retain possession for ten years after full payment without demanding payments of interest or claiming title, as the lapse of time constituted a waiver, on the part of the vendor, of title. Gorham v. Holden, 79 Me. 317.

In an action of replevin by the vendor on a contract of sale providing that the title was to remain in the vendor until paid for, an instruction that "if the plaintiff did not agree to extend the time of payment then the action could not be maintained until that time had expired and their verdict must be for the defendant," was erroneous in the case presented by the record, where the right of possession was in the vendor and it was claimed that a guaranty was made on the note in consideration of an extension of time. The true question was whether the plaintiff had made a valid agreement to forego his right of possession. Bunker v. McKenney, 63 Me. 529.

In Johnston v. Whittemore, 27 Mich. 463, it was said that if the vendors, in bringing an action for conversion against the vendee, had proceeded upon the ground of declaring the sale void, they could not recover on failure to show that they had taken the necessary steps to rescind and place the defendant in statu quo. And could not declare the contract void and take the property on that ground except for default in some of the conditions.

In Knox v. Perkins, 15 Gray, 529, the question whether the failure to take immediate possession of a building was evidence of a waiver, was not decided because the condition applied by its terms to each and every failure of payment.

A recovery in replevin was refused in favor of a party advancing money for the purchase of personal property under a parol reservation of property, where the vendor gave a written bill of sale without any reservation of title. Ferguson v. Hetherington, 39 Ark. 438.

And the lessor was refused a recovery against the trustee in bankruptcy of chattels hired, the hirer having for a certain time the option of purchase, the sums paid for hire to be taken as part of the price, where the custom of hiring was not sufficiently established. Re Hill, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 503, note. See Ex parte Powell, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 501, infra, II., b.; Crawcour v. Salter, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 30.

And the vendor was refused a recovery in replevin of a sewing machine where he was in possession of the most valuable part of the machine before he made the affidavit, and delivered such part to the vendee after the affidavit was made and served, as Wis. Rev. Stat. § 3733, provided that before a warrant shall be issued an affidavit must be filed that the plaintiff is then lawfully entitled to the possession. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Teetzlaff, 53 Wis. 211.

In replevin by the vendor, the purchaser recovered a judgment where the sale was oral and absolute on instalment, although two days after the sale the purchaser was prevailed upon to execute a written lease to the vendor for the same, payable monthly, and the property to be returned on demand, as the two contracts were repugnant and the lease void and without consideration. Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. v. Anderson, 23 Minn. 57. See Meagher v. Hollenberg, 9 Lea, 392, supra.

In an action of detinue brought by a vendor against the vendee, where the property was to be paid for in monthly instalments and the contract provided that if any payment was not made promptly the purchaser forfeited all former payments and bound himself "to give into his possession the mill with all the additions thereof in good running order, and all obtained from him," the vendor could not recover oxen, carts, and wagon as they were not additions to the mill. Hill v. Townsend, 69 Ala. 286.

The purchaser in a conditional sale may defend a replevin suit brought by the vendor, by showing that owing to the defects in the article more than its value had been paid and thus the title became fixed in the purchaser. Guilford v. McKinley, 61 Ga. 230.

As to breach of warranty, see Haviland v. Johnson, 7 Daly, 297, infra, II., a.; Hamilton v. Singer Mfg. Co. 54 Ill. 370, supra.

In Smith v. Newland, 9 Hun, 553, it was said that it is not clear that the proffer to pay the amount due, sent by a postal order, before an action of replevin was brought, should not bar the action where time was not of the essence of the contract.

e. To assert vendor's liens.

The vendor may enforce his lien against the property to secure the purchase money, where he has not waived his right, and treats the property only as a security, and attempts to exercise no control over it by assertion of title.

The vendor was allowed a mechanic's lien against the vendee, where machinery was sold on a contract that the title, ownership, and right of possession should remain in the vendor until the cash was paid, when the same should vest in the purchaser, and the same was attached to realty. The vendor having treated the title as vested in the purchaser by its annexation to the realty, the purchaser could not claim that the property had not become a fixture. Cooper v. Cleghorn, 50 Wis. 113.

In a suit to recover the purchase price of an electric-light plant and to foreclose a vendor's lien, under a contract providing that the title remained in the vendor until paid for, the plaintiff was entitled to a lien on the plant. Such reservation of

v. Blandford, 8 Barn. & C. 575, there was a waiver of a default in payment which was held to be binding. It appeared in this case that the defendant had agreed to sell to the plaintiff certain property at an appraisement to be made by appraisers to be appointed by the respective parties. The price was to be paid on or before March 25, and the buyer deposited a sum to be forfeited if he did not complete the agreement. The appraisers met on March 25, when plaintiff's appraiser said that he could not finish the work till the next day. No objection was then made, but on the next day the defendant refused to proceed. In deciding the question of his right to do so, Bayley, J., said: "The defendant in this case insists on a forfeiture, which is strictissimi juris. He ought, therefore, to show that he has done everything which he was bound to do to entitle him to insist on the forfeiture, and that he has not done anything to waive that right. . . . It was the duty of the defendant's agent to inform his principal that such a communication had been made by the plaintiff's agent; and it must be presumed that he did so. If that communication was made, and the defendant meant to insist on the forfeiture, it was his duty to inform the plaintiff that he should insist on the forfeiture unless the contract was completed on that day." The principles are conclusive of the present case. The failure of the appellant to pay the title was a mortgage under Tex. Civ. Stat. art. 3190*a*, and on a recovery the plaintiff would be entitled to a foreclosure. A. J. Anderson Electric Co. v. Cleburne Water, L. & L. Co. (Tex.) (1894) 27 S. W. 504.

In Tufts v. Stone, 70 Miss. 54, it was said that a vendor in a conditional sale could resort to the property as security only so far as might be necessary to satisfy the balance due.

But in Campbell Printing Press & Mfg. Co. v. Walker, 43 Hun, 449, the vendor was refused a recovery in a suit against the assignee for creditors of the vendee to foreclose all equities and to procure a sale under the order of the court, where he had previously taken the chattels from the assignee after default of a contract of conditional sale, and then brought an action of replevin and obtained judgment.

II. Right of purchaser.

a. To recover payments where the vendor took the property from his possession.

There appears to be some conflict of authority as to the purchaser's right to recover purchase money from the vendor where he has resumed possession. The cases affirming that right do so on the ground that there was no contract or forfeiture of money on the part of the purchaser, and some hold that there was a rescission, and some that there was a failure on the part of the vendor. The cases refusing the right to recover do so on the ground that the contract did not provide for such forfeiture. Some hold that the purchaser's right was forfeited by the contract.

The purchaser was allowed a recovery of an equitable proportion of money paid on a conditional sale, where the vendor had retaken the goods by replevin on default and terminated the contract of sale, and in the replevin suit the vendee reserved the right to claim an equitable proportion of the purchase money. The contract was in the form of a bailment for hire, the payments to be for the use, and on default the bailor to have the right of possession. (The contract as appearing in the case does not give the right of purchase or forfeiture, and was held to be a conditional sale.) Simon v. Edmondson, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 315.

And where the vendor resumed possession and resold to this plaintiff and then rescinded by retaking, and sold the property. In order for the buyer to recover for money paid by the previous purchaser she would have to account for hire and damages on the part of such purchaser. Snook v. Raglan, 89 Ga. 251.

And where there was no stipulation for the forfeiture of payments the vendor must return such payments exceeding the value of the proper use of the property. The contract was payable in instalments for the use of a piano, and on default of payment the piano to be returned, and on payment of the note given for the use a bill of sale was to be given and the title to then pass to the lessee. This was a conditional sale and not a lease. Hays v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 9 L. R. A. 373.

And where the vendor resumed possession and executed a note to the vendee for the difference between the instalments already paid and the use of a piano, sold on a contract of conditional sale which did not provide for forfeiture of money paid. The note provided that it might be used in the purchase of another piano, but this was at the option of the vendee. Preston v. Whitney, 23 Mich. 260, Distinguished in Thirlby v. Rainbow, 93 Mich. 164, supra L., d.

In Preston v. Whitney, supra, the contract was, A agrees to sell one pianoforte to B, the said B to pay so much cash and the value in monthly instalments. The pianoforte to remain the property of A until full payment. In case of default A shall be entitled to the possession and said agreement to sell shall become void.

A forfeiture of the payments made by the purchaser cannot be declared on retaking an article for default of further payment under a so-called lease which is in fact a conditional sale with retention of title as security, but the purchaser is entitled to pay the sum due or to have the article sold and the surplus paid to him after the debt and expenses of sale are discharged. A. D. Puffer & Sons' Mfg. Co. v. Lucas, 112 N. C. 377, 19 L. R. A. 682.

A. D. Puffer & Sons' Mfg. Co. v. Lucas, supra, distinguishes the case of A. D. Puffer & Sons' Mfg. Co. v. Baker, 104 N. C. 148, supra, L., c, which was a suit on a rent note holding that case may be further construed as meaning that upon failure to make any payment as it becomes due the vendor can resume possession of the property without any equitable right in the vendee to call for an account and the sale of the property. If that was intended the decision was not approved, distinguishing the case of Foreman v. Drake, 98 N. C. 311, where the contest was with a third party, as in the Foreman Case the lessor had an option and the title did not pass as in the present case ipso facto upon the performance of the conditions, i. e., on payment of the last instalment of rent.

In Hill v. Townsend, 69 Ala. 286, in an action of detinue by the vendor, it was held that a forfeiture by which a vendee loses the benefit of the payments he had made upon the contract in the purchase of property and all interest in the property, is not favored at law, and to obtain a forfeiture upon failure to pay an instalment, it must be provided for by the contract.

In a replevin suit brought by the vendor without a demand the purchaser was allowed a judgment for the value of her interests in the chattel, as, until the contract was forfeited by a proper demand, the purchaser had the right to hold the chattel bought on conditional sale and also an interest in the chattel which if defeasible was good till defeated and she could waive a return and take a judgment for the value which was the amount instalments when due was a default which did not render the contract void, or cause the entire purchase money to become due, but the contract was thereby made voidable at the option of the appellee. It was then necessary for the appellee to elect whether he would avoid the contract, retake the goods, and declare a forfeiture of the instalments already paid, or whether he would continue it in force and become entitled to the future payments. He made his election to continue the contract in force by his notification to the appellant, who had a right to rely upon it, and, having thus waived the forfeiture on account of this particular default, it follows that he could not subsequently insist upon it.

Judgment reversed, and new trial awarded, with costs in both courts.

paid, there being no showing of any depreciation in the article. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Bothane, 70 Mich. 443. See Thirlby v. Rainbow, 93 Mich. 164, supra, I., d.

In Howe Mach. Co. v. Willie, 85 Ill. 333, a purchaser recovered the amount paid for a machine which the vendor took back, where the contract in the form of a lease was in fact an absolute sale payable in instalments, and the instalments were unpaid because the machine was not the one purchased and did not give satisfaction, and the vendor, without offering another machine as he had agreed to do, replevied the old one because of a breach in the contract.

In Ryan v. Wayson (Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 916, it was said that if a purchaser under a contract of conditional sale had the right to treat the contract as rescinded by a suit of the vendor in replevin, the purchaser would have no interest in the property, and at most might have a personal claim for the amount paid.

In Ross-Meehan B. S. Foundry Co. v. Pascagoula Ice Co. 72 Miss. 608, it was said that the reservation of title is but a security for the purchase price, and if the property is recovered by the seller he must deal with it as security and with reference to the equitable rights of the purchaser.

But some cases hold that the purchaser cannot recover the amount paid from the vendor on his retaking the property, and this on the ground that there was no agreement of forfeiture by the vendor, nor was there an agreement by the purchaser to forfeit payments.

A purchaser could not recover the amount paid on a conditional sale where on default of the first note it was agreed that the piano purchased and the notes therefor should be respectively surrendered, which was done, the last note providing that upon the payment of this and all prior notes given for the use of said piano it should become the property of the maker of this note. This was a sale and not a lease, and there was no agreement to refund the payments already made. If a recovery could be had the purchaser would have to pay the damages sustained for failure to perform her part of the agreement which would be the value of the use and depreciation of the piano. It was said that, in a suit by the purchaser to recover payments made, if the purchaser had refused to cancel the agreement and the vendor had taken the property, the question might have arisen as to the consequence of a rescission. Latham v. Sumner, 89 Ill. 233, 31 Am. Rep. 79.

In an action of replevin by a vendor on a conditional sale on default, the purchaser was not entitled to a rescission of the contract, or to a recovery of the amount paid, or to a delivery to him of the unpaid notes, or a lien on the property for the amount paid by him, where the contract provided that until all the notes were paid the title should remain in the vendor, and on default he should have a right to retake possession. The contract did not provide for a rescission, or that the taking of possession should be a rescission or work a forfeiture of the amount paid. Tufts v. D'Arcambal, 85 Mich. 185, 12 L. R. A. 446.

In Tufts v. D'Arcambal, supra, the contract was an order to forward a soda-water apparatus, and provided that the title does not pass to B, and until all said notes are paid the title shall remain in A, who shall have the right, in case of nonpayment at maturity of either of said notes, without process of law to enter and take immediate possession of the said property wherever it may be and remove the same.

The purchaser cannot recover from the vendor for money paid on a conditional sale, on the vendor taking possession, where the contract was in the form of a lease, providing that the right of property shall remain in the vendor until fully paid, and the lessors may take possession on default, and the money paid on account shall be for the use and wear of the property. White v. Oakes, 88 Me. 367, 32 L. R. A. —.

And where the vendor had replevied the machine under a contract in the form of a lease payable monthly, and on full payment the vendor was to convey by bill of sale, but until then was to retain the title, and on default of payments the previous payments were to be forfeited, and the machine restored to the vendor. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Treadway, 4 Ill. App. 57, distinguishing Hamilton v. Singer Mfg. Co. 54 Ill. 370, supra, I., d., as in those cases the vendor was in fault on account of the kind of machines.

And where the purchaser did not show either that he had offered to perform his part in full, or that the vendor had put it out of his power to deliver the chattel upon receiving full payment. The contract was an agreement to sell chattels, the title to remain in the vendor notwithstanding their delivery. Humeston v. Cherry, 23 Hun, 141.

In Haynes v. Hart, 42 Barb. 59, it was said that "no case can be found where a purchaser has been allowed to recover back partial payments . . . when the vendor has merely kept the property agreed to be sold, or sold it to another, in consequence of such default. In order to entitle a purchaser to recover under such circumstances he must show that the other party has been guilty of some breach on his part, or of some act in hostility to the contract."

The purchaser was refused a recovery for the amount paid on a machine, taken from her by the vendors on default, where she claimed that the machine did not comply with the warranty. The contract wholly abnegated her right to claim a recovery for moneys paid either as purchase money or as rent. The contract was in the form of a lease providing that on default the vendors were authorized to enter wherever the machine may be, and retake the same, the purchaser waiving "my rights" and agreeing not to commence any action for damages done to person or property in the recovery of the machine. The vendors agreeing to sell on the payment of $75. The payments were receipted: "On account of lease the conditions of which are monthly payments of $5 or forfeiture of the machine." No proof was offered establishing any rate of damages for inferior condition of the machine. Haviland v. Johnson, 7 Daly, 297.

A purchaser cannot maintain an action upon a warranty where there has been a default in the contract of conditional sale and the chattels have been taken from the possession of the purchaser by the vendor. English v. Hanford, 75 Hun, 428.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

SEANOR & BIERER, Appts.,
v.
Samuel McLAUGHLIN.

(165 Pa. 150.)

A seller of a chattel by conditional sale reserving the power to take possession upon default, who also receives a judgment bond as collateral security, cannot enforce such bond after he has rescinded the sale by taking possession of the chattel.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for West-

As to remedy on breach of warranty, see Guilford v. McKinley, 61 Ga. 230, supra, I., d.

As to defective machine, see Howe Mach. Co. v. Willie, 85 Ill. 333, supra.

b. To recover the property, or its value, or in trespass.

The purchaser cannot recover from the vendor the property, or its value, or for trespass in seizing the property, where the vendor has proceeded under the contract giving him the right of possession on default, if the vendor has not waived the conditions, or if time was not of the essence of the contract, or unless the vendor has failed to make a proper demand. A recovery was allowed where the vendor had seized part of the property sufficient to pay the balance and then made another seizure.

The purchaser at a conditional sale, after the property was taken by the vendor on default, was refused a recovery in trespass where the action was against the servant of the vendor and proper demand had been made of the purchaser for the balance. As to whether the purchaser had an equitable right was said not to be the matter in dispute. West v. Bolton, 4 Vt. 558.

And where on default a renewal note was given which also defaulted, and the resumption of possession was a reasonable exercise of the right of rescission. But it was said that if it was not, the only interest the purchaser had was the amount which he had paid, and no more than that could have been recovered. Levan v. Wilten, 135 Pa. 61.

And where the vendor searched the purchaser's house against her objections after having been let in, and the contract provided that on default the vendor could take possession wherever the same might be found, and for retaking such possession should not be subject to any proceeding, civil or criminal. Walsh v. Taylor, 39 Md. 598.

And where the purchaser on instalment under a contract as a lease delivered the attachments of the machine to the agent, and permitted him to take the machine away. Jenks v. Howe Sewing Mach. Co. 34 La. Ann. 1241.

A purchaser was refused a recovery of damages for unlawful taking and conversion of property held on conditional sale, where the purchaser had defaulted by failing to insure and the vendor had taken possession under the contract. Palmer v. Kelly, 56 N. Y. 637.

And where the purchaser was in default, and the contract provided that the title, ownership, and possession should not pass until the note was paid, although this was qualified by the provision that the vendor deeming himself secure might take possession before maturity. McClelland v. Nichols, 24 Me. 176.

A purchaser was refused a recovery of the possession and damages for loss of the use of a machine taken from her by an agent of the lessor under a sewing machine lease, giving the privilege to purchase by paying the full amount of rent, reserving to the lessor all property and the right to seize it on default. Smith v. Lozo, 42 Mich. 6.

And the trustee of an insolvent or bankrupt was not entitled to the possession of chattels where the contract provided that the title remained in the lessor and the lessor might retake possession on default, and any payments made were to be forfeited, and on full payment the title to vest in the lessee, and after the furniture was delivered the lessee filed a liquidation petition and the trustee took possession of the furniture and the lessor thereupon seized the same. Ex parte Crawcour, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 419.

And where under a similar contract on default of one payment the lessor took possession and the lessees also assigned to him all their property which constituted the act of bankruptcy. Judicial notice was taken that hotel keepers hold their furniture on hire. Crawcour v. Salter, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 30. See Re Hill, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 503, note, supra, I., d.

And where the lessor took possession under a similar contract, judicial notice was not taken of custom in hiring, but, the evidence of the custom being uncontradicted, and the trustees in bankruptcy refusing to go to the expense of a jury on the question, it was held sufficient. Ex parte Powell, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 501.

And the assignee for creditors of the vendee was refused a recovery in conversion against the vendor, where after the purchaser had made an assignment the vendor had taken possession of property under a contract providing that the title was to remain in the vendor until paid for, and this applied to goods furnished on the same terms after the expiration of the contract. Dutton v. Gale Mfg. Co. 43 Hun, 198.

The purchaser cannot recover the value of the goods taken by the vendor on default, if the vendor has also attempted to collect the purchase price, where such election by the vendor does not amount to a waiver of his rights.

The vendee's assignee for creditors could not recover in conversion from the vendor the value of the chattels taken back by the vendor on default under a contract of conditional sale the title to remain in the vendor until full payment, where there was demand of payment and the forfeiture of the purchaser's rights had not been waived. The exercise of the right of possession extinguished the right of the vendee. A tender of sufficient amount before request of vendor would have been good. Sparling v. Divine, 12 N. Y. Week. Dig. 327.

And where the vendor took the chattels from the purchaser with his consent on a default before the assignment, and the vendor had also proved the amount unpaid and received a dividend from the assignee. A proof of all the notes against the estate was not a waiver of the conditions because the vendor was entitled to the whole price agreed on. Knox v. Perkins, 15 Gray, 529.

A recovery was refused in a suit of trover and trespass against a vendor in a conditional sale where he attached the chattel in a suit on the notes, took a nonsuit, and held the chattel by virtue of the contract, as he did not by such suit waive his right to hold the property and was not estopped. The suit was a sufficient demand. The acceptance of payments on a note after possession taken and default of note did not waive the forfeiture. Matthews v. Lucia, 55 Vt. 308.

And where the purchaser was in default and while suit was pending for the debt he returned moreland County permitting defendant to open a judgment which had been entered against him upon a judgment bond, and allowing him to make a defense to the action. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williams, Sloan, & Griffith, for appellants:

There is not a word or syllable in the writings to suggest an inference even that the remedies provided are not cumulative.

The parties to it knew that the term of hiring would practically exhaust the life of the machines in the arduous use for which they were leased.

It is a legal presumption that every person knows the law when he knows the facts; yet this presumption, though arbitrary and in most cases untrue in fact, is founded upon principles of public policy, for without some settled rule which imposes upon every person the duty of well considering and understanding the consequences of his own acts and contracts, there would be no limits to the excuse of ignorance and no security in any agreement.

1 Wait, Act. & Def. ed. 1885, 84.

It is a legal presumption, therefore, that every man who makes a contract makes it advisedly and with knowledge of its legal incidences and consequences.

the chattel to the vendor against his objection and after the judgment for the price the purchaser demanded the chattel but was still in default. The vendor might pursue both the debt and the pledge until he obtained security. Root v. Lord, 23 Vt. 568.

The purchaser could not maintain replevin where the vendor had retaken the property after default under a contract in the form of a lease. The mere lapse of time after default, or accepting part payment before retaking possession, was not a waiver of title and right to possession. Quinn v. Parke & L. Mach. Co. 5 Wash. 276.

Some cases hold that a demand for the property is unnecessary.

The purchaser could not recover in an action of trespass where the vendor broke and entered the plaintiff's close and took away cattle held under a conditional sale, the title to remain in the vendor until paid for, and the vendor having the right to take them away at any time. No demand was made in this case for the oxen, and the vendor had a license to enter and take them away at any time before the whole of the price was paid. Heath v. Randall, 4 Cush. 198. See Nattin v. Riley, 54 Ark. 30 supra, I., d, and cases following.

And where a deputy sheriff acting for the vendor in a replevin suit took possession of a horse sold under a contract, to remain the property of the vendor until paid for, and demand of payment after default was made. Demand of the property was unnecessary as default terminated the vendee's rights, and that the officer seized the horse outside of his county made no difference as the taking could be justified under the contract. Proctor v. Tilton, 65 N. H. 3, Distinguishing Davis v. Emery, 11 N. H. 230, supra, I., d, as to demand of the property being necessary, as in that case the vendee had an election to buy, and in Kimball v. Farnum, 61 N. H. 348, supra, I., d, where the vendor sold his interest to another party who sued in replevin, a demand was necessary because the time had been extended with the understanding that the vendee might pay when he could.

And the lessee was refused a recovery in trespass where the lessor took the property back under a contract, although the evidence showed that after obtaining an entrance he had used a subterfuge to obtain possession and the lessee objected but was in default and no violence was used. As to a demand the act of taking the piano was a demand, and demand had previously been made for the money which has never been paid. It was said that if an entrance was obtained by the use of a falsehood in order to regain possession, to which the lessor was entitled, the lessee could not recover damages. North v. Williams, 120 Pa. 109.

If time is of the essence of the contract, or the contract is not executed by the purchaser, he cannot recover.

A vendee in a contract of conditional sale for the purchase of a stallion was refused a recovery against another party who had obtained possession by advancing the money to make a last payment, and who gave the purchaser an option to repurchase within three months upon the payment of said sum, as time was of the essence of the contract. Roberts v. Norton, 66 Conn. 1.

In Summerson v. Hicks, 134 Pa. 566, the purchaser was refused a recovery in replevin where the vendor resumed possession and immediately the purchaser tendered the balance but did not keep his tender good and time was of the essence of the contract, under a conditional sale in the form of a lease, the ownership to remain in lessor until payment in full.

But leave was given on reversing the case for the plaintiff in replevin to make his tender good; this entitled him to judgment. The defendant was entitled to his costs due at the time of tender into court, and cost of reversal. Id. 142 Pa. 344.

The purchaser was refused a recovery in replevin where he was in default in not executing a note of $80 and the contract provided that such note must be executed before the vendee was entitled to possession, and a note of $8 was executed by mistake, and a new note not tendered. Litterel v. St. John, 4 Blackf. 326.

In Sage v. Sleutz, 23 Ohio St. 1, it was said that the purchaser under a contract of conditional sale had no title to the property, where the vendor had taken the property back under a contract in form of a lease.

But a tender by the purchaser of the amount due after default may sometimes enable him to recover.

The purchaser was allowed a recovery in replevin where he had tendered the balance due and demanded the chattel after the vendor had retaken the same, where time was not of the essence of the contract, not on condition that the purchaser pay the note when it became payable, but "with the condition that said cow was to remain the property of said B (vendor) till said note was paid." The omission to pay the note at maturity would not operate as a forfeiture of his rights in the absence of a demand of payment, or of the property, and on such demand after the note was overdue, the purchaser would have the right to pay the note and retain the property. Taylor v. Finley, 48 Vt. 78.

And where the contract was in the form of a lease and there was no agreement that upon default the vendor should have the property and money already paid. If the contract was rescinded the purchaser was entitled to recover the money paid. If the contract was not rescinded the purchaser was entitled to possession upon the payment of the amount due. Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 402, 89 Am. Dec. 124.

A purchaser was allowed a recovery in trespass against the assignee of a purchase-money note who had taken possession under a contract providing if default should be made on any of the notes the purchaser's right to use or possess the chattels should cease, and the vendor might take and retain possession thereof where the purchaser remained in possession after default, and in consideration of a payment then made time was given to pay the balance, and the assignee of the vendor proceeded to advertise and sell the property under a contract, and before the sale the vendee tendered more than the balance due. The assent to the delay was a waiver of forfeiture and the purchaser's right to acquire title by paying the remainder continued until request was made for the balance. Hutchings v. Munger, 41 N. Y. 155.

And the purchaser may recover when the seizure is unwarranted, or if the vendor has elected to treat the sale as absolute, or has not complied with the statute.

A judgment was rendered against the vendor the plaintiff in replevin where the contract of sale of boat A and mules retained the title in the boat to the vendor until paid for and the vendor secured payment by a chattel mortgage upon boat B, and after default took possession of the mules and advertised them and boat A for sale, and advertised boat B for sale under the chattel mortgage, and then seized both boats in this suit of replevin and sold them under the advertisements. The mules being worth more than the balance due, the purchaser was allowed a judgment for the surplus and for the value of the detention of the two boats. O'Rourke v. Hadcock, 114 N. Y. 541, supra, I., d.

The purchaser was allowed to recover in tort for conversion by the vendor where the contract was in the form of a lease providing on default that the purchaser's right to the goods ceased, and no title vested in him until the conditions were performed, and on default the vendor brought an action for rent and attached property by trustee process and the vendor then took possession of the goods and prosecuted his action to judgment and collected a small sum of money. The election to treat the transaction as a sale before taking the goods rendered the vendor liable. Bailey v. Hervey, 135 Mass. 172.

A verdict of $750 was allowed to stand against the vendor for entering the vendee's house in his absence and taking away a set of furniture, notwithstanding the protest of the relatives present, where the contract of conditional sale allowed the vendor to retake possession on default, but did not authorize an entry in the vendee's house in his absence, without his consent, or without notice, to carry off its contents. Van Wren v. Flynn, 34 La. Ann. 1158.

In an action by the wife of a lessor of an apartment against a vendor, for an assault in entering the apartment against her will to take away the property in the possession of a tenant, under a conditional sale contract, providing that the vendor on default might enter the premises and take possession without being liable to trespass, it was held that the party in charge of the premises had a right to resist the entrance after requesting him to wait a short time until she could see the tenant. On the 2d of September, 1889, the plaintiffs put in defendant's possession a traction engine and thresher, he to use the same with care and keep in good order. The contract was one of hiring or bailment. As the parties evidently intended the event should be an absolute purchase, for security the vendors retained the title until final payment of the hire. The sum of the hire was the price of the machine,—$1,700,—to be paid as follows: On delivery, $750; on the 1st of January, 1890, $316.67, with interest; and a like sum on the 1st of January, 1891, and 1892, with interest. As collateral, "to secure the payment of said

V. Statutory provisions as to rights and remedies.

In some of the states the rights of the vendor and vendee in conditional sales are controlled by the statutes, which must be strictly followed.

The purchaser was allowed a recovery in conversion, where the vendor took possession of chattels under a contract in the form of a lease, providing on full payment for the use that the lessor would sell by bill of sale, and that the lessor might resume possession on default, and the vendor did not comply with the requirements of Mass. Stat. 1884, chap. 313, providing that a statement must be given to the vendee of the balance due on taking possession by the vendor; and the vendee may redeem within fifteen days thereafter. Whether the provisions of the statutes could be waived was not decided. Lee v. Gorham, 165 Mass. 130.

And the vendee recovered in trover from the vendor where in a few days after default, in the absence of the vendee, the vendor took possession of the chattel sold on conditional sale, and kept the same about six weeks and resold the same at private sale, as the vendor must comply with Vt. act. No. 93, Act. 1884, § 5, providing that the vendor may retake possession after thirty days from default and sell at public auction, giving the vendee ten days previous to the sale to redeem. Smith v. Wood, 63 Vt. 534; Roberts v. Hunt, 61 Vt. 612.

In a suit by a purchaser under Ohio act May 4, 1885, to recover from the vendor the money paid after retaking the machine, it was no defense that at the time of a contract of conditional sale the vendor took a chattel mortgage, as no makeshift should be allowed to avoid the statute. There would have been no trouble if the vendor had brought an action of replevin. Caldwell v. Singer Mfg. Co. 7 Ohio, C. C. 460.

Ohio Laws, 238 (May 4, 1885), providing that the vendor shall be guilty of a misdemeanor on retaking the chattel sold on conditional sale, without refunding the sum paid after deducting a reasonable use not to exceed 50 per cent, is not unconstitutional in impairing the obligation of contracts, or transferring property against the owner's consent, or depriving a party of his remedy by due course of law, or an attempt by penal enactment to assist in the collection of a debt; and is not invalid because no method is provided for determining the amount of compensation. Weil v. State, 46 Ohio St. 450.

In French v. Osmer, 67 Vt. 427, it was said that Vt. act 1884, in regard to conditional sales, providing that after thirty days from the time of condition broken the vendor may cause the property to be taken and sold at public auction by a public officer, does not alter the title of the vendor or make him a mere security holder. If the vendor wishes to sell he must proceed according to the statutes.

The purchaser of a chattel was allowed a recovery of the purchase money paid under a lease where the vendor had taken the property in replevin and had not complied with Tenn. act 1889, chap. 81, providing that the vendor having regained possession on default shall within ten days advertise the property for sale and with the proceeds satisfy his claim and expenses, and pay the remainder to the purchaser unless such sale is waived by the purchaser and seller. The vendor was not allowed to set off the value of the use of the machine for, from the nature of the contract and as matter of law, the vendee was entitled to use the machine as her own property. Cowan v. Singer Mfg. Co. 92 Tenn. 376.

But under this statute the purchaser could not recover until after ten days from the determination of a replevin suit where the right to the possession was contested. The act was intended to apply where there was no contest. Liegerman v. Pucket, 94 Tenn. 273.

The purchaser was refused a recovery in trespass where the purchaser on instalment under a contract as a lease delivered the attachments of the machine to the agent and permitted him to take the machine away, as La. act, 62 Ex. Sess. 1877, providing that such contracts shall be considered as contracts of sale and enforceable only by exercise of the vendor's privilege, and forbidding under penalties the enforcement of an agreement that the vendor might retake the property without judicial process, did not apply in such a case. Jenks v. Howe Sewing Mach. Co. 34 La. Ann. 1241.

The vendor was allowed a recovery of possession as against the purchaser, where the contract of sale was an oral agreement, as N. C. Code, § 1275, providing that all conditional sales of personal property in which the title is retained by the bargain or shall be reduced to writing and registered, was only intended to apply to third parties. Butts v. Screws, 95 N. C. 215.

But the vendor was refused a recovery on purchase-money notes, where he had taken the property back and resold the same, and the contract was in the form of notes which were unconditional, and a deed which was conditional and void under Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 111, § 5, providing that no agreement that personal property sold to another for which the note is given shall remain the property of the payee until the note is paid, is valid unless it is made and signed as a part of the note, and the purchaser was entitled to a credit upon the rental," the defendant executed and delivered to plaintiffs a judgment bond of same date, in the penal sum of $1,900, conditioned for the payment of the three instalments, with interest, and further stated: "This bond is given as collateral to secure the rentals for certain machines leased by obligor from obligees." The first payment of $750 was made, and the defendant took possession of the machine, and used it in threshing the crop of 1889. Some time before the 1st of January, 1890, the defendant informed Seanor, one of the plaintiffs, that he would be unable to pay the first instalment of $316.67. On that day, Seanor called on defendant, and demanded payment, who again told him he was not able to pay, and that Seanor should take the machine away. Seanor then examined it, and the same evening arranged to have it removed. Defendant demanded his bond, or a receipt for it, before the machine was taken away; but Seanor refused to give either, and, early on the morning of the 3d of January, removed it. After taking the machine, on the same day, plaintiffs confessed judgment on the bond, and issued execution for the first instalment. On petition and affidavit of defendant, the court opened the judgment, and awarded an issue. At the trial the facts were, in substance, as we have stated them. The court below was of the notes for the surplus from the proceeds of the sale above the amount of the notes. The inference from the evidence in this case is that the vendor should retake the property and account for its value. Holt v. Knowlton, 86 Me. 456.

VI. Waiver.

In COLE v. HINES after default of payment of an instalment for the purchase price of a chattel, as shown by a rent note, the contract was voidable at the election of the vendor and the extension of the time of payment after such default prevented the vendor from seeking the goods during such extension. The contract in this case provided that the vendor "reserves the right to give more time than that agreed upon, if it suits his views, without violating this contract by such extension of time." But this clause was not passed upon by the court.

The same was held in Kimball v. Farnum, 61 N. H. 348, where time was extended and no demand was made for the money or for the property.

A forfeiture in a contract of sale of personal property to be paid for in instalments is waived by the seller after a default making a new contract with the original purchaser, and others, and receiving payments of the instalments then due, but one waiver is not evidence of another subsequent one. Hill v. Townsend, 69 Ala. 286.

In Taylor v. Finley, 48 Vt. 78, it was said that if the contract was such that a single omission to pay the note at maturity would entitle the seller to treat the contract as forfeited, other questions might arise as to the receipt of partial payments operating as a waiver of prior forfeitures arising from default. The party entitled to forfeiture loses it by not electing in time to take the benefit of it.

In Aultman v. Mallory, 5 Neb. 178, 25 Am. Rep. 478, it was said that if the vendor delivers property to the vendee conditionally, and afterwards waives his right to the title, he cannot afterwards maintain an action of replevin to recover possession.

Electing to take an order of sale is not a waiver of right to recover in the same suit in replevin. Keitt v. Counts, 15 S. C. 493, supra, I., d.

opinion that—(1) The rights of the parties were to be determined by the written contract between them, the lease, and the bond; (2) that, on default of payment of any instalment, plaintiffs could enter judgment and collect by execution, or rescind the contract and repossess themselves of the machine, but could not adopt both remedies; (3) that the undisputed evidence showed a rescission of the contract, and thereafter defendant was no longer answerable on the bond. Therefore a verdict was directed for defendant. From the judgment entered, plaintiffs press this appeal.

The merit of the assignments of error depends solely on whether the construction given by the learned judge of the court below to the written contract, as set out in the lease and bond, was right. The contract was to pass the possession of the machine to the defendant, and to make secure the payment of its value to the plaintiffs. Its value, as fixed by both parties, was $1,700. It is fair to presume the plaintiffs intended by the contract to get this sum once, and that defendant did not intend to pay it, or any part of it, twice. Parties may, in contracting, provide penalties for nonperformance, but, unless they do so in unmistakable language, courts will not insert them. In the lease, after specifying the three instalments and their dates of payment, the defendant immediately said: "And, as collateral to secure the payment of said rentals, I have executed and delivered . . . my judgment bond, of even date herewith." Then almost the last words of the bond are: "This bond is given as collateral to secure the rentals." The principal obligation by the contract was to pay, for the machine, $316.67, with interest, on the 1st of January of the three following years; and "if default be made in said payments, . . . they, said Seanor & Bierer, or their agent, may resume actual possession of the same; and I hereby further authorize and empower the said Seanor & Bierer . . . to enter the premises wherever said machines may be, and take and carry them away." This was primarily the obligation to pay, and the remedy to enforce payment. Plaintiffs retained title to the chattel, with the right to resume possession in default of payment of the hire. Then the judgment bond is given, in express terms, as a security collateral to the performance of this principal obligation. There is no technical legal definition of the word "collateral," distinct from its common signification. It is an additional security for the performance of the principal obligation, and, on the discharge of the latter, it is to be surrendered. Therefore, the plaintiffs had two distinct remedies, either of which they might adopt to enforce their right. They parted with the possession of the machine at the price of $1,700; $750 of this to be paid in hand, which they received. They still retain title, with the right to resume possession on default in either payment of $316.67. But, the subject of the contract being a movable chattel, and this security being, at best, little more than a chattel mortgage, they took a personal judgment bond, with power of attorney to enter it and confess judgment in any court of record of the United States or elsewhere, as collateral to the original obligation. Either remedy was complete in itself, and the plaintiffs, on default, could adopt either; but they were not cumulative,—they could not adopt both,—unless it was plainly expressed in the contract, or a necessary implication from its terms. The words of this contract negative such a construction. The defendant stipulates that "if default be made in said payments or any of them, . . . then, in that case, I hereby covenant and agree to return said machines to said Seanor & Bierer, and that they . . . or their agent may resume actual possession of the same." That was the penalty for default of the primary obligation, and repossession of the machine the discharge of it. On default of payment, the plaintiffs were not bound to accept the machine or take possession of it; they could have entered a judgment on the bond, levied on the machine and any other property of the defendant, in satisfaction of their demand. But they rescinded the contract by retaking into their possession the subject of it, which they had a right to do, and then immediately entered their bond, and issued execution to levy on other property of defendant, which they had no right to do for the contract or obligation to which the bond was collateral no longer existed. It ought to have been surrendered to defendant when he demanded it, at the time plaintiffs took away the machine.

The contract in this case is not essentially different from those in Campbell Printing-Press & Mfg. Co. v. Hickok, 140 Pa. 290, and Scott v. Hough, 151 Pa. 630, in both of which cases we held that the remedies were distinct, and not cumulative. If the bailor rescinded by repossessing himself of the property, the right of personal action against the bailee was at an end. That the words "rescission" or "rescind" do not occur in this contract is not material. Rescission is a fact. The word itself may be used by the contracting parties to indicate the right, but other words may be adopted to point out that course of conduct of the parties which shall constitute the fact of rescission. The decision in Campbell Printing-Press & Mfg. Co. v. Hickok, supra, was based on the stipulation of the contract that the lessor had the right, on lessee's failure to pay any instalment, to repossess himself of the property; and, having exercised this right, the contract was rescinded in fact, and there was an end of personal obligation on part of lessee. While the word "rescinded" is used in that contract, the right to rescind and the act necessary to a rescission are plainly expressed without it, and the interpretation was fully warranted, even if the word had not been used. Here the plaintiffs, in effect, in their contract, stipulated that on default of payment of rental, they should have the right to take the machine back to make good the default. There was default, and, because of it, they took back the machine. This was both a right to rescind, and the exercise of the right or a rescission in fact. The construction put upon the whole contract by the learned judge of the court below was right.

Therefore the assignments of error are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Mrs. Artie GOODWIN
v.
PROVIDENT SAVINGS LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF NEW YORK, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A clause in an insurance policy making it incontestable except for fraud in procuring it after two years from its date will control an agreement in the application that death by suicide is not covered by the policy so that such death after the expiration of that period will not defeat liability on the policy.

2. The laws of the state where a contract is made are, in the absence of proof to the contrary, presumed to be the same as those of the state where it is sought to be enforced.

3. Volumes of laws of a foreign state which do not purport to have been published under authority of its legislature, and are not shown to be commonly admitted as evidence of such laws in that state, are not admissible to prove such laws in Iowa.

4. False representations or warranties in an application for insurance cannot be relied on by the insurer if a copy of the application is not attached to the policy as required by McClain's Code, § 1733.

5. A copy of an application for renewal or reinstatement of a policy must be annexed to it to enable the insurer to rely on false statements therein under McClain's Code, § 1733.

6. Executing in one state a reinstatement of a policy made in another state will not remove the policy from its character as a contract of the state where it was originally executed.

7. An insurance policy cannot be canceled for failure to comply with a notice which was misdirected and was returned to the insurer without reaching the insured.

8. Declarations of an insured person as to forfeiture of the policy are not binding on the beneficiary.

9. Oral notice to a general agent of an insurance company of change of address of the insured, given upon the street, is sufficient to bind the company.

10. Notice of change of address of the insured, given to one authorized to collect premiums, is binding on the company.

11. There is no presumption that the addressee of a letter received it from the fact that it was not returned to the sender if it was not directed to the place in which the addressee resided at the time.

12. The burden of showing that the amount of insurance premium demanded is correct is upon the insurer where the policy requires payment of a certain sum "less the return premiums awarded."

13. That an insurance policy is renewable from quarter to quarter instead of being for a period of years upon condition of payment of premiums does not withdraw it from the operation of the ordinary rules applicable to life insurance contracts.

(February 5, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Cedar Rapids in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of life insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hubbard & Dawley and Mills & Keeler for appellant.

Mr. Charles A. Clark, for appellee:

The claim is incontestable except for fraud. Suicide is clearly cut out as a defense.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 16th day of November, 1887, the defendant, a corporation doing a life insurance business, organized and having its principal place in the state of New York, issued a policy of insurance to the plaintiff upon the life of her husband, Matthew Goodwin, agreeing to pay her, in the event of the death of the assured on or before noon of the 16th day of February, 1888, the sum of $5,000. The policy was issued on what is known as the "renewable term plan," a method of insurance originated by the president of the defendant company, and first used in the year 1887. By the terms of the contract, the defendant agreed to renew and extend the insurance, during each successive quarter year from the date thereof, upon the payment, on or before the 16th of February, May, August, and November in each successive year during the life of the assured, of the premiums for the actual age attained, in accordance with a schedule of rates printed on the back of the policy, less the return premiums awarded thereon. Goodwin, the assured, died by his own hand on the 11th day of November, 1891, at the city of Chicago, in the state of Illinois. His widow, the beneficiary in the policy, brought this suit, having first given notice, and made the proofs of death required by the terms of the policy. Defendant demurred to plaintiff's petition because there was no allegation therein that the policy had been renewed from time to time by the payment of premiums, and because the action was prematurely brought. The demurrer was sustained on the last ground, and overruled on the other; and thereupon plaintiff filed an amended and supplemental petition, avoiding the defect reached by the demurrer, and pleading some other matters not necessary to be here recited.

The defendant, in answer, admitted the execution of the policy, and its renewal from time to time down to May 16, 1891; admitted the death of Goodwin, but denied that the policy was in force at the time of his death. Defendant further pleaded, as a second division of its answer, that the assured made a written application for insurance, in which he agreed that the representations therein contained should be construed as warranties, and made the basis for the issuance of the policy, and that any false answers or statements should avoid the policy. It further pleaded that Goodwin represented in this application that he was in sound health, and was not then, and had not been, intemperate in the use of stimulants, and that he stated that he drank occasionally, but never to excess; that these representations were false and untrue; that Goodwin used intoxicating liquors habitually, and to excess; and that he made the representations he did with intent to deceive the defendant, and procure the policy in suit. In the third division of the answer the defendant pleaded other false and untrue statements made by Goodwin, respecting the place of his birth and the condition of his health, which need not be more particularly set out. In the fourth division the defendant pleaded that plaintiff and the assured wholly failed and neglected to pay the premiums necessary to be paid on May 16, 1891, in order to renew and extend the insurance from and after that date, and that the policy expired at that date by the express terms thereof; that thereafter, and on May 21, 1891, Goodwin applied for reinstatement in the defendant company, and, as a basis thereof, presented a health certificate, in which, among other things, he stated that he was then in good health and had been since May 16, 1891; that, in truth and in fact, Goodwin was not in good health and free from disease, and was not temperate in his habits, when he made the certificate of health. The fifth division pleaded failure of Goodwin or plaintiff to pay the quarterly premium due August 16, 1891, in order to extend the policy, and alleges that written notice of the amount of such premium, and of the place where and person to whom payment might be made, was mailed the assured on July 15, 1891,—the letter being addressed to him at Fifteenth and Harney streets, Omaha, Neb.; that being his last known postoffice address, and the one fixed by him, in the application for insurance, to which notice should be sent. The sixth division of the answer merely pleads the failure of Goodwin or plaintiff to pay the premium due August 16, 1891, and further alleges that the statutes of the state of New York, which, it is claimed, should govern and control the contract in suit, requiring notice, etc., did not apply to policies like the one in suit. In the seventh division the defendant averred that the application of Goodwin contained this statement: "It is agreed that death by my own hand or act (except when mentally unaccountable), or death in violation of, or attempt to violate, law, are risks not at any time assumed by the society under the policy applied for." And defendant further averred that Goodwin took his own life while mentally accountable, and therefore there was no liability on the part of the company. The plaintiff demurred to the fourth division of the answer because the representations there pleaded were not made in the application for insurance, and for the further reason that, by the terms of the policy, it was incontestable, except for fraud in obtaining the policy in the first instance; to the fifth division, because of several alleged defects in the notice sent out by the defendant company; to the sixth, because no computation had been made by the company as to the amount of the quarterly premium Goodwin should pay, no deductions or allowances having been made on account of any surplus portion of preceding payments not needed for death or quarterly fund; to the seventh for the reason that the policy sued on became and was incontestable, except for fraud in obtaining it. This demurrer was sustained, as to the fourth and seventh divisions of defendant's answer, and overruled as to the fifth and sixth, each party excepting. Thereupon defendant amended the fourth division by pleading discovery of the falsity of the representations therein referred to on July 1, 1892, and offered to confess judgment for the amount of the premium paid May 21, 1891. Thereafter other pleadings were filed by each of the parties; the defendant, among other things, alleging that the contract of reinstatement in May, 1891, was a Nebraska contract, and that there was no law of that state requiring that a copy of the certificate of health be attached to, or made a part of, the policy. The defendant further pleaded that the original application for insurance was made in Nebraska, and the policy delivered in Omaha, in that state, and that there was no law in either the state of Nebraska or the state of New York requiring a copy or copies of the application to be attached to or incorporated in said policy. Such were the issues on which the cause was tried. The court, however, in its instructions to the jury, eliminated all questions made by the pleadings, save the issue as to the nonpayment of the quarterly premium claimed to have been due August 16, 1891. The jury found for the plaintiff on the questions of fact presented, and with their findings we are not called upon to interfere. The questions presented by this appeal arise upon the sustaining of plaintiff's demurrer to certain divisions of the answer, the rulings of the court during the trial, and the giving and refusing of instructions to the jury.

1. The first question presented in argument relates to the sufficiency of the seventh division of the defendant's answer. The application which Goodwin made for his insurance contained a statement which, if standing alone, would avoid the plaintiff's cause of action, for it is conceded that Goodwin committed suicide. But the policy contained this provision: "Subject to the stipulations regarding payment of premiums, and extra-hazardous occupations, claim under this policy by death occurring two or more years after its date will be incontestable except for fraud in obtaining this policy." If there were nothing more to the case than this provision of the policy, there would be no doubt that plaintiff's claim could not be defeated because her husband took his own life; for a claim under the policy by death occurring two or more years after its date was incontestable except for fraud. We have a case then, for construction of these seemingly ambiguous and conflicting provisions. The tenets established for the guidance of courts in such matters are well understood, and no one is better established than that in all cases the policy must be liberally construed in favor of the assured, so as not to defeat, without a plain necessity, his claim for indemnity. And when the words used may, without violence, be given two interpretations, that which will sustain the claim and cover the loss should be adopted. Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 297, 34 L. ed. 413; First Nat. Bank v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 95 U. S. 673, 24 L. ed. 563; Moulor v. American L. Ins. Co. 111 U. S. 342, 28 L. ed. 449; Wadsworth v. Jewelers' & T. Co. 132 N. Y. 543; Fitch v. American Popular L. Ins. Co. 59 N. Y. 572, 17 Am. Rep. 372; Garretson v. Equitable Mut. L. & E. Asso. 74 Iowa, 419; Meyer v. Fidelity & C. Co. (Iowa) 25 Ins. L. J. 346; Collins v. Merchants' & B. Mut. Ins. Co. (Iowa) 64 N. W. 602. Now, by the terms of the policy, it was incontestable, after two years from its date, except for fraud in procuring it,—subject, however, to the stipulations regarding payment of premiums, and extrahazardous occupations. That is to say, claims under the policy by reason of the death of the assured were not to be controverted or disputed, except for some of the reasons stated, and death by suicide is not one of them. It will be observed that the clause on which the defendant relies is not found in the policy in suit, but in the application which preceded it in point of time, and there is significance in the fact that the words used in the application were not carried forward into the policy. Another rule of interpretation may well be used here, which is that when there is a conflict between the provisions of the policy and the statements contained in the application the former controls. Defendant's counsel contend with much plausibility that death by suicide was a risk not contemplated by the parties nor covered by the policy. But we think such a holding would import into the terms of the policy something not found therein, and not contemplated by the parties—at least, not by the assured—at the time the policy was issued. And as said in the Wadsworth Case, supra, "we should adopt that construction which we think the insurer had reason to suppose was understood by the insured." The proper construction of this policy, taken in connection with the application, we think, is that the policy does cover death by suicide occurring within two years from the date of its delivery, but that after two years it is incontestable, except upon the grounds stated therein. This construction will give effect to all the provisions of the policy, and as such a result is always sought after by courts, in interpreting all classes of contracts, we are quite content with it. We are the better satisfied with this conclusion because it seems that, in life insurance, certain companies limit the operation of the conditions as to suicide to a fixed period, and make their policies incontestable on that ground thereafter. 13 Enc. Brit. p. 179. For the reasons suggested, as well as for others which might be offered, we think the demurrer to the seventh division of the answer was properly sustained. The case of Mareck v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso (Minn.) 64 N. W. 68, from the supreme court of Minnesota, is directly in point; and while we do not concur in all the reasoning of that opinion, we are satisfied that the result reached is correct.

2. Defendant complains of the ruling on the demurrer as to the fourth division of the answer. It is sufficient to say at this time, with reference to this count, that the defendant amended it after the ruling on the demurrer, and no attack was made upon the division as amended, by defense or otherwise. True, the court withdrew the defense pleaded by this division from the jury, but this had no relation to the ruling on the demurrer. There is nothing here to complain of, even if it be conceded that the demurrer was improperly sustained.

3. The lower court withdrew from the jury all defenses based upon the application, or the certificate for reinstatement, for the reason that no full or correct copy of the application, and no copy of the certificate, were annexed to the policy. These holdings of the court are complained of. It is insisted that a substantially correct copy of the application was attached to the policy, and that, if it be conceded that the copy was insufficient, yet, as the contract was made either in the state of New York or of Nebraska, and as there is no law in either of said states requiring a copy of the application to be attached, it may rely upon any false statements or warranties contained in the application. The original application and policy of insurance have been certified up for our inspection, to aid us in determining whether a true copy of the application was attached to the policy, and an examination of them leads us to the conclusion that the statute hereinafter referred to has not been complied with. Among other things, the place to which notices of premiums shall be addressed is incorrectly stated in the copy. Again, some of the statements made by the assured with reference to his past afflictions were not carried out in the copy attached to the policy, and no part of the examiner's report is included in the copy attached. The relevancy of this omission is made apparent by McClain's Code, § 1733, which provides that: "All insurance companies or associations shall, upon the issue or renewal of any policy, attach to such policy or indorse thereon a true copy of any application or representations of the assured which by the terms of the policy are made a part thereof, or of the contract of insurance or referred to therein, or which may in any manner affect the validity of such policy. The omission to do so shall not render the policy invalid, but if any company or association neglects to comply with the requirements of this section it shall be precluded from pleading, alleging, or proving such application or representations, or any part thereof or any falsity thereof or any parts thereof in any action upon such policy. . . ." As we have said, it is argued that the policy in suit is a New York or Nebraska contract, and that there is no such law as that above set forth in either of these states. The policy was signed by the president and secretary of the company, in the city of New York. The premiums are made payable there, and the amount of the policy was to be paid, in the event of the death of the assured, at the city of New York. It was also expressly agreed that the policy should be construed to have been made in the state of New York. It was therefore a New York contract, and is to be governed by the laws of that state. Richards, Ins. § 44. Now, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, the laws of the state of New York are presumed to be the same as in this state. Seiverts v. National Ben. Asso. (Iowa) 64 N. W. 671. The defendant, upon the trial, attempted to prove that there was and is no such statute in the state of New York as the one before quoted, and for this purpose offered in evidence four volumes of books, entitled "The Revised Statutes, Codes, and General Laws of the State of New York," which purports to contain the text, carefully compared with the original, of all the general statutory law of the state in force January 1, 1890, published by one Clarence F. Birdseye, of the New York bar. What purports to be a printed certificate of the secretary of state is also in one of these volumes, to the effect that so much of the matter contained in the text of this edition of the Revised Statutes as purports to be a copy thereof is a correct transcript of the text of the Revised Statutes as originally published under the authority of the state, except such typographical errors in the original as have been corrected in the copy, and except such parts as have been altered by the acts of the legislature, and that, with respect to such parts, it conforms to the acts by which such alterations have been made. None of these volumes purport to have been published under the authority of the legislature of New York, nor were they proved to be commonly admitted as evidence of the existing laws of that state in the courts thereof, as required by § 3718 of the Code of Iowa. They were therefore inadmissible, and the court below properly rejected them. We return, then, to the presumption that the law of New York was the same, with reference to attaching copies of the application, as it is here, and the conclusion is inevitable that defendant cannot rely upon any alleged false representations or warranties in the application for insurance. It is argued, however, that the reinstatement or renewal which was made in May, 1891, when the assured furnished the health certificate, was a Nebraska contract, and that there is no law of that state requiring copies of the application or certificate of health to be annexed to the policy, and that, if this be not true, the statute of this state does not apply to renewals or reinstatements. Adverting to this last claim first, it is sufficient to say that the statute we have quoted is about as broad as language can make it, and we think it covers a renewal or reinstatement of the policy. Moreover, the reinstatement was not the making of a new contract, for no new or different terms were agreed upon. It was simply the cancelation of a forfeiture, whereupon the contract was restored, and recognized as binding by the company. Lindsey v. Western Mut. Aid Soc. 84 Iowa, 734; French v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso. 111 N. C. 391. The contract remained a New York contract after the reinstatement, the same as it was before, and must be governed by the laws of that state.

It is further to be noted that the application for reinstatement was accepted at the home office, in New York, and it is affirmatively shown that no officer or agent of the defendant in Nebraska had authority to make reinstatements or renewals. The defendant offered in evidence a copy of the Compiled Statutes of the state of Nebraska, which were rejected by the court below. We are inclined to think these statutes were sufficiently identified, but for the reasons above suggested, they were properly rejected. But, aside from all this, we do not think the company established a ground for forfeiture because of nonpayment of the May, 1891, premium. The notice which was sent the assured of the maturity of the premium was improperly addressed, and did not reach the assured, but was returned to the company. And there is no showing as to the amount due in May, for the nonpayment of which the forfeiture is asked. The defendant relies upon statements made by the assured as to the amount due, and as to the alleged forfeiture. It seems to be well settled, however, that his declarations are not binding upon the beneficiary. 2 May, Ins. § 579*a*; Union C. L. Ins. Co. v. Cheever, 36 Ohio St. 208, 38 Am. Rep. 573; Bliss, Ins. § 383; Washington L. Ins. Co. v. Haney, 10 Kan. 525; Seiverts v. National Ben. Asso. supra. The court below was right in refusing to submit the question of misrepresentations in the certificate of health.

4. We turn now to the alleged forfeiture for failure to pay the August, 1891, premium. It was conceded by both parties that the law of the state of New York required that the defendant, before it could forfeit a policy for nonpayment of premium, should, at least thirty, and not more than sixty days prior to the day when the premium is payable, address and mail, postpaid, to the assured, at his or her last known postoffice address, a written or printed notice stating the amount of such premium, the place where and the person to whom payable, and that unless the same should be paid to the company, or to a duly appointed agent or other person authorized to collect such premium, within thirty days after the mailing of such notice, the said policy, and all payments thereon, will become forfeited and void. It appears from the evidence that the defendant on the 15th day of July, 1891, addressed a notice to Matt. Goodwin of the maturity of the August 16, 1891, premium. This notice was addressed to the assured, at Fifteenth and Harney streets, Omaha, Neb. Now, it is claimed by the company that this notice was addressed to the last named postoffice address of Goodwin, while the plaintiff insists that both she and the assured gave notice to the defendant's agents of a change of address. This notice is claimed to have been given one Hall, a general agent of the defendant company, upon the streets of the city of Omaha, and to the Commercial National Bank of Omaha, which, for a time, at least, was charged with the duty of collecting premiums. The lower court submitted to the jury the question as to whether there was notice of a change of address given to either of these agents, and instructed that, if there was, then there was no forfeiture. We think there was ample evidence to sustain these instructions. The notice to Hall is not denied, but it is claimed that it was given to him upon the street, in a casual conversation, and therefore was not binding upon the company. There was evidence tending to show that Hall was a general agent, and uncontradicted evidence that he received the notice. And we think it was given to him in such a manner as to bind his principal. The place where the notice was given is entirely immaterial, if it was conveyed to him as agent of the company, and for the purpose of having it act thereon. According to the evidence, Hall was directed to change the address from Fifteenth and Harney to the general delivery. On the 13th day of July, 1891, Mrs. Goodwin wrote a letter to the Commercial National Bank, which bank was then collecting premiums for defendant, to forward all notices of assessments under her husband's policy to 57 Twenty-Third street, Chicago, Ill. This letter was received by the bank July 15th, and on the 16th it notified the defendant to send notice as requested. This notice was received by the company July 20, 1891. The only question with reference to this notice of July 13, 1891, is whether it was binding upon the defendant. Appellant contends that notice to the bank was not notice to it, for the reason that it had no authority whatever, except to collect and receive premiums, and deliver receipts to the assured. It seems that this question has heretofore been decided by this court, adversely to appellant, in the cases of Mayer v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 38 Iowa, 304; Loughridge v. Iowa L. & E. Asso. 81 Iowa, 141, 18 Am. Rep. 34, and authorities cited. The authorities cited by appellant's counsel are not in point.

5. It is also insisted that there was evidence to show that the assured received the notice, although it may have been incorrectly addressed; that it in fact went to the general delivery, where the assured directed it should go, and, as it was never returned to the defendant company, the presumption obtains that it was delivered. It is sufficient to say, in answer to this contention, that no such issue was made in the pleadings. The claim was that a notice was sent, as required by the New York statutes, to the last known postoffice address of the assured, and, as payment was not made within the time allowed thereby, that the policy was forfeited. The defendant did not, in any of its pleadings, aver that the assured had actual notice of the maturity of the premium. But, aside from all this, the notice was not addressed to the city or town where the assured, at the time, resided. He was then living in Chicago, and it seems to be a well-established rule that under such circumstances no presumption arises that the addressee received the notice. See Henderson v. Carbondale Coal & C. Co. 140 U. S. 37, 35 L. ed. 337; 2 Whart. Ev. § 1323; Carter v. Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. 110 N. Y. 23; Garretson v. Equitable Mut. L. & E. Asso. 74 Iowa, 421; Garbutt v. Citizens L. & E. Asso. 84 Iowa, 294; Phelan v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 113 N. Y. 151. The court did not err in refusing to submit the question as to the actual receipt of the notice by the assured, or in refusing to give the instructions asked by defendant upon this subject.

6. Complaint is made of the fifth paragraph of the court's charge, which required the defendant to show that the sum claimed as premium, i. e., $18.65, was the correct amount which was due in August, 1891, after awarding and deducting return premiums for that quarter, etc. No valid objection can be lodged against this instruction, in view of the terms of the policy, which provide that the premium which could be required was "less the return premiums awarded," and that "maximum quarterly premiums were to be reduced in each case by surplus portion of preceding payments not needed for the death fund and quarterly fund." It appears that in every instance these return premiums had been deducted from premiums previously paid, and that they varied in amount. Knowledge as to the amount of the return premiums was solely in the possession of defendant, and, under well known rules, the burden was upon it to prove the amount thereof. Plaintiff could not do it, as she had no data upon which to act. This is merely stating a general rule,—that where the amount of the premium to be paid is variable, and knowledge as to the amount rests peculiarly with the company, that it must show that the amount demanded was the correct sum. Tobin v. Western Mut. Aid Soc. 72 Iowa, 261; Underwood v. Iowa Legion of Honor, 66 Iowa, 134; 2 May, Ins. § 345*a*. The instructions given by the court with reference to this subject were correct, and those asked by defendant, in so far as they embodied correct rules of law, were given by the court.

7. Certain errors are assigned on the admission and rejection of testimony. We need not set them out. It is sufficient to say that we discover no error. The questions presented are unimportant, and this opinion has already grown too long.

8. Some claim is made that the policy in suit, being a renewable one, from quarter to quarter, is not governed by the ordinary principles applicable to life insurance contracts. Suffice it to say, in answer to this claim, that we see no merit in it. The policy in suit is a continuing one. It gave the assured and his beneficiary the right to make it incontestable as to certain matters, and this they did, by the payment of premiums for more than two years. It also gave them the right to deductions for return premiums, as before stated, and promised them an additional credit at the end of ten years. Construed with such of the provisions of the New York statutes as we have, it clearly appears that it should have no other effect than an ordinary life policy, which could be forfeited for nonpayment of premiums, the same as other insurance policies. The contract was one of insurance, pure and simple; and the ingenuity of the author should not be allowed to work a fraud or injustice upon those who confided in the belief that upon payment of premiums after notice, as required by the statutes of New York, they, after the expiration of two years, had an incontestable policy.

We have patiently considered the whole case, and examined a long line of authorities cited by counsel on either side, and have also made an independent search for cases which would aid us in disposing of the questions presented; and, while we have not discussed every proposition presented, we have considered those matters which we believe to be controlling, and are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Edward ANDERSON, Respt.,
v.
PACIFIC BANK, Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

1. A deposit of gold coin in a bank as a pledge to secure an obligation on a bail bond, receiving an acknowledgment that it is payable on return of the certificate, with a clause stating that it is payable only on release of bonds and is not subject to check, constitutes a special deposit, the return of which can be enforced in case of the bank's insolvency, the nature of which is not changed by the fact that without the knowledge or consent of the depositor the money afterwards gets into the bank vaults through the regular channels.
2. A demand is necessary to start the running of interest on a special deposit as a pledge to secure a bail bond, even after the sureties have surrendered the persons bailed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco, in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover an alleged special deposit from the assets of the defendant bank which had become insolvent. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sawyer & Burnett for appellant.

Mr. H. W. Hutton, for respondent:

The $2,000 having been deposited as security became and was a pledge.

Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2987; Loughborough v. McNevin, 74 Cal. 254; Stone v. Owens, 105 Cal. 297.

The title to the $2,000 still remained in plaintiff, defendant being merely a bailee or depositary with nothing but a lien and right of possession.

Civ. Code, § 2888; Stone v. Owens, supra; Haber v. Brown, 101 Cal. 452.

When the liability on the bonds ceased plaintiff was entitled to the return of his money.

Civ. Code, § 1822; Palmtag v. Doutrick, 59 Cal. 154; Loughborough v. McNevin, 74 Cal. 255; Wetherly v. Straus, 93 Cal. 287.

The transaction being a pledge, the defendant had no right to use the money without a special agreement to the contrary.

Jones, Pledges, § 501; Civ. Code, § 1835.

Even if the money was mingled it was without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff.

Re Johnson, 103 Mich. 109.

The appellant had no right to use the money without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, and to allow it to take advantage of such a defense would allow it to profit by its own wrong.

Jones, Pledges, § 501; Civ. Code, §§ 1833, 3518, 3520.

The presumption is that when it was placed therein it was placed there intact.

Jones, Pledges, § 501; Civ. Code, §§ 1833, 3529; Code Civ. Proc. sub. 20, 33, § 1963.

The court allowed interest in this case as damages, damages being proper under Civ. Code, § 3287.

Martin v. Ede, 103 Cal. 157; Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192.

If the bank should mingle the money a trust would be impressed to the exact amount on all other property of the bank and plaintiff could recover.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal from the judgment given in favor of plaintiff under the following facts: Plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby defendant agreed to furnish bail for Harry Christian and Martin Olson, who had been held for trial before the superior court. To protect defendant, and the sureties it might furnish, from liability or loss, plaintiff agreed to deposit with defendant the sum of $2,000 in gold coin as a pledge. Plaintiff delivered the money to McDonald, the acting president of the bank, leaving it within the president's room. He received from the bank the following acknowledgment: "Edw. Anderson has deposited in this bank two thousand dollars ($2,000), in gold coin, payable to self or order, on return of the certificate properly indorsed. (Payable only on release of bonds.) (Not subject to check.) R. H. McDonald, Jr., Vice President. W. S. Morse, Teller." The money afterwards, but without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, went into the bank vaults, through the regular channels. The bonds were furnished, and neither defendant nor the sureties were subjected to any liability or loss thereunder. Subsequently, the defendants in the criminal charge were surrendered into custody by their bondsmen, and plaintiff thereafter, upon February 26, 1894, made demand upon defendant, which had meanwhile become insolvent, for a return of the money pledged. The bank refused a return, and this action was instituted.

Under this statement, which is taken from the findings, appellant contends that the facts disclose a general, and not a special, deposit with the bank, and that, upon the bank's insolvency, plaintiff stands in the same position as that occupied by the general creditors of the institution. It is unquestionably true that one making a general deposit with a bank in the usual course of business parts with title to the moneys deposited. In the case of a special deposit, however, which is a mere bailment, the rule is the same with banking institutions as with individuals. Whether the special deposit be under a contract of bailment for the better protection of the bailor's property, or under a contract of pledge as security for some specific obligation of the pledgeor, title does not pass to the bailee or pledgee, but remains in the pledgeor. The pledgee acquires no right to make a general use of the property. Civ. Code, §§ 1835, 2888. It would seem, therefore, that in this case the question is completely disposed of by the finding of the court that the money was given and received as a pledge, and by the additional finding that it was afterwards carried into the bank's vaults through the regular channels without the knowledge or consent of the pledgeor. But, indeed, all of the circumstances found substantiate the ultimate finding that the deposit was a special one, while none are inconsistent with it. Defendant demanded a delivery to it of $2,000, not for banking purposes, but to protect the bondsmen it might procure. There was reason why the plaintiff should make a special deposit of $2,000 with the bank as bailee, and none at all why he should make a commercial deposit of that sum. The money was delivered in a manner strictly in accord with the idea of a pledge, but quite inconsistent with the notion of an ordinary banking deposit. The so-called "certificate of deposit" issued by the bank is not a certificate of deposit, but a mere receipt, expressing though briefly, the contract of pledge. Every contract by which possession of personal property is transferred as security only is to be deemed a pledge. Civ. Code, 2987. Under such a contract, that fact that the bank afterwards wrongfully commingled and used the funds, if it did do so, cannot be urged by it in defense as effecting any change in the contractual relations and rights of the parties. It would be but allowing it to plead its own wrongdoing to its own advantage. Henderson v. O'Conor, 106 Cal. 385; Massey v. Fisher, 62 Fed. Rep. 958; Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693.

There is nothing in the case of Mutual Acci. Asso. v. Jacobs, 141 Ill. 261, 16 L. R. A. 516, upon which appellant relies, which can aid his contention here. The plaintiff in that case sued to recover the sum of $6,000 deposited by it with the banking house of Kean & Co., as indemnity on an appeal bond. But, as the court declares, the plaintiff gave its check to Kean & Co., which was cashed by that house; and the funds thus received with the knowledge of plaintiff were mingled and used with the general funds of the bank, and there was nothing in the certificate of purchase issued and received by plaintiff which indicated a special deposit. The court merely finds from a review of the evidence that it was not established that the deposit was special. In the case at bar the trial court finds a special deposit, and does not find a commingling and use of the money with plaintiff's knowledge. Indeed, it does not find any such commingling and use at all. It merely finds that after its reception, and without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, the moneys "went into the bank vaults through the regular channel." The bank vaults are the usual and proper places for the reception and keeping of special deposits. The finding strictly means no more than that the money went into the bank vaults as a special deposit in the regular manner.

The court allowed plaintiff, as damages, legal interest upon the money from the date upon which Christian and Olsen were surrendered by the sureties. But while plaintiff was entitled to a return of his money immediately after this event, defendant was not in default until its refusal, after demand, to make restoration of it. Not being in default, it should not be charged with interest as damages. This demand was actually made by plaintiff upon February 26, 1894, from which date plaintiff is entitled to interest as compensation.

The judgment is ordered modified accordingly, each party to bear his respective costs upon this appeal.

I. In general.

Two general classes of mutual insurance companies are described by Denio, Ch. J., in White v. Haight, 16 N. Y. 310. One was a company in which the members gave premium notes, only a small part of which were paid in advance and which were to be assessed pro rata whenever occasion should require. In the other, premiums were paid in cash, and the profits, if any, were divided among the members in proportion to the amount of premiums paid by them. Nearly if not quite all of the decisions as to liability of members have been rendered in respect to companies of the former class.

The liability of a member of a benefit society to an action for an assessment is the subject of a note to Ellerbe v. Barney (Mo.) 23 L. R. A. 435.

All questions as to the validity of policies, their suspension and forfeiture, as well as questions concerning the premium for insurance, although they arise in case of policies in mutual companies, are, so far as they are unaffected by the mutual character of the organization, to be regarded as a part of the general law of insurance, and are not here considered.

As to the effect on insurance by a foreign company which has not complied with the statutory requisites of the right to do business, see note to Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (Ind.) 20 L. R. A. 405.

A policy made and accepted "with reference to the by-laws of the company . . . which are made a part of the policy" charges a policy holder with knowledge of a by-law, although it may not be appended to the policy. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Leavy, 136 Pa. 499. See further note to Moyer v. East Shore Terminal Co. (S. C.) 25 L. R. A. 48.

The exemption of the private property of the members of a mutual insurance company from corporate debts, which is made by its articles of association, does not apply to assessments against them for losses under the policies. Montgomery County Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Milner, 90 Iowa, 635.

A provision in the articles of a mutual insurance company limiting the liabilities of the members to the amount of undertakings given for premium is not valid when the only authority of statute therefor is a provision that the articles "may prescribe the liabilities of the members to be assessed towards defraying the losses and expenses of the company and the mode and manner of collecting such assessments," especially when another provision of the statute declares that a receiver shall assess upon all members and persons insured such sums as will in the aggregate be sufficient to pay all losses and liabilities, together with the services and expenses of the receiver. Russell v. Berry, 51 Mich. 287.

Where insurance is taken by the makers of a premium note given as part of the assets of a mutual insurance company the amount for the premiums therefor cannot be collected of the makers in addition to the amount of the note, as the premiums are properly chargeable to the note. Maine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Blunt, 64 Me. 95.

Where a mutual marine insurance society used a Lloyds policy which was not in all respects suited to their purposes, and the amount of premium paid and the rate per cent were left blank, but the words "£20 per centum" were added in italics in a separate line, it was held whatever these words meant they did not limit the amount for which each member was liable to 20 per cent on the sum he had insured. Gray v. Gibson, L. R. 2 C. P. 120.

P. 481. See also 34 L. R. A. 806.

4. Assessments upon the members of a mutual insurance company to pay a loss may include interest and expenses incident thereto resulting from not paying it when due, and also the costs of litigation incurred in defending actions.

5. Members of a mutual insurance company who did not pay their shares of a void assessment to cover a valid claim will not be permitted to object to the crediting of the amounts paid thereon by other members upon the sums assessed against them under a new levy to meet the liabilities for which the void assessment was levied.

6. Thirty per cent is not an unreasonable amount to levy for contingencies in levying an assessment upon the members of a mutual insurance company to meet liabilities, where a new assessment for deficiencies arising from failure to collect cannot be made under the law of the state, and litigation in connection with the collection of the assessment is probable.

II. Who are members.

a. In general.

A person who refuses to take a policy in a mutual fire insurance company for which he has applied, or to sign the deposit note, is not a member or liable for the premium. Real Estate Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Roessle, 1 Gray, 336.

A manufacturing corporation organized under the laws of Minnesota is held entitled to take insurance on its property in a mutual insurance company organized under Minn. Laws 1881, chap. 91, authorizing the formation of millers' and manufacturers' mutual insurance companies, and may be bound by its premium notes given for insurance in such company. St. Paul Trust Co. v. Wampach Mfg. Co. 50 Minn. 93.

A firm which succeeds to the business of a prior firm and gives a new note in renewal of a premium note given by the old firm for security of dealers to a mutual insurance company is bound by the obligation. Maine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Blunt, 64 Me. 95.

In case of mutual insurance on ships it was held that part owners of a vessel insured in a mutual company by the owner of other shares in the vessel, who was the managing owner having authority to insure it in such an association, are liable to contribute to the payment of the losses of the association in case of his bankruptcy whether they are technically members of it or not, where the insurance in such an association is on vessels belonging to its members or in which members are interested or have shares, and the articles provide that every person shall be deemed to have agreed to become a member who insures any ship therein. Great Britain 100 A 1 S. S. Ins. Asso. v. Wyllie, L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 710; Ocean Iron S. S. Ins. Asso. v. Leslie, L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 722, note.

These cases are distinguished from the case of United Kingdom Mut. S. S. Assur. Asso. v. Nevill, L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. 110, on the ground that in the latter case the contract made no one liable to contribute except the managing owner who procured the insurance.

On the question whether or not those who insure on the cash or stock plan in a mutual company are to be held liable as members, the decisions are divided.

In a Canadian case it was held that one insuring for a cash premium under 40 Vict. chap. 72, § 35, is liable as a member of a mutual company and subject to assessment for losses during his membership provided the deposit notes are insufficient to pay them. Hochlaga Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Lefebvre, 6 Mont. L. N. 236, 7 Mont. L. N. 226. (Berryman's Ins. Dig. 157.)

So, in Wisconsin, the holder of a policy issued for a cash premium is held to be a member liable to assessment in a mutual fire insurance company organized under the Wisconsin statutes (S. & D. Ann. Stats. §§ 1941*a*–1941*g*) by which all property insured is made subject to assessment. Rundle v. Kennan, 79 Wis. 492.

But elsewhere it is held otherwise.

Thus, in Illinois one who insures his property in a mutual company for a specified premium does not become a member of the company so as to be liable for the payment of instalments of a note which he gives for the premiums which come due after the insolvency of the company, as the consideration for them fails. Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 63 Ill. 187.

So in an earlier case it was said that the holder of a policy issued for a cash premium under lawful authority in the charter of the company is not a member of the company. Illinois F. Ins. Co. v. Stanton, 57 Ill. 354. This was declared in an action on such a policy, and the court said while the company was organized on a mutual plan this transaction did not seem to have any element of mutuality.

And in the New York case of Howard v. Franklin M. & F. Ins. Co. 9 How. Pr. 45, it was held that one who obtains insurance from a mutual company by payment of a cash premium does not become a member or stockholder within the meaning of the New York act of April 10, 1849, § 16, providing for suits against members or stockholders for losses.

Likewise, in Pennsylvania one who takes a cash policy in a mutual insurance company which has the right to issue such policies cannot be held liable as a member for future assessments because of a by-law attempting to create such liability if he did not have notice of the by-law before his policy was issued. Given v. Rettew, 162 Pa. 638, Affirming 11 Lanc. L. Rev. 114.

So, a stock note is not liable to assessment for losses in a mutual insurance company and cannot be treated as a premium note. Pennsylvania C. Ins. Co. v. Gayman, 7 Legal Gaz. 234. (Brightly's Dig. (Pa.) vol. 2, p. 1411.)

b. Transferees of policy or property.

On the transfer of property insured in a mutual company the purchaser does not become liable to assessments in the absence of any assignment of the policy to him or of any contract creating such liability between him and the former owner. Bowditch Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Buffum, 2 Gray, 550.

But assignees of a policy in a mutual fire insurance company who have been substituted to all the rights of the original assured with the assent of the company thereby become members and are liable to assessment, where the statutes simply provide that "every person insured by the company shall be a member." Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 116.

A transfer by a guardian of a policy in a mutual fire insurance company to the owner of the property insured, which is assented to by the company and recorded and the policy accepted by the transferee, makes him a member of the company subject to assessments as such. Cumings v. Hildreth, 117 Mass. 309.

A purchaser of property insured in a mutual assurance society under a statute which makes the

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Ionia, Eaton, & Barry Company above named, is a mutual fire insurance company, organized and doing business under the laws of this state. In the year 1889 it had losses and expenses, and an assessment was made for the purpose of providing a fund with which to discharge its liabilities. Relators allege that this assessment was insufficient to cover all of said liabilities existing for that year, and that a large indebtedness existed, that they did not attempt to assess. The amount of the indebtedness unprovided for consisted of (1) undisputed losses and expenses in excess of the assessment; (2) two losses, unadjusted, which were subsequently litigated, known as the "Van Alstine and Towle Losses;" (3) costs and expenses of such litigation; (4) interest upon the amounts mentioned. An assessment was made to raise a fund to pay this indebtedness, and upwards of $5,000 was paid upon it. Such assessment being declared void, no further effort was made to collect it, but the money property liable for the payment of quotas, and provides that the insured on selling the property shall apprise the purchaser of the insurance and indorse the policy to him, and that such purchaser shall be considered as a subscriber in lieu of the original and the property remain liable for the quotas, takes the property subject to such quotas, although the policy is not indorsed to him. Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Byrd, 1 Va. Cas. 170.

Property insured in the Mutual Assurance Society under the Virginia act of December 22, 1794, was made liable for assessments on account of losses insured against and on transfer to a bona fide purchaser continued subject to this liability. Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Watts, 14 U. S. 1 Wheat. 279, 4 L. ed. 91. The statute expressly provided that in every case of such change the purchaser or mortgagee should be considered as a subscriber in lieu of the original, and the property remain liable for the payment of the quotas in the same manner as if the right thereof had remained in the original owner.

But on the sale of such property without notice it was held it did not continue liable for the premium which by the Virginia act of 1805 must be paid before the insurance could commence. This makes a clear distinction between such premium and the quotas or assessments which might thereafter become payable. Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Faxon, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 606, 5 L. ed. 342.

An assignee of a policy in a mutual insurance company who expressly agrees to pay the assessments thereafter made against "said policy" is not relieved from liability on such assessments by the fact that the original premium note has been surrendered on the payment by a surety of assessments made up to the time of the assignment of the policy. The court considered that this would be so whether the assignee was in the position of a purchaser of the premises or that of a mortgagee. But there was a further consideration in the fact that the assessments against the assignee were actually made before the note was surrendered. New Hampshire Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hunt, 30 N. H. 219.

As to the effect of transferring the insured property to terminate the liability of the original member, see infra, VII., c.

III. Notes of members.

a. Kinds and effect.

The distinction between notes given to form the capital of a mutual insurance company and those given for premiums after the company has begun business is frequently pointed out by the judges and the former held to be enforceable irrespective of losses, and the latter only for the pro rata share of losses in common with other premium notes. This is clearly stated in Dana v. Munro, 38 Barb. 528.

A premium note taken for insurance after the organization of a company was held to be an obligation only to pay assessments and not to constitute a stock note, although the agent of the company before its organization had solicited the insurance and renewed the solicitation after it was ready to do business. Ibid.

The form of a note does not determine the question whether or not it is given as a stock or capital note of a mutual insurance company, but this matter is open to inquiry. Jackson v. Van Slyke, 52 N. Y. 645; Sands v. Son, 56 N. Y. 662.

A note which is in the form of a mere premium note is not presumed to be given as an original stock note, that is, a note given on the organization of the company as security for its liabilities. But evidence is admissible to determine that fact. Bell v. Shibley, 33 Barb. 610.

Where a note was given to a mutual insurance company on a transaction which was in form an open policy, but there was some evidence to indicate a different intention, and it was with the maker's knowledge published in the annual statement required by law as a business note of the company, it was left to the jury to say whether or not it was given as a premium note in advance for the security of dealers. Brouwer v. Hill, 1 Sandf. 629.

So, in case of premium notes in advance taken after the organization of a mutual insurance company it was held to be a question of fact whether they were given as a part of the fund for the security of dealers or merely for premiums in the usual course of business. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Rey, 1 Sandf. 184.

And a note which purports to be for the premium on a single specific policy to be issued on specified property and payable in such portions and at such time or times as the directors might require agreeably to their charter is subject to explanation by parol evidence of the facts to show whether it was intended to form a part of the capital required by law and payable absolutely without any assessment, or to be a premium note on which an assessment was necessary in order to recover anything upon it, but nothing short of the most conclusive evidence or of an express admission could establish it to be a note given as part of the premium capital of the company. Dana v. Munson, 23 N. Y. 564.

Where a note was given to a mutual insurance company for an open policy after the maker had paid a note for premiums in advance and long after the company had commenced business, it was held to be a question for the jury whether it was given for premiums in advance and for the security of dealers or whether it was given for an ordinary open policy, the testimony being in conflict on the question. Maine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Stockwell, 67 Me. 382.

The question whether a premium note was given under § 9 of the Maine special act of 1870 for the better security of those concerned to be used for the purpose of paying claims or otherwise in the course of business and for which the signers were entitled to a compensation, or merely as the premium for a particular policy, was held to be a question for the jury, in Maine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Far-collected had been used in payment of the obligations of the company. Thereupon, a new assessment was ordered, for an amount sufficient to cover the sums mentioned, and 30 per cent additional, to cover expenses of collection, and shrinkage. One William D. Place, who from January, 1884, until the date of filing his bill, was a member of, and insured in, said company, filed a bill of complaint, stating the facts hereinbefore outlined, and praying an injunction restraining the levy of such assessment, which he asserted would be a cloud upon his title. The bill alleges the following grounds for the claim that such asesessment should not be made, viz.: First, the Towle and Van Alstine losses did not become a liability during the year 1889, inasmuch as they were not adjusted, but were subsequently litigated, and were therefore not chargeable upon policy holders for that year; second, the costs and expenses incident to that litigation were not chargeable to policy holders of that year, as they were incurred later; third, the amount rar, 66 Me. 133, where the claim was that it was for an open policy for premiums in advance to be earned by the company, and that all earned premiums had been paid, leaving nothing due on the note, and the note was given after the company had begun business, having obtained the requisite amount of notes for that purpose. If the note was given under § 9 for security, then it remained a valid obligation for the balance after deducting premiums earned.

The surrender of a note which was claimed to have been given as a subscription note, but which was not shown to have been given to make up capital for the company or to be used as the basis of credit, and the taking instead of a new note for the unearned balance of the former one to which a new obligor joins with the express understanding that the new note is to be termed an open policy note for the unearned premium of an open policy issued at the same time to the makers, is not unlawful, especially, where the charter of the company does not have any provision for subscription notes which are to be valid and binding whether the premiums for which they are advanced are ever earned or not. Lawrence v. McCready, 6 Boew. 329.

Premium notes clearly intended only as a contingent fund for the payment of losses as they should occur and be assessed from time to time, and not as a present capital payable absolutely at their full amount, are unjustifiably diverted when the directors attempt to use them for the purpose of extending the charter of the company without the consent of the makers, and do not thereby become liable to collection without any assessment. People, Barton, v. Rensselaer Ins. Co. 38 Barb. 323.

The use of premium notes without consent of the makers as the basis for an extension of the charter of the company under the New York act of 1849, if it does not operate prejudicially to the makers, was said not to be a diversion of the notes in Hyatt v. Esmond, 37 Barb. 601. But in this case the court found that the note in question had not been thus used but was given after the extension of the charter had been made.

A note given to increase the capital stock of a mutual insurance company cannot be sued on and treated as a premium note, and an assessment by the company is not evidence that money is due on such a note, but it must be shown that there was a resolution to increase the capital stock, and that it was so increased. Pennsylvania C. Ins. Co. v. Gayman (Pa.) 5 Ins. L. J. 319.

The liability of members upon depcsit notes cannot be increased by the fact of the insolvency of a mutual insurance company and the transfer of its assets to a receiver. Shaughnessy v. Rensselaer Ins. Co. 21 Barb. 605.

The fact that the original premium note had matured and a renewal note been given is immaterial in determining the liability of the maker on the renewal note, but that is the same as if it had accrued during the currency of the original note. Hone v. Folger, 1 Sandf. 177; Hone v. Allen, Id. 171, note; Howard v. Hinckley & E. Iron Co. 64 Me. 93.

b. Consideration.

The defense of a partial failure of consideration in an action on notes given for advance premiums as a security on which the maker was to receive a percentage cannot be sustained because of the maker's failure to take insurance for the whole amount of the premiums represented by the note. Cruikshank v. Brouwer, 11 Barb. 228.

Notes given for advance premiums subject to the right of the company to use them for the payment of losses and liabilities or any purpose connected with the business of the company are enforceable without any reference to the question whether or not insurance had been taken on their account. Osgood v. Toplitz, 3 Lans. 184; Osgood v. Strauss, 65 Barb. 383, Affirmed 55 N. Y. 672; Brouwer v. Appleby, 1 Sandf. 158.

The same was held where the note had been transferred as collateral security. Great Western Ins. Co. v. Thayer, 60 Barb. 633.

So in Maine notes given for premiums in advance by members of a mutual insurance company which has no capital stock and which is authorized to receive such notes for security and to negotiate them for paying claims or otherwise in the course of business, are held to be on sufficient consideration even if no insurance has been obtained therefor by the makers and the company has become insolvent. Howard v. Palmer, 64 Me. 86. The notes of this class constituted the assets of the company which it was required to have in a certain sum before it could do business.

Premiums that have actually been paid by makers of notes for advance premiums to a mutual insurance company cannot be deducted from the amount of such notes, although instead of paying the premiums the makers might have had them allowed on the notes had they so chosen. Howard v. Hinckley & E. Iron Co. supra.

See also, as to want of consideration where insurance is invalid, infra, VI., d.

c. Maturity.

The maturity of notes given for advance premiums as security notes under the act of April 10, 1849, § 5, and made payable at specified times, not exceeding twelve months from date, cannot be postponed until the exhaustion of the cash capital of the company, but the time of payment is made absolute according to their terms and not dependent upon any such contingency as the occurrence of losses, the exhaustion of capital, or any demand of payment or making of assessments. Osgood v. Strauss, 65 Barb. 383, Affirmed 55 N. Y. 672.

A note given to a mutual insurance company for premiums in advance is in effect payable on demand in substantial compliance with the 5th section of the New York act of April 10, 1849, requiring such notes to be payable "at the end of or within twelve months" from the date, although it provides for payment "in such portions and at such time or times as the directors may, agreeably to their charter and by-laws, require." Hill v. Reed, 16 Barb. 280.

voluntarily paid upon the void assessment of 1892 could not be lawfully assessed to reimburse those who had paid it, who were to be credited such amounts upon the new assessment; fourth, there was no authority to assess 30 per cent for contingencies. An injunction pendente lite was issued, a motion to dissolve which was denied, whereupon this proceeding was instituted to compel such dissolution.

Ordinarily, this court does not review the action of the circuit judge in injunction cases. Where, however, as in this case, the return shows the question in dispute to be one of law merely, it will consider the case. The points raised by the bill are those which will be discussed.

Questions arising over matters involved in this case were considered in the case of Ionia, E. & B. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Otto, 96 Mich. 558, and it was there held, in substance, that where an assessment was made to cover certain losses and expenses, subsequent assessments, made necessary by a fail-

A by-law providing that neglect or refusal to pay an assessment due from a member shall entitle the organization to sue for and recover the whole amount of his deposit note or notes which shall remain in the treasury subject to the payment of losses and expenses which have then accrued or may thereafter accrue, and the balance, if any, to be returned to him after ninety days from the expiration of the term for which his insurance was made, is upheld as a valid exercise of a charter power to adopt by-laws; and the objection that it was void as creating a forfeiture is not sustained, because it was a contract to which the member is a party. Cahill v. Kalamazoo Mut. Ins. Co. 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 124, 43 Am. Dec. 457.

A charter provision that the whole amount of a premium note may be recovered on failure to pay any assessment upon it may be enforced notwithstanding a provision that the note is to be returned on demand after thirty days from the expiration of the policy. St. Louis Mut. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Boeckler, 19 Mo. 135.

A provision in a statute incorporating a mutual fire insurance company making the whole amount of a deposit note due in case of default for thirty days after notice to pay an assessment thereon becomes a part of the contract of the members, and may therefore be enforced in another state. Jones v. Sisson, 6 Gray, 288.

The right to recover the whole amount of a premium note for default in payment of an assessment is also enforced in accordance with the charter of a company, in Missouri State Mut. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Spore, 23 Mo. 26.

The whole amount of a deposited premium note with costs is also held to be recoverable on default of payment of an assessment within a stipulated time, under Neb. Comp. Stat. 1887, chap. 43, § 18. Farmers' Union Ins. Co. v. Wilder, 35 Neb. 572.

The subject of forfeiture of insurance in a mutual company and all other questions as to the matter of insurance between the insured and the company of which he is a member are omitted from this note.

A stipulation in a policy that the whole amount of a premium note shall become due on failure to pay any instalment at maturity is valid and makes such note due and enforceable for the whole amount on failure to pay an instalment, notwithstanding the insurance ceases upon such default where the benefit of lower rates has been obtained during the time the policy was in force by reason of taking the policy for a longer period. Continental Ins. Co. v. Boykin, 25 S. C. 323; Continental Ins. Co. v. Hoffman, Id. 327.

In the case last named the default was made on the first instalment that came due on the premium note, but the first year's premium had been paid in cash. The court described the case as a hard one but said the reduction of the rate that was obtained by taking a five years' policy and of which the benefit had been had for one year constituted a consideration which made the contract valid as between persons of full age and of sound mind, although it was one-sided, unequal, and unjust.

The article of association and by-laws of a mutual fire insurance company organized under the Indiana statute (1 Gavin & H. p. 395, § 45) may provide that all premium notes shall be paid in instalments as ordered by the directors after notice, and that the entire note shall become due and collectible if assessments made are not paid. German Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Franck, 22 Ind. 364.

As to the necessity of assessments to make a cause of action on such notes, see infra, IX., a.

d. Negotiation.

Premium notes may be transferred in absolute payment or as security for valid debts of the insurance company when taken for advance premiums under a charter making them the absolute property of the company subject to use for payment of losses and liabilities or any other purpose connected with the business of the company. Great Western Ins. Co. v. Thayer, 60 Barb. 633.

The negotiability of a premium note is not affected by a provision that if not paid at maturity the whole amount of premium on the policy shall be considered as earned and the policy null and void so long as the note remains overdue and unpaid. Kirk v. Dodge County Mut. Ins. Co. 39 Wis. 138, 15 Am. Rep. 36.

A subscription note or a premium note in advance given to a mutual marine insurance company and transferred by the company to pay a loss may have the protection given to negotiable instruments in the hands of bona fide holders against defenses set up by the maker, such as a lack of consideration. Aspinwall v. Meyer, 2 Sandf. 180.

As collateral security for the payment of the debts of a mutual insurance company it may transfer its notes received under charter authority for premiums in advance where the charter authorizes their negotiation to pay claims or otherwise in the course of business. Brookman v. Metcalf, 32 N. Y. 591; Crooke v. Mali, 11 Barb. 205.

Persons taking such notes in this way as collateral security may be protected as bona fide holders. Brookman v. Metcalf, and Great Western Ins. Co. v. Thayer, supra.

The deposit of a subscription note by a mutual insurance company as security for other notes which are discounted, applying the money to the proper business of the company, is, so far as the maker is concerned, the same as if the note had been negotiated absolutely when such negotiation was within the power of the company. Holbrook v. Basset, 5 Bosw. 147.

A note given for premiums in advance under a charter authorizing such notes to be taken and to be negotiated for the purpose of paying claims or otherwise in the course of business can lawfully be transferred by a mutual company in payment of a claim for a loss. Howland v. Myer, 3 N. Y. 290; White v. Haight, 16 N. Y. 310.

An agreement that 5 per cent shall be allowed as interest on the whole amount of a note for advance premiums without any deduction for such sums as might be written against is not valid and will prevent recovery on the note by the insurance com-ure to collect, could not be levied upon those whose policies had been canceled previous to the former assessment. But it was plainly intimated in that case that a member could not avoid his liability upon accrued losses and expenses by cancelation and payment of assessments theretofore made. He who insures obligates himself to pay a proportionate share of the losses and expenses for the period during which he is insured; and, as said in the Otto Case, if the liability has not been covered by assessment, it continues, though he may have meanwhile ceased to be a policy holder. Much can be said against the doctrine that such member should not be liable for deficiencies arising from failure to collect assessments, but we think that question settled by authorities cited in the Otto Case. We consider it clear, however, that until the assessment has been once made the liability continues. The Otto Case, page 561, 96 Mich., expressly states that the Towle and Van Alstine losses were existing liabilities at the time of their occurrence. We pany or a member to whom it has been transferred in payment of a loss, as he is not a bona fide holder. Chesbrough v. Wright, 41 Barb. 28, Aff'd on other grounds 51 N. Y. 662.

Premium notes given upon subscriptions to a mutual insurance company are not valid in the hands of a member of the company to whom they have been transferred in payment of a loss, when the subscription was made on condition that it should not be binding until a certain sum was subscribed and that condition has not been satisfied. Chesbrough v. Wright, 51 N. Y. 662.

The power of the president of a mutual insurance company to indorse and convert into money notes taken for advance premiums and which were necessary assets required to permit the company to begin business is upheld in Aspinwall v. Meyer, supra; Caryl v. McElrath, 3 Sandf. 176.

The maker of a premium note as security for liabilities of a mutual insurance company who redeems it from one to whom the company had pledged it by paying the amount of the pledge may still be held liable to the company for the balance after deducting the amount so paid. Craig v. McHenry, 35 Pa. 120.

The right of an insurance company to transfer a premium note on a purchase of bank stock cannot be controverted by the maker of the note when sued by the indorsee. Brown v. Donnell, 49 Me. 421, 77 Am. Dec. 266.

But the right of a mutual insurance company to transfer a premium note is denied in Gore Dist. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Simons, 13 U. C. Q. B. 560.

e. Collection by receiver or assignee for creditors.

A receiver of a mutual insurance company can enforce notes given for advance premiums as assets of the company when it has become insolvent although they have not been indorsed by the company. Howard v. Palmer, 64 Me. 86.

A receiver of a mutual insurance company can sue in his own name upon a premium note under the Indiana statutes, giving him power "to bring and defend actions," and also providing that he shall reduce the assets to possession under the rules prescribed for administrators, since an administrator sues in his own name. Manlove v. Burger, 38 Ind. 211.

A renewal note given to continue a premium note made in advance for security as assets of a mutual insurance company is enforceable by a receiver in case of the insolvency of the company in the same way that the original note would have been if the insolvency had arisen before it became due. Howard v. Hinckley & E. Iron Co. 64 Me. 93.

A resolution by the directors of a mutual insurance company transferring its assets to an assignee for creditors substantially complies with the condition of a note payable as the directors may require. Hill v. Reed, 16 Barb. 280.

The use of a note given merely as a premium note, and not an original stock note, as if it were the latter, may constitute a fraudulent perversion of its object and design, which will render it invalid in the hands of a receiver of the company. Bell v. Shibley, 33 Barb. 610.

As to assessments by receiver, and their collection, see infra, IX.

f. Defenses.

The defense that the signature to a premium note was forged is not waived by the policy holder by accepting a policy containing a recital that such a note had been given. Beeber v. Papst (Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 191.

For defenses to notes which go to the entire contract of membership, such as invalidity of the insurance, illegality of the corporation, or fraud in procuring the contract, see infra, VI.

As to invalidity of assessments, see also infra, IX.

IV. Altered charter, by-law, or contract of membership.

The acceptance by a majority of the members of each of several mutual fire insurance companies of an act of the legislature making a new corporation and declaring that it "shall not affect the legal rights of any person" and shall take effect "when accepted by the members of said corporations" does not make a member of an old company who does not expressly assent a member of the new corporation. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hobart, 2 Gray, 543.

The fact that a mutual insurance company obtained a new charter which did not purport in terms to be an amendment of the old one, but had precisely the same title and embodied most of its provisions with certain additions, is held insufficient to constitute a defense to an action on a premium note given to the old company after the term of the insurance has expired. Hope Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Beckmann, 47 Mo. 93; Hope Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Koeller, Id. 129.

An agreement by members of a mutual company that they will abide by the constitution, rules, and regulations already established or which may thereafter be established by a majority of the insured is sufficient to bind a member to a change from his obligation by an alteration of the charter by act of the majority. Korn v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 192, 3 L. ed. 195; Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Korn, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 396, 3 L. ed. 383.

In case of a mutual fire insurance company organized under the laws of Virginia it was held that the separation of Alexandria from the state of Virginia had no effect on the contracts of members in Alexandria. Korn v. Mutual Assur. Soc. supra.

An amendment by legislative act to the charter of a mutual insurance society made on request of the majority of the society, whereby town and country risks were separated and different rates provided for, is valid as to a nonassenting member of the society. Currie v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 4 Hen. & M. 315, 4 Am. Dec. 517.

The additional premium charged under the Virginia act of 1805, § 7, was held payable only on the excess between the old and the new valuation when the property was revalued, and not upon the whole think it cannot be said that the managers of a company of this kind can relieve present policy holders, and burden future ones, by delay in adjusting or by litigating losses. These losses were a part of the legitimate cost of insurance for that year, whenever and however adjusted. The subject was again alluded to, and the validity of these claims recognized, on motion for rehearing of the Otto Case, 97 Mich. 525. In the case of Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Spaulding, 61 Mich. 77, cited by counsel, the assured had surrendered his policy, and paid an assessment which not only covered all existing losses, but also a large sum for contingencies. The court said that "there can be no doubt on the findings that defendant did pay in full all that was his proportion of any existing losses of the company, as well as of any assessment levied. Whatever losses subsequently arose from failures to collect, or from any other cause, were not existing losses." No assessment having been made for these losses, or for the amount of liability for 1889 not sum of the revaluation. Atkinson v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 202, 3 L. ed. 199.

But on a change in the rates of premium arising from a variation of risk made under the Virginia act of 1805 separating town buildings from country buildings the additional premium is held payable upon the whole sum insured. Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Korn, supra.

A member who agrees to be governed by the by-laws of the association where its articles of incorporation authorize the managers to adopt such rules and by-laws as to them may seem proper is subject to an amendment of a by-law by the managers, especially when it was made before his policy was issued, whereby the amount of property placed on the books of the company which was necessary before any insurance should be binding was reduced below the amount originally stated. Montgomery County Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Milner, 90 Iowa, 685.

A change made by a mutual insurance company in its manner of doing business, whether it is lawfully effected or not, cannot relieve the liability of makers of notes given for premiums in advance on the organization of the company, as they are not sureties to the company but to its creditors. Osgood v. Toole, 60 N. Y. 475, Affirming 1 Hun, 167.

V. For what losses or obligations liable.

a. In general.

Claims in dispute cannot be included in an assessment upon a premium note. Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Phœnix Furniture Co. (Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 159.

A mutual company cannot make assessments for prospective losses unless authorized by statute. Orr v. Beaver and Toronto Mut. F. Ins. Co. 26 U. C. C. P. 141.

But a member of a mutual company cannot contest his liability to an assessment on the ground that the loss for which it was made should not have been paid, and that actions therefor could have been defeated under the statute of limitations. Sands v. Hill, 42 Barb. 651.

Liability to assessments on premium notes cannot be avoided by showing that the losses for which assessments were made were due to bad management. West Branch Ins. Co. v. Smith (Pa.) 5 Ins. L. J. 319.

The extravagance, incompetency, or carelessness of the directors of a mutual insurance company constitute no defense to a member when charged with an assessment upon his deposit note. Koehler v. Beeber, 122 Pa. 291.

Where a loss has been paid out of money hired by the company without making any assessment therefor, it may properly make an assessment upon the parties whose policies were in force at the time of the loss. Tobey v. Russell, 9 R. I. 58.

Claims for moneys received from some of the members on invalid assessments may be made the basis of assessment against the members of a mutual insurance company when a part of them had refused to pay the invalid assessments. Re People's Mut. Eq. F. Ins. Co. 9 Allen, 319.

Interest on such claims may also be included. Ibid.

An assessment upon a premium note is not valid when made to pay a note of the company for money borrowed before the maker of the premium note became a member of the company and the renewals of the company's note were invalid. Victoria Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Thompson, 32 U. C. C. P. 476.

So, an assessment to pay a judgment obtained on the notes of a mutual insurance company, given for borrowed money, may be lawfully made upon its members. Orr v. Mercer County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 114 Pa. 387.

b. During what time or period.

Only such losses and expenses as are incurred during the period of membership can be charged against a member of a mutual insurance company. Great Falls Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 45 N. H. 292.

Losses incurred at a time when a person was not a member of a mutual fire insurance company cannot be assessed against him. Swing v. H. C. Akeley Lumber Co. (Minn.) 25 Ins. L. J. 303; Koehler v. Beeber, 122 Pa. 291; People's F. Ins. Co. v. Hartshorne, 90 Pa. 465; McLellan v. Keystone Mut. Ins. Co. 3 Luzerne Leg. Obs. 53 (Brightly's Dig. (Pa.) Vol. 2, p. 1411); Mutual Valley F. Ins. Co. v. Rausch (Pa.) 1 Leg. Rec. Rep. 250 (Berryman's Ins. Dig. p. 161).

But a note constituting part of the absolute funds of the company may be collected to pay obligations even if they accrued before he became a member. Nashua F. Ins. Co. v. Moore, 55 N. H. 48.

That is to say that losses must have occurred during the life of a policy in a mutual fire insurance company in order to be assessed against the holder. Wardle v. Townsend, 75 Mich. 385, 4 L. R. A. 511; Detroit Mfrs. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Merrill, 101 Mich. 393; Manlove v. Bender, 39 Ind. 371, 13 Am. Rep. 280; Downs v. Hammond, 47 Ind. 131; Embree v. Shideler, 36 Ind. 423; Green v. Beaver and Toronto Mut. F. Ins. Co. 34 U. C. Q. B. 78.

Assessments made prior to the membership of a member of a mutual life or accident company cannot be collected unless he has contracted to pay them. Evarts v. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. 40 N. Y. S. R. 878, citing Knight v. Supreme Council O. of C. F. 24 N. Y. S. R. 845.

So, a member of a mutual insurance company is not in default for nonpayment of an assessment the notice of which shows on its face that it is largely to meet losses which occurred prior to his membership. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Tunkhannock Toy Co. 15 W. N. C. 306.

An assessment against all the members of a mutual fire insurance company to pay liabilities for losses and expenses is invalid as to those who became members after the losses occurred but valid as to the others. Long Pond Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Houghton, 6 Gray, 77.

A horizontal assessment of a specified percentage on the face of each premium note without regard to its proportion of the losses and expenses which occurred during the life of each policy or the amount which had been paid on the note violates a cardinal rule of mutual insurance as well as Wis.

covered by the first assessment, the directors might legitimately make an assessment to cover them, with interest and expenses incident thereto, including costs of litigation. It was the duty of the company to pay all of this within sixty days. It chose to do otherwise, and interest and money spent in trying to avoid the payment of a lawful obligation can hardly be chargeable to subsequent policy holders, who have no interest in, or liability upon, such obligations. The assessment of 1892 was void. Being void, it was no impediment to a new assessment, in making which the officers of the company have reassessed the amounts paid upon those who paid them, and propose to credit on such assessments such sums. This is equity, and we see no reason for complaint on the part of those who did not pay their void assessments. Certainly, equity has no injunctions for those who seek to escape honest liabilities by imposing undue burdens on others. May, Ins. § 559; People's Mut. Ins. Co. v. Allen, 10 Gray, 300; Nelson v. Milford, 7 Pick. 18. The assessment of a sum for contingencies is not uncommon; and where, as

Rev. Stat. § 1967, and cannot be upheld. Davis v. Parcher & J. & A. Stewart Co. 82 Wis. 495.

Only those who were insured at the time when a deficiency occurred in the funds of a mutual insurance company should be required to contribute to the supplying of such deficiency. Greenhow v. Buck, 5 Munf. 263. In this case the deficiency was in the funds necessary to insure payment for future losses and not in any amount necessary for losses that had already occurred.

A member cannot be assessed to supply a deficiency arising from uncollected assessments not made during the existence of his policy. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Chase, 56 N. H. 341.

Losses that arise after the surrender of a policy, whether from failure to collect assessment that had been previously made or from any other cause, are not existing losses for which a member continues liable after surrendering his policy and payment of assessments for his proportion of the existing liabilities of the company. Ionia, E. & B. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Otto, 96 Mich. 558; Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Spaulding, 61 Mich. 80.

An assessment made on a premium note given for a policy which was issued for one year cannot be made after the expiration of the year for a loss which is not shown to have occurred during that time, although there is a claim that the intent was to have the policy for five years. Columbia F. Ins. Co. v. Bolton, 2 Pearson (Pa.) 222.

Losses occurring after the cancelation of a policy in a mutual company cannot be included in an assessment on a premium note given for that policy. York County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Turner, 53 Me. 225.

As to liability after the insured property has been destroyed for the remainder of the term for which it was insured, see infra, VII., b.

The written terms of a policy or premium note cannot be contradicted by proof of a custom or practice of an insurance company to cancel their policies and surrender the premium notes given therefor upon the happening and payment of losses. New Hampshire Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Rand, 24 N. H. 428.

By-laws of a mutual insurance company declaring that members whose policies are in force at the time an assessment may be declared shall be liable to assessment, and again that members whose policies have expired at the time of an assessment shall be liable for unpaid losses and other liabilities existing at the time of such expiration pro rata with those then in force, and the amount thus ascertained and levied shall be deducted from the gross amount for which assessment is to be made and the balance assessed upon the policies then in force, are construed, in Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Stauffer, 125 Pa. 416, to make the policies in force at the time of a loss liable to assessment in the first instance, whether they have expired or not, and to charge any deficiency remaining after such assessment upon the policies which have been issued subsequent to the loss and up to the time of the assessment. The court in this case distinguishes the case of Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gackenbach, 115 Pa. 492, in which the by-laws received a different construction as based on an inaccurate copy of the by-laws in the record.

In the case of Thropp v. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. 125 Pa. 427, the by-laws receive the same construction as in the Stauffer Case. The court explained that the by-law simply adds to the general rule which charges losses on the policies in force at the time of their occurrence a provision that any deficiency may be charged upon later policies issued before the assessment.

Unearned or return premiums cannot be repaid by making assessments on members of a mutual fire insurance company whose contract makes them liable to assessment "for the losses and expenses of said company." Manlove v. Bender, 39 Ind. 371, 13 Am. Rep. 280; Detroit Mfrs. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Merrill, 101 Mich. 393; Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Phœnix Furniture Co. (Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 159.

Cancelation of policies by operation of law without any request of the holders does not entitle them to any unearned premiums for which assessments can be made on policy holders, where the only provision for unearned premiums by the statute or by-laws is in relation to voluntary cancelations by act of one of the parties. Dewey v. Davis, 82 Wis. 503; Atlas Paper Co. v. Seamans, Id. 504.

The statute liability of the members as corporators cannot be availed of to raise money to repay unearned premiums and an assessment for that purpose is void except when made in accordance with the contract. Com. v. Mechanics' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 192.

But return premiums on a policy canceled during the solvency of a mutual fire insurance company which by the contract with the member he is entitled to recover may constitute a basis for assessments by the terms of the particular contract and the time and circumstances of the cancelation. Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 116.

And it was held in Traders' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Stone, 9 Allen, 483, following Fayette Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fuller, 8 Allen, 27, that the amount due for return premiums to members whose policies have been annulled may be included in an assessment of the members of a mutual fire insurance company under a statute authorizing it to pay "just claims" against the company, where the contract authorizes the directors to assess "such sums as may be necessary upon the members in proportion to their premium and deposit," and the by-laws provide for return premiums on cancelation of policies. Commenting on this case, it is said in Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra, that in the case of Fayette Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fuller, supra, there was no deficiency of assets and therefore no question of priorities.

The premium notes of the members of a mutual company organized under Minn. Laws 1881, chap. 91, by millers and manufacturers, which constitute the contingent fund of the company, may be resorted to, if necessary, when the company becomes under our decisions, a new assessment for a deficiency arising from a failure to collect cannot be made, it is proper to include a liberal sum. It is usually within the discretion of the directors. People's Eq. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Babbitt, 7 Allen, 235; May, Ins. § 559; Bangs v. Gray, 12 N. Y. 477. Thirty-three and one third per cent was held reasonable in Re People's Mut. Eq. F. Ins. Co. 9 Allen, 319. In view of the probabilities of litigation, we are of the opinion that 30 per cent was not unreasonable. See Wardle v. Townsend, 75 Mich. 385, 4 L. R. A. 511.

There is another reason why we think that the circuit judge should have dissolved the injunction. The complainant's bill shows that he has been a member of said company from 1884 until he filed the bill, and therefore liable for his proportion of all these liabilities. We fail to discover any reason why he should complain of an assessment to pay debts which the company is legally bound to pay.

Writ granted.

insolvent, to pay the unearned premiums on policies of simple insurance on the all-cash plan whose holders sustain no other relation to the corporation than that of parties who had thus contracted with it. Such notes constitute a part of the capital of the corporation and a part of the fund upon the credit of which their contracts of insurance are entered into. Re Minneapolis Mut. F. Ins. Co. 49 Minn. 291.

d. Division into classes generally.

Premium notes of any particular class are assessable only for losses upon policies in that class, where a division of risks into classes is authorized by charter and has actually been made. Sands v. St. John, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 153.

Under statutes expressly providing for separate classes of business of a mutual fire insurance company and that an assessment upon the premium notes of one class cannot be made to pay the losses or expenses of another class, one whose property is placed in a certain class cannot enforce a judgment for a loss against property expressly devoted to the payment of losses in a different class. Naill v. Kansas Farmers' F. Ins. Co. 47 Kan. 223.

An assessment made upon the members of a mutual insurance company to cover losses that have occurred during a certain period, which ignores a separation of the policies into classes, is held invalid, where the charter required the property insured to be divided into four separate and distinct classes in each of which the premium notes shall be assessed to pay losses in that class only. Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Moody, 74 Me. 385.

The separation of the business of a mutual fire insurance company into classes so that an assessment upon the notes of one class can be made to pay losses in that class only is authorized by Kan. Comp. Laws 1879, chap. 50*a*. Kansas Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Amick, 45 Kan. 738.

An adoption of the provisions of Mass. Stat. 1849, chap. 104, which authorized a division of risks into classes, is necessary in order to permit an assessment on one class only. People's Equitable Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Arthur, 7 Gray, 267.

A division of the risks into separate classes by a company which had accepted the Massachusetts act of 1849, chap. 104, was sustained in Citizens Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sortwell, 8 Allen, 217.

The division of risks into different classes or departments, making the premium notes in each department assessable for losses in that department only, is lawful under the New York act of April 10, 1849. White v. Coventry, 29 Barb. 305; Sheldon v. Roseboom, 29 Barb. 309, note; White v. Ross, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 539, Overruling Thomas v. Achilles, 16 Barb. 491.

But all the assets, including premium notes in both classes into which risks have been divided, must be resorted to to pay losses in either class if necessary because of the insufficiency of the assets specially applicable to that class. White v. Ross, supra.

In case of a division of insurance business into two departments managed and kept separate and distinct from each other, it was held that an assessment upon the premium notes to pay debts of the company could be made without showing that the liability to be paid was incurred in that department of the business to which the notes assessed belong. The court said: "The company could not apply the proceeds of an assessment upon the premium notes in one department, to pay losses which had occurred in the other, but it could lawfully order an assessment upon the premium notes to pay its debts, taking care to apply the proceeds of the assessments according to its charter and by-laws." Kelly v. Troy F. Ins. Co. 3 Wis. 254.

But the right of a company to divide its business into distinct classes and make the notes in one class liable to assessment for losses in that class only is sustained in Allen v. Winne, 15 Wis. 113. In this case a receiver assessed notes in a farmers' department to pay a loss in the merchants' department, but this was held invalid.

So, in a Canadian case it is held that the liability of members of a mutual insurance company, the business of which is divided into branches, is only for the separate branch in which they are insured, and not for the general debts thrown by the company into hotchpotch. Beaver and Toronto Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Spires, 30 U. C. C. P. 304.

Members of solvent branches of a mutual insurance company in which each branch is separate in respect to payment of losses cannot be charged with assessments to pay off members who have subscribed to a guaranty fund in order to pay off a liability due to the guaranty members, except so far as may be necessary to discharge losses paid in the branches to which the members belong and not repaid by them. Duff v. Canadian Mut. F. Ins. Co. 27 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 391.

As to effect on premium note of insuring property in the wrong class, see Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Keyser, 32 N. H. 313, 64 Am. Dec. 375, infra, VI., b.

e. Losses on cash or stock policies.

A mutual insurance company which has divided its risks and capital into classes without any authority to do so, and also insures property for a cash premium and not upon the mutual principle, makes all its members liable to assessment on their premium notes irrespective of the class in which they have been placed. Fitzpatrick v. Troy Ins. Co. 5 Biss. 48.

Losses on cash or stock policies issued by a mutual insurance company may be included in the liabilities which can be assessed on premium notes, where the company can lawfully issue both kinds of policies and it becomes necessary to resort to the notes because the cash is exhausted. Cooper v. Shaver, 41 Barb. 151; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Newcomb, 1 Legal Chron. 9, 4 Legal Gaz. 409 (Brightly's Dig. (Pa.) vol. 2, p. 1412); Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Buck, 4 Legal Gaz. 182, 1 Legal Chron. 257 (Brightly's Dig. (Pa.) vol. 2, p. 1412).

The premium notes given to a mutual insurance company may be assessed for losses arising under cash policies issued by the company under authority of the New York act of 1849. White v. Ha-

The right of a company to issue policies on the cash plan and on the mutual plan also, under the Pennsylvania special act of July 14, 1855, is sustained in Re Tradesmen's Mut. F. Ins. Co. 5 Pa. Dist. R. 7.

Persons who become members of a mutual insurance company on the mutual plan after the company had been authorized to insure for cash premiums are liable for assessments for losses on policies issued upon the cash plan. Hummel's Appeal, 78 Pa. 320.

A member of a mutual insurance company who was insured on the mutual principle cannot be assessed to pay losses on the risks which were taken in another class on the cash principle and afterwards transferred to the former class and reinsured. This was not a reinsurance within the meaning of a statute authorizing a mutual company to reinsure risks in "any mutual or other insurance company," as this does not cover the case of reinsurance in another branch of the same company. Beaver and Toronto Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Trimble, 23 U. C. C. P. 252.

VI. Defenses against contract.

An agreement by the president of a mutual insurance company to give up a premium note given for better security of dealers with the company at the end of the twelve months which it had to run, when directly conflicting with the contract made by the note itself, is void. Brouwer v. Appleby, 1 Sandf. 158.

The mere fact that some policies were issued containing an agreement that they should be nonassessable, when the company had no authority to issue such policies but when they were actually treated as assessable, does not constitute a defense to an assessment upon another policy, as the holder thereof is not injured by the inoperative agreement which has been practically ignored. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Yeomans, 8 R. I. 25, 86 Am. Dec. 610.

The fact that directors took a different proportion between the cash premiums and deposit notes of members of the company as the terms of insurance when changes were found expedient did not avoid an assessment unless it appeared that some damage resulted therefrom. Marblehead Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Underwood, 3 Gray, 210.

b. Contract invalid or unauthorized.

The unconstitutionality of a statute giving a mutual insurance company power to insure cannot be set up by a member of the company as a defense to an action on a premium note. Freeland v. Pennsylvania C. Ins. Co. 94 Pa. 504.

Neither can a member set up as a defense that the contract was ultra vires. Ibid.

The due incorporation, organization, and right to act in doing business of a mutual insurance company is to be presumed in the absence of proof to the contrary in an action against one of its members for the assessment, even if he is not estopped to deny them. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Yeomans, 8 R. I. 25.

And later the same court held that members of a mutual insurance company cannot avoid payment of their just ratable assessments by attacking the lawfulness of the organization of the company. Providence F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Murphy, 8 R. I. 131.

An attempt by makers of premium notes to escape liability thereon on the ground that the corporation has never been legally organized or has not complied with the statutory requisites of the right to do business is unsuccessful in case of Jones v. Dana, 24 Barb. 395, in which the general rule is applied that as to persons who deal with a company doing business as a corporation, exercising corporate powers, it is a corporation de facto.

The estoppel of a member of a mutual fire insurance company to deny the corporate character of the organization when it brings suit against him on a premium or deposit note is declared in Cahill v. Kalamazoo Mut. Ins. Co. 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 124, 43 Am. Dec. 457. This illustrates the general doctrine respecting the denial of corporate existence by a person whose contract has recognized such existence and is here mentioned as an instance without attempting to develop the law or collect the cases on this matter of estoppel.

The want of the requisite capital of the corporation cannot be set up as defense to assessments on members of a mutual insurance company as they cannot thus impeach its existence. Cooper v. Shaver, 41 Barb. 151.

So, want of compliance with the statute in respect to the amount of subscriptions to be made before a mutual insurance company could begin business cannot be set up by one of the members as a defense against an assessment upon his deposit note. Trumbull County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Horner, 17 Ohio, 407.

Makers of premium notes under an agreement to give them subject to the terms as a supplement to the charter of the company for the better security of its dealers to be liable only for losses during the period for which the notes are given cannot escape liability for such losses on the ground that the company had never accepted that supplement to its charter where it had acted under it and the makers of the notes had received the benefit of it. Fell v. McHenry, 42 Pa. 41.

The fact that some of the subscriptions to a mutual insurance company prove worthless, although they were included in the amount required to permit the company to do business, does not release a member from liability on a note which he voluntarily gives for the amount of his subscription as advance premiums. Holbrook v. Basset, 5 Bosw. 147.

One who becomes a member of a mutual insurance company by taking insurance before the approval of the act incorporating it is not liable to pay any portion of the losses and expenses of the company. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Asso. v. Burch (S. C.) 24 S. E. 503.

The insurance of property in one class which ac-benefit of the whole, when the question is one of common or general interest to many persons, or when the parties are very numerous and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court.

3. The fact that the right to vote and control the management of an insurance company is vested in those members only who are guarantors does not prevent the company from being regarded as a mutual one, or impair the legal existence and the obligations of deposit notes given for premiums.

4. A mutual insurance company is not changed into a stock company by raising a guaranty fund to secure temporarily the payment of losses when assessments are insufficient, even if such guaranty fund should be held valid.

5. The provision in Code, § 1146, that premium notes must on their face state that they were given for insurance, is by § 1160 made inapplicable to notes given for mutual obligations by persons organized for mutual insurance under the provisions of § 1058, for organizing corporations in general.

cording to a by-law of a mutual fire insurance company should have been assessed in another class under a charter requiring a division of the risks into classes does not make a policy or a premium note therefor void, although the directors act with full knowledge of the facts, since the by-law cannot be regarded as a limitation and restriction of the power lodged in them by the charter. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Keyser, 32 N. H. 313, 64 Am. Dec. 375.

c. Fraud or mistake.

Where there was abundant evidence to show that a mutual insurance company was a fraud from its inception, and a member was induced to enter it by false representions as to its condition, it was held that this constituted a defense to an action on his premium note. Sunbury F. Ins. Co. v. Humble, 100 Pa. 495.

False representations as to the solvency of a mutual insurance company, made by its agent under authority of its directors, whereby a person is induced to become a member, may constitute a good defense against assessments upon his premium note. Boland v. Whitman, 33 Ind. 64.

The insolvency of a mutual insurance company at the time a premium note was given was set up in defense by the maker when sued thereon by an indorsee, and it was held that if this was true and the insolvency was known to the officers of the company who issued the policy and took the note, then it was fraudulent and void except in the hands of innocent indorsees. Brown v. Donnell, 49 Me. 421, 77 Am. Dec. 266.

So, false representations made to induce a person to become a member of an insurance company, to the effect that it is a purely mutual company and does business only in the state and never takes large risks in large cities, if these were material matters of inducement to membership, may constitute a defense to an assessment upon a premium note. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Woodworth, 83 Pa. 223.

A surrender of policies limiting liability of the member to the amount of premium notes given by him in exchange for a new policy without any new consideration or the surrender of the premium notes by which the liability of the insured was increased twofold was held in Wyman v. Gillett, 54 Minn. 536, to have been fraudulently obtained by the company, and therefore the limitation of the member's liability contained in the original contract was upheld.

Representations of an agent of a mutual insurance company to obtain a contract of membership to the effect that it would cost the member nothing except the amount which he paid in cash, are in effectual to relieve the member from liability on a premium note which he gave in addition to the cash payment. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Marshall, 29 Vt. 23.

So, representations by an agent of a mutual insurance company as to the times and amounts of assessments that might be made on the premium notes, where the statutes provide that assessments could only be made to pay losses by fire, cannot constitute any defense to the insured, although the assessments actually made are greater than he supposed from the agent's statements that they would be. Boland v. Whitman, supra.

And the maker of a note under an agreement which he signed to advance a note for premiums in advance in accordance with the charter of the company which provides that such notes are for the better security of those concerned cannot contest his liability on such note on the ground that he signed the agreement without reading it in reliance on false representation that the note was to be given for an open policy to be surrendered when payable on payment of premiums earned. Maine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Hodgkins, 66 Me. 111. In this case the note was stamped "Given for open policy," and it was held that it was in fact given for such policy, although it was for premiums in advance and also for the better security of the dealers with the company. The court held that the rights of the parties must be determined by the contract as written, although one party may have misconstrued its legal effect.

And representations by an agent of a mutual insurance company to a person whom he induces to become a member, to the effect that he will not be liable to any assessments, and that his application will be taken upon a certain plan which will not subject him to assessments, will not constitute any defense to an assessment in accordance with the written contract, even if there was a mutual mistake of the parties, especially where the party has had the benefit of the insurance before he objects to the contract as written. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Swank, 102 Pa. 17.

A mistake of law on the part of all the members of a mutual insurance company and the express statements of the general agent of the company and the fact that a member is liable in any event only to the amount of his premium note is sufficient to prevent a member who becomes such on reliance on such representations from being held liable to any greater extent. Macklem v. Bacon, 57 Mich. 334.

False statements of legal conclusions as to the liability of members of a mutual insurance company, made to induce them to become members, are not a defense to them. Mansfield v. Cincinnati Ice Co. 28 Ohio L. J. 113.

But fraud in obtaining a premium note, liable to assessments, perpetrated by false representations inducing the insured to believe that his policy was issued for a definite sum without any liability to assessment, is sufficient to defeat liability to an assessment upon the note. Keller v. Equitable F. Ins. Co. 28 Ind. 170.

False statements by an agent of a mutual insurance company to the effect that it does not take insurance in Pittsburg, or other large cities, made to induce a person to become a member of the company will not constitute any defense to an assessment on his premium note, where such declarations of the agent were not within his authority. In this case there was an offer to prove that the president of the company on appointing the agent said they would not or did not insure in Pittsburg while as matter of fact they did at that time and afterwards, but this evidence was held inadmissi-all-cash premium, issued to persons who are not bound to pay any assessments are without authority of law when issued by a mutual insurance company which was organized under Code, § 1160, authorizing insurance of the property of members of the company only, and which was subject to § 1159, prohibiting a mutual company to take risks upon the stock plan.

7. Members of a mutual insurance company are presumed to know the provisions of its articles of incorporation and by-laws.

8. Makers of deposit notes given to a mutual insurance company to cover future assessments, although they may have been deceived by misrepresentations as to a guaranty fund for partial protection against assessments, are not entitled to have their notes canceled without paying assessments for losses which occurred during the time for which they had the benefit of their insurance, at least when they have asked no relief until after the company has ceased to do business and assigned its property for the benefit of creditors.

9. For losses on cash policies unlawful by the statute, the insured is not liable to assessment on his deposit note.

ble. Hackney v. Alleghany County Mut. Ins. Co. 4 Pa. 185.

False statements of facts inducing persons to become members of a mutual insurance company will not relieve them from liability as members, where they have remained members without attempting to obtain relief until after the rights of innocent third persons have intervened, as in the case of other persons becoming members on the faith of their membership. Mansfield v. Cincinnati Ice Co. supra; Dettra v. Kestner, 147 Pa. 566; Dettra v. Lock, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 200.

d. Failure of consideration.

A premium note given for a policy which is entirely void because of a false warranty by the insured is declared to be without consideration and invalid in Frost v. Saratoga Mut. Ins. Co. 5 Denio, 154, 49 Am. Dec. 234, but the question actually decided in this case was that the policy was void.

A premium note is not enforceable where the policy for which it was given was never delivered. Giles v. Jacques, 1 Montreal Sup. Ct. 166 (Berryman's Ins. Dig. 1210).

If the policy delivered is not in accordance with the contract the maker of the premium note is not liable thereon. Sun Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Belane, 5 Montreal L. N. 42 (Berryman's Ins. Dig. 1211).

The election of an insurance company to declare a policy void because of other insurance defeats its right to hold the insured liable thereafter as a member of the company for further losses. Tuckerman v. Bigler, 46 Barb. 375.

In case of an attempt to insure mortgaged property when the company has a right to insure unencumbered property only, the insured is not subject to the payment of quotas assessed for such insurance. Ingrams v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 1 Rob. (Va.) 661.

So, in a suit to subject certain property to quotas of insurance, wherein it was held that the property was not insurable in the company which assumed to insure it, there was held to be no liability for the quotas claimed. Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Holt, 29 Gratt. 612.

The invalidity of insurance in a mutual company which is effected in a branch of business that is not authorized by law will prevent the insured from being liable to assessments for such insurance. Beaver and Toronto Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Spires, 30 U. C. C. P. 304.

Premium notes given by a member of a mutual insurance company are void if his lack of title or insurable interest in the property prevents the policy from being valid. Bersch v. Sinnissippi Ins. Co. 28 Ind. 64.

But, on the other hand, it was held in Massachusetts that lack of insurable interest or other defense against a policy in a mutual company does not relieve the holder thereof from liability to assessment as a member. Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 116.

So, in New England Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Belknap, 9 Cush. 140, the court held that even if such defense would be good in case of an ordinary insurance policy it was not so in a mutual company in which the mutual promises of the members were the basis of the insurance. Consequently the fact that a member has an insurable interest in only part of the property insured does not limit his liability to assessment on his deposit note.

No rebate or deduction from the amount of a premium note or an assessment thereon is required by the fact that the company's charter expires during the life of the policy. Huntley v. Beecher, 30 Barb. 580.

VII. Termination of liability.

a. Rescission or cancelation of contract.

The rescission of a contract between a mutual insurance company and a member by their mutual agreement is lawful and seems essentially necessary to the safe and proper transaction of the business. Akers v. Hite, 94 Pa. 394, 39 Am. Rep. 792; Boland v. Whitman, 33 Ind. 64.

So, in case of a life company it was held that a rescission of the contract between a member of a mutual insurance company and the company mutually agreed upon, when there are no liabilities of the company, is sufficient to prevent any further assessments upon the member. Bostick v. Maxey, 5 Sneed, 173.

The cancelation of policies and the surrender of premium notes under an agreement of compromise to end a litigation between the company and the member terminates membership and prevents the member from being held liable on subsequent obligations of the company. Wadsworth v. Davis, 13 Ohio St. 123.

The cancelation of a policy by a mutual insurance company with return of the premium notes on the ground that the risk is undesirable before the dissolution of the company will prevent an assessment on a premium note for such policy after the company is dissolved. Mansfield v. Franklin Furniture Co. 1 Ohio Dec. 511.

The president of a mutual insurance company has no power to surrender a note given as security and for advance premiums after it has become due. Brouwer v. Appleby, 1 Sandf. 158.

Neither have the trustees of the company any right to cancel such note without consideration. Brouwer v. Hill, 1 Sandf. 629; Hone v. Allen, Id. 171, note.

The surrender of notes taken by a mutual insurance company for security of dealers with it and for advanced premiums under a vote that notes shall be so surrendered providing no claim is made by the makers on the company for their use is not valid when there is no other consideration for the surrender and the notes are needed for the payment of the company's debts. Maine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Pickering, 66 Me. 130.

The promise of an agent of a mutual company to surrender a premium note in consideration of the surrender of the policy of the maker, and his payment of a certain sum which was then due from him as a valid assessment upon his note, is invalid and without consideration. Sands v. Hill, 42 Barb. 651.

The officers of the company cannot release a member of a mutual insurance company from his fully issued by a mutual company, members who took lawful policies on the assessment plan cannot be compelled to contribute by assessment on their premium notes merely because they knew of the issue of the cash policies, but did nothing to estop themselves from denying liability on account of them.

10. A guaranty fund is not, strictly speaking, assets of a mutual insurance company for the purpose of determining its solvency, when the company is required to refund all moneys obtained from it.

11. The obligation to contribute to the payment of prior losses on assessments is not terminated by the insolvency of a mutual insurance company and its assignment for the benefit of creditors.

12. Notice of assessments by mutual insurance companies need not be given before they are made, unless expressly provided for by the articles of incorporation and by-laws.

13. Premium notes given by members of a mutual insurance company can-contract and statutory obligations with other members upon his payment of less than all dues and his ratable share of all losses up to the date of his withdrawal as required by Sandborn & Berryman Anno. Stat. (Wis.) § 1941 f. Seamans v. Miller's Mut. Ins. Co. 90 Wis. 490.

See also main case of COREY v. SHERMAN as to cancelation for issue of policies without authority.

A note given to enable the maker to vote at an ensuing election of trustees, intending and expecting that it would appear in the annual statement as one of the assets of the company and stand among the securities given for the protection of its dealers, cannot afterwards be withdrawn by the maker. Brouwer v. Hill, 1 Sandf. 629.

The surrender of premium notes and canceled policies on receipt of a certain percentage of the amount of notes, which the directors have acquired to be collected ceasing to insure property, when they vote that such percentage would pay all the prior losses of the company, will not relieve the members whose policies are surrendered from liability for pre-existing losses which the assessments were insufficient to pay. Doane v. Millville Mut. M. & F. Ins. Co. 45 N. J. Eq. 274, Reversing 43 N. J. Eq. 522.

The surrender of a premium note, although made without any payment by the member at the time of the surrender, when the party supposed there were no valid claims to which he was subject, was held binding on the company, even if some contested claims which it was thought could not be established proved to be binding obligations. The court says: "Proof that the parties were mistaken in judgment concerning the validity of the claims could not annul the adjustment." One of the judges dissented from this decision on the ground that the statute entitled the member to receive his note only upon payment of his just proportion of all losses and expenses, and that the surrender of his note without any consideration and without the payment in fact of his just proportion of existing liabilities should not be binding as against a receiver of the company which had become insolvent. Hyde v. Lynde, 4 N. Y. 387.

Under a contract by which a note is given for premiums in advance on the organization of the company, and the maker is to have the right to pay the note by premiums on insurance taken by him or others whom he procured to take it, his liability on the note is terminated when it has been surrendered to him on payment thereof in the manner agreed. Whether the charter authorized such an arrangement or not, and whether or not the person who made the agreement on behalf of the company before its incorporation had authority to do so was held immaterial after the corporation itself had received the consideration agreed upon and had surrendered the note. It was held to be then too late to substitute a different agreement in favor of a receiver of the company. Emmett v. Reed, 8 N. Y. 312.

Members cannot be allowed to surrender their policies and withdraw from a mutual fire insurance company and thereby escape liability for the losses and expenses which they assumed by their membership because each member makes a contract not only with the corporation itself but with every other member thereof. Detroit Mfrs. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Merrill, 101 Mich. 393; Manlove v. Bender, 39 Ind. 271, 13 Am. Rep. 280.

A vote of the directors canceling all outstanding policies, to take effect on a certain day, does not so effectively destroy the company and terminate their office as to prevent them from making an assessment on deposit notes at a subsequent date. Fayette Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fuller, 8 Allen, 27.

The acceptance of the surrender of a policy and its cancelation by an authorized agent of a mutual company will terminate the liability of the member to assessments on obligations subsequently accruing. Cumberland Valley Mut. Protection Ins. Co. v. Herbert, 2 W. N. C. 155.

The surrender of a policy in a mutual company under an agreement that it shall be canceled terminates the liability of the member to assessments for liabilities subsequently accruing, although it leaves him liable to assessment for liabilities which accrued during his membership. Akers v. Hite, 94 Pa. 394, 39 Am. Rep. 792; Campbell v. Adams, 38 Barb. 132.

As to liability of assignee, see New Hampshire Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hunt, 30 N. H. 219, supra, II., b.

The cancelation of a policy does not release the holder from his liability as a member of a mutual fire insurance company under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 58, § 54, to assessment within two years for losses which occurred while he was a member. Com. v. Mechanics' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 192.

To complete a withdrawal by a member of a mutual fire insurance company his policy must be actually surrendered, and it is not sufficient that he and the secretary of the company understood that he was withdrawing, where the charter provides that he may withdraw by returning the policy and payment of his obligations. Schroeder v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 87 Mich. 310.

A surrender of policies to one of the directors for cancelation on a promise by the board of directors to cancel them and return the stock notes, and the payment of all just liabilities up to that time, terminates the liabilities of a member of the company. Akers v. Hite, 94 Pa. 394, 39 Am. Rep. 792.

A member of a mutual insurance company who gave notice to have his policy canceled during the time in which he had a right to have it canceled was held to terminate his membership and prevent subsequent liability when he received no reply from the company and supposed that his policy was canceled. The mere notice is sufficient to terminate the insurance in such a case. Home Ins. Co. v. Burnett, 26 Mo. App. 175.

A member of a mutual insurance company who pays a cancelation fee but neglects to pay an assessment which is due and which he is required to pay in order to sever his membership still remains liable as a member, although he has surrendered his policy. Burmood v. Farmers' Union Ins. Co. 42 Neb. 598.

Surrenders of premium and deposit notes made without requiring the holders to pay their proportionate share of losses cannot be set up long afterwards and after the company has become insolvnot be canceled because the company without authority issued policies in fixed amounts for cash premiums so long as there is a liability for losses to persons insured on the mutual plan.

ent as a defense to the collection by the receiver of assessments on the existing members, as this would necessarily force him into interminable litigation with the makers of the surrendered notes. Davis v. Parcher & J. & A. Stewart Co. 82 Wis. 495.

On the surrender of his policy by a member of a mutual fire insurance company, with payment subsequently of an assessment made after the surrender which more than paid all his liabilities up to the time when his policy was canceled, if the assessment had been fully collected, he was discharged from further liability, although the fact that some of the assessments against other persons were uncollectible left a portion of the liabilities incurred while he was a member still unpaid. Tolford v. Church, 66 Mich. 440.

So, the surrender of a policy by a member of a mutual fire insurance company with full payment of the only assessment outstanding against him which covered all losses existing at the time it was made, with a further amount for estimated expenses and shortages, is sufficient to terminate his liability as a member, although by reason of unexpected shortages in collecting the assessment from other members a deficiency remains unprovided for. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Spaulding, 61 Mich. 77.

The surrender of a policy and payment of all assessments made at the time by a member who had a right to withdraw under the charter of the company by surrendering his policy and paying "his proportion of all assessments to which this company is liable at the time of his withdrawal" does not relieve him from liability for subsequent assessments to pay disputed losses which were in litigation at the time of the cancelation. Ionia, E. & B. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Otto, 96 Mich. 558, Rehearing denied in 97 Mich. 522.

A letter from the secretary to an assignee of a policy in a mutual insurance company referring to an assessment and saying that the company cancels all policies on which the assessment is not paid within thirty days, and that if he has paid the agent he is all right, if not the company will renew the policy when it is paid, is properly construed to be a notice of cancelation of the policy and relieves the assignee of subsequent liability as a member of the company when he acts on that construction of it and returns the policy to the assignor, obtains other insurance, and informs the company of the fact. Columbia Ins. Co. v. Masonheimer, 76 Pa. 138.

The fact that the directors declared a policy void for nonpayment of assessments which were invalid does not terminate the liability of the holder to assessments thereon, since the policy itself remains valid. Re People's Mut. Eq. F. Ins. Co. 9 Allen, 319.

A notice of a vote to suspend the insurance of a member in a mutual company because of his nonpayment of an assessment, if ineffectual to prevent the continuation of his insurance, does not constitute a defense against assessments upon his premium note when he has not consented to terminate the policy until it expired. New England Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Butler, 34 Me. 451. See also infra, VII., d, as to member's default.

b. By loss and payment of insurance.

The fact that the insured property of a member of a mutual company is destroyed long previous to the expiration of his policy does not relieve him from liability to assessment upon his premium note for any losses incurred during the term of the policy, where the charter of the company provides for liability in proportion to the deposit note and makes the insured property subject to a lien in the nature of a mortgage to secure the deposit note which shall continue during the policy. Bangs v. Skidmore, 21 N. Y. 136, Affirming 24 Barb. 29.

A member who receives payment of a total loss upon his policy and surrenders it remains liable to assessments on his premium note where that has been retained by the company. Boot & S. Mfrs. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Melrose Orthodox Cong. Soc. 117 Mass. 199.

Where property was insured in a mutual company for six years and was totally destroyed the second year, it was held that the insured was liable to pay all legal assessments on his premium note until the expiration of six years in the same manner as though the property had not been destroyed, and cannot insist as a condition of such liability upon having a new structure erected in place of the old one insured. New Hampshire Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Rand, 24 N. H. 428.

The right to assess premium notes during the term of a policy in a mutual company, although after the destruction of the property insured, is also sustained in Swamscot Mach. Co. v. Partridge, 25 N. H. 369.

c. By transfer of property insured.

Alienation of property insured in a mutual company by which the insurance is terminated, together with the surrender of a policy for cancelation, will relieve the member from future liability. Niagara Dist. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gordon, 29 U. C. C. P. 611.

The authorities do not agree as to the effect of a sale of the property which avoids the insurance upon the liability of the vendor as a member of the company.

Thus, it was held in Pennsylvania that a member of a mutual insurance company who by sale of the insured property terminates the policy thereby ceases to be a member or to be liable for subsequent losses. Wilson v. Trumbull Mut. F. Ins. Co. 19 Pa. 372.

But in a later case it is said that while this might be so in the absence of a contract to the contrary, the destruction of the buildings insured and a sale of the land does not, without any surrender of the policy, terminate the liability of a member of a mutual company to assessment during the term of his policy, where it stipulates for payment of assessments during that term and provides for a surrender of the policy in case of a sale of the property. Thropp v. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. 125 Pa. 427.

And in Massachusetts it was held that the alienation of his insured property by a member of a mutual insurance company without surrendering his policy or transferring it to the purchaser of the property leaves him still a member of the company, subject to assessments, although by a by-law of the company the policy becomes void by the

Kinne, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The record in the case is voluminous, and the facts quite complicated. We shall endeavor to state as precisely as possible the facts touching the organization and manner of doing business of the defendant company. In February, 1887, a notice, signed by James P. Sherman, one of the incorporators of defendant company, was published stating in substance that said Sherman and his associates would organize a corporation to be known as the Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company, "for the purpose of mutual insurance against loss by fire or tornado among its members, by mutual obligations given therefor;" that the association would commence business March 17, 1887, and continue twenty years; that the place of business should be Waterloo, Iowa; that the business should be conducted by a board of directors, elected as provided in articles of incor-transfer of the property. Cumings v. Sawyer, 117 Mass. 30.

In Indiana it was first decided that liability on a premium note is not terminated until the actual surrender of the policy and the payment of all assessments for losses sustained before the surrender, although the policy has become void by sale or mortgage of the insured property and the lien of the company on the property lost. Indiana Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Coquillard, 2 Ind. 645; McCulloch v. Indiana Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Blackf. 50.

But directly overruling the previous decisions, it is decided in Indiana Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Conner, 5 Ind. 170, that liability on a premium note ceases, except as to assessments for losses previously incurred, when the policy becomes void by reason of a transfer of the property, even if the policy is not surrendered for cancelation in accordance with the requirement of the charter.

So, in New York the forfeiture of the insurance of a member in a mutual company by sale of property insured without any surrender of his policy and payment of his proportion of the existing liabilities as required to terminate his relation to the company does not relieve him from liability for losses subsequently occurring. Hyatt v. Wait, 37 Barb. 29.

A clause in the charter of the company declaring persons insured therein "so long as they shall be insured in said company, shall be and continue members thereof, and no longer" is held insufficient to relieve the member from liability merely because he avoids his policy by alienating the property. Ibid.

A member is entitled to receive back his note given to a mutual insurance company in consideration of the policy when by alienation of the property the insurance has become void, although he takes back a chattel mortgage to secure the purchase money, and the charter provides that in such case he may surrender his policy and receive back his deposit note. Miner v. Judson, 2 Hun, 441.

A resolution of a mutual insurance company that when an insured had alienated his property before any loss was sustained his premium note should not be assessed, although he had not surrendered his policy, constitutes a waiver of compliance with charter provisions requiring the policy to be surrendered, and dispenses with the formality of a surrender, when there are no losses to be paid in case of such alienation of property. Huntley v. Beecher, 30 Barb. 580.

d. By member's default.

Forfeiture of membership of a mutual insurance company by nonpayment of assessments does not relieve a member from existing liabilities on his premium note. St. Louis Mut. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Boeckler, 19 Mo. 135; Iowa State Ins. Co. v. Prosses, 11 Iowa, 115; Dettra v. Murray, 5 Pa. Dist. R. 201; Insurance Co. v. Sorter, 1 Clev. Rep. 133 (Walker & Bates' Ohio Dig. vol. 3, p. 313, ¶ 48).

Failure to pay an assessment within the time required, which by the terms of the policy made it void, does not ipso facto avoid the policy so that a later assessment cannot be lawfully made on the premium note if the policy has not been surrendered or canceled and no demand made for the premium note. Columbia Ins. Co. v. Buckley, 83 Pa. 293, 24 Am. Rep. 172.

In case of default on a premium note given to a mutual fire insurance company to pay a gross premium for a term of five years, the note may be enforced, where there is nothing in the policy to show an intent to permit the insured to withdraw from his obligations. Minnesota Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Asso. v. Olson, 43 Minn. 21.

Failure to pay annual interest and assessments on a premium note for which the policy may be forfeited does not relieve the policy holder from subsequent assessments, if such failure is waived by the company. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Leavy, 136 Pa. 499.

The effect on the liability created by premium notes of a default which suspends the policy during default is a question which seems to be unaffected by the character of the company, whether mutual or otherwise, and is therefore not included in the present note. An illustration of the case is furnished by Phenix Ins. Co. v. Rollins, 44 Neb. 745.

A member of a mutual insurance company cannot defeat his own liability on his premium note by setting up the falsity of his own statements in his application for the insurance for which the company might have avoided the policy, where it did not do so. Huntley v. Perry, 38 Barb. 569.

Under a provision that members must have their property revalued once in seven years in order to continue their insurance, but on such revaluation making the insurance continue under the original policy, the failure of a member to have such revaluation made will not release him from liability to the society. The court says: "It is certainly much more reasonable that he should be subject to a loss or inconvenience for his own neglect, than that he should be released from his liability to the society in consequence of it." Korn v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 192, 3 L. ed. 195.

e. By termination of company.

The fact that the charter of a mutual insurance company expires by its own limitation during the life of the policy does not avoid the policy or discharge the insured from his liability upon the premium note. Huntley v. Beecher, 30 Barb. 580.

The failure of a mutual insurance company does not constitute a failure of consideration so as to defeat an action for pre-existing obligations on a premium note given by a member of the company Conigland v. North Carolina Mut. L. Ins. Co. Phill. Eq. 341, 98 Am. Dec. 89; Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 116; Sterling v. Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co. 32 Pa. 75, 72 Am. Dec. 773; Vanatta v. poration and by-laws; that the guaranty fund or capital stock should not exceed $50,000, to be paid as ordered by the directors and required by the articles and by-laws; that the highest indebtedness of the association, except for insurance liability, should not exceed $10,000, and private property of the incorporators should be exempt from corporate liability. After and prior to March 17, 1887, defendants signed and acknowledged articles of incorporation, which were recorded in the office of the recorder of Black Hawk county and with the secretary of state. These articles seem never to have been formally adopted at a meeting of the corporators, but were, as we have said, signed and assented to by them, and always acted upon as such. In substance they provided that the association was formed for the purpose of mutual insurance "upon our property and that of all other persons who may become members of this association by the giving of mutual

But the appointment of a receiver for a mutual insurance company which has become insolvent cancels existing policies and precludes any assessments for premiums which were unearned at the time of the insolvency. Davis v. Shearer, 90 Wis. 250.

When a note is given for the nominal premium on an open policy to cover risks to be afterwards indorsed thereon, the premiums upon which are to be settled and the terms of insurance fixed when the indorsement is made, the company or its receiver cannot recover in case of insolvency any more than the premiums actually earned. Lawrence v. McCready, 6 Bosw. 329; Elwell v. Crocker, 4 Bosw. 22.

But when notes are given as part of the capital stock of a mutual insurance company under the New York act 1849, § 5, they are valid and collectible by the company or its receiver whether the maker has actually obtained any insurance for such notes or not. Elwell v. Crocker, 4 Bosw. 22.

Such a note given for premiums in advance to a mutual insurance company under charter authority is treated as a statutory security, the validity of which is not dependent upon any question of consideration and is therefore held valid for the whole amount of the note as an asset of the company in case of its insolvency, although the premiums on insurances actually received by the maker did not amount to the whole sum for which the note was given. Deraismes v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 1 N. Y. 371.

And notes given as an advance for premiums on policies of insurance which the makers agreed to take thereafter, when given under charter authority which provides that the company may negotiate such notes for the purpose of paying claims or otherwise in the course of its business and that a compensation not exceeding 5 per cent per annum may be allowed to the signers, were held collectible by a receiver of the company which had become insolvent notwithstanding the makers had never taken any insurance in consideration of the notes. Brown v. Crooke, 4 N. Y. 51. The court approves the above case of Deraismes v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. as being identical in principle with the case in hand, although in the later case the notes were given as new notes after the company had been carrying on business, while in the Deraismes case the note was one of those given to aid the organization of the company.

Where a portion of a note given for advance premiums and security of dealers has been earned by insurance, the remainder continues a valid obligation on the insolvency of the company. Hone v. Allen, 1 Sandf. 171, note.

The insolvency of the company at the time a person became a member thereof does not prevent his being liable as a member if the rights of other parties have become involved. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Bergstresser, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 646, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 771.

VIII. Liability of guaranty members.

The right of the company to raise a guaranty fund is considered here only so far as it involves the liability of members.

The raising of a guaranty capital as additional security for the payment of losses which was not authorized by the charter was held, in Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. v. McKelway, 12 N. J. Eq. 133, to be invalid and a contributor to such capital who gave a bond and mortgage to secure his contribution was held to have a good defense to an assessment thereon for losses which the guaranty capital was intended to secure. This decision is based on a strict application of the rule that a corporation cannot exercise any powers not expressly given in its charter or necessary to the exercise of the powers therein enumerated and given.

On the other hand, in Iowa it is held that guaranty fund notes executed to furnish money to a mutual insurance company for temporary use in paying its legitimate expenses and losses, the amount so paid to be refunded from money realized from assessments duly made on obligations given by members for insurance, are valid and binding on those executing them, notwithstanding the illegality of a provision in the articles of incorporation of such company that the makers of such notes shall be members and the directors shall be selected from them alone. Berry v. Anchor Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Iowa) 62 N. W. 681.

In deciding the right of guaranty members to a surplus fund in the stock department of a mutual company which had two distinct departments, it was said that the risk and liability of guaranty members were the same as if the stock department was a separate company and was not connected with the mutual department in any way. Traders & M. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 142 Mass. 403.

An assessment on a premium note is a condition precedent to recovery thereon, when it is given as a mere premium or deposit note payable at such times as the directors may require, as distinguished from notes given as security to enable the company to do business. Sands v. St. John, 36 Barb. 628; Savage v. Medbury, 19 N. Y. 32; Toll v. Whitney, 18 How. Pr. 161; Great Falls Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 45 N. H. 292.

And a member of a mutual insurance company is not liable to an action upon his deposit note where he is not in default in paying any assessment lawfully made thereon. Williams v. Lakey, 15 How. Pr. 206.

A receiver cannot proceed to collect the whole amount of the deposit notes without making any assessment although he is substituted for the directors in respect to the power to collect such notes, where the note is by its terms payable "as the directors may agreeably to their charter and by-laws require." Shaughnessy v. Rensselaer Ins. Co. 21 Barb. 605; Williams v. Babcock, 25 Barb. 109; Devendorf v. Beardsley, Id. 656.

Proof of an order or requirement by the directors of a mutual insurance company for the pay-pledges thereof." They also provided the corporation should have the right to sue and be sued, to have a seal, to render the interests of shareholders transferable, to exempt the private property of members from liability for corporate debts, to make contracts, acquire and transfer property, make rules and regulations for the management of its business; that its principal place of business should be Waterloo. That its business should be conducted by a board of directors chosen by the guarantors or shareholders from among their members as required by the by-laws. That said guaranty fund or obligation should not exceed $50,000 in shares of $100 each, transferable among members upon the books of the company and that fund might be increased by vote of two thirds of the holders thereof, and that each share should be entitled to one vote upon all questions affecting the interests of the association. That it should be subject to assessment by the board of diment of all or a portion of a premium note is necessary to obtain a recovery thereof, when the note is payable at such time or times as the directors may agreeably to the charter and by-laws require. Warner v. Beem, 36 Iowa, 385.

An ex parte order of court that a receiver sue for the whole unpaid balance on premium notes which were made payable as the directors might require is not sufficient to show any liability, but an assessment on the notes is a condition precedent to any right of action upon them. Williams v. Lakey, supra.

But a note given in advance to enable the company to begin business is held in White v. Haight, 16 N. Y. 310, to be absolute and payable at all events without any assessment. It is held that these notes are to be considered as capital, operative of themselves and not on account of the happening of another event, such as the occurrence of losses, and may be transferred or collected not only to pay losses but otherwise to obtain money for any other lawful purpose. In this case such a note was held collectible by a receiver after the insolvency of the company and assessment amounting to the whole of the note which had been confirmed by the court.

The decision in White v. Haight, supra, to the effect that a promissory note made to aid the formation of a mutual insurance company under the New York act of 1849 is absolute and payable at all events without any assessment, is followed in Bell v. McElwain, 18 How. Pr. 150; White v. Foster, 18 How. Pr. 151; Hart v. Achilles, 28 Barb. 576.

And in Massachusetts when liability of a member of a mutual fire insurance company under its by-laws constitutes a part of the absolute funds of the company, no assessment is required although the member promises to pay on demand in such sums as may be called for by a vote of the directors or by the treasurer. Shawmut Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 9 Allen, 332; Long Pond Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Houghton, 6 Gray, 82.

Proof of losses and of an assessment is not necessary to recovery by a mutual insurance company upon a premium note payable in instalments absolutely at specified times, when it, with a certain cash payment, was made as the premium for a policy not issued on the plan of mutual insurance, and the company is entitled to issue such policies under its charter. Davenport F. Ins. Co. v. Moore, 50 Iowa, 619.

See also Nashua F. Ins. Co. v. Moore, infra, IX. k, 3.

b. Who can make.

An assessment made by a minority of a board of directors as a committee who made it in a less sum than the board of directors had voted should be assessed was held illegal, where the charter of a mutual fire insurance company provided that the directors should settle and determine losses. Monmouth Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Lowell, 59 Me. 504.

An assessment can be made by the directors only, where the act of incorporation of a mutual company provides that after receiving notice of any loss or damage and ascertaining the sum, or after rendition of any judgment against the company therefor, the directors shall settle and determine the sum to be paid by the several members thereof as their respective portions of such loss, which shall always be in proportion to the original amount of their deposit notes. Therefore an assessment made by the treasurer with the assistance of another person, no report of which was submitted to the directors or any ratification thereof made by them, is invalid. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Chase, 56 N. H. 341.

A resolution by the directors that the treasurer be authorized to give up premium notes of any person who has paid all assessments and dues does not amount to a ratification of an assessment made by persons other than the directors. Ibid.

In respect to assessments not made by the directors themselves the court distinguishes the case of Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sanders, 36 N. H. 252, in which the court said the assessment was a matter of mere arithmetical computation, analogous to the vote of a town for raising a tax, while in the Chase Case it says: "It can hardly be said that to make such an assessment as the referee in this case describes in his report was a matter of mere arithmetical computation which called for no exercise of discretion on the part of the directors." This assessment was found by the referee to include, among other things, about $1,600 for making the same and for estimated future expenses, for salaries of officers, for attending courts, and for printing and advertising.

The statutory power of a receiver of a mutual insurance company to make assessments upon premium notes is upheld in Hyatt v. McMahon, 25 Barb. 457, against the claim that such a statute was unconstitutional and void as to pre-existing notes. The court considers this contention to be conclusively answered by the general power of repeal reserved in the charter and general statute of incorporation.

The assessment of premium notes which by 36 Vict. chap. 44, O, §§ 41, 43, is to be made by the directors cannot by order of court be made by a master or receiver, especially where the statutory provision authorizing it to be done by a receiver has been omitted from the statute on revision. Hill v. Merchants' & Mfrs. Ins. Co. 28 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 560.

A receiver may lawfully make an assessment on a premium note under the Pennsylvania act of May 1, 1876, which authorizes him to do all acts which might be done by the corporation. Solly v. Moore, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 333.

A voluntary assignee for creditors of a mutual insurance company cannot make a valid assessment on a premium note which is payable as the directors may require. Hurlbut v. Root, 12 How. Pr. 511.

An assignee for creditors of a mutual insurance company does not succeed to the powers of the corporation or of its directors, and has no authority to make an assessment upon premium notes even when they constitute the only assets of the company. Hurlbut v. Carter, 21 Barb. 221.

But directors of a mutual company have power rectors, not exceeding 10 per cent in any six months, for the purpose of meeting losses and expenses for which the association may be liable, but only when there was not sufficient money raised from assessments or pledges of members to pay such losses when due; and all moneys so paid from said fund were to be regarded as advancements, and were to be paid from the funds of the association, as ordered by the directors. The directors were to select from their own number, or from the guarantors, the officers. That the fund of the association to pay losses and the necessary expenses shall consist exclusively of moneys raised by assessment on mutual pledges given by the members for their insurance, which assessment shall be made only by the directors or executive committee, and may be limited by the by-laws. All persons insuring in the association become members thereof during the period of their insurance. Afterwards the company

c. Who to be assessed.

A qualified membership may exist after the termination of a policy of insurance which will sustain a liability on a premium note for an assessment and for the whole amount of the note in default of payment of the assessment as required by charter. Hyatt v. Esmond, 37 Barb. 601. See also main case of IONIA, E. & B. FARMERS' MUT. F. INS. CO. v. IONIA CIRCUIT JUDGE.

One assessed by a mutual insurance company cannot complain that others who are not liable are also assessed, since he is not injured thereby. Re Slater Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 R. I. 42.

Directors of a mutual insurance company in making assessments do not act judicially where the charter provides that members shall be bound to pay in proportion to the amount of their deposit notes, and their assessment is invalid if they assume the discretion to omit from assessment some members who are liable. Herkimer County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Fuller, 14 Barb. 373. They cannot take into account the length of time for which a person has been a member as affecting his liability to an assessment.

The omission from an assessment by a mutual fire insurance company of some of the members who are known to be liable makes it invalid as to others. Swing v. H. C. Akeley Lumber Co. (Minn.) 25 Ins. L. J. 303.

An assessment on a portion only of the members liable thereto when the rest are intentionally omitted, although with the intent to assess them afterwards, is held invalid as a departure from the provisions of the statute which requires assessments in proportion to the amount of premiums and deposits and there did not appear any obvious necessity for such departure. Marblehead Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hayward, 3 Gray, 208.

Members who give deposit notes subject to assessment for insurance in a mutual company which has power to issue policies on the cash plan also cannot defend against assessments on the ground that they are made upon deposit notes only and not also upon the members who are insured on the cash plan. Schimpf v. Lehigh Valley Mut. Ins. Co. 86 Pa. 373.

An assessment made upon the remaining notes after the directors had canceled such of the stock notes of a mutual insurance company as the company deemed to be worthless was held valid, where the company was authorized to cancel the worthless notes and its corporate powers had been vested in the board of directors. Marine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Neal, 50 Me. 301.

An agreement that an advance note should be subject to assessments "at an equal per cent with all other advancements" is to be taken in connection with a by-law of the company which permits the cancelation of advance notes whenever the company deems it to be for its own interests to cancel them, and therefore the remaining notes after such cancelation constitute all the notes that are required to be assessed. Maine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Swanton, 49 Me. 448.

A note stipulating for the payment of annual interest but upon which no interest has ever been paid is not entitled to the benefit of a by-law providing that notes upon which the interest has been paid in advance shall not be assessed until after other notes have been assessed to an amount equal to the interest paid. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Leavy, 136 Pa. 499; Crawford v. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 653.

As to who are liable as members, see also supra, II.

d. Marshaling funds.

Under by-laws providing that directors may make such assessments as may be necessary, where there is no provision declaring premium and deposit notes to be absolute funds of the company and as such to be first applied to the payment of losses and expenses, the prior application of such premium and deposit notes is not necessary before making an assessment under the statute. Fayette Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fuller, 8 Allen, 27.

The deposit notes should first be exhausted before resorting to the further liability imposed by Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 58, §§ 48, 54, upon the policy holders as members of the corporation. Com. v. Monitor Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 150; Appleton Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Jesser, 5 Allen, 446.

Under a by-law of a mutual fire insurance company that each member shall pay the premium and deposit his written agreement to hold himself liable for an equal amount in the capital stock of the company to be assessed and collected by the directors in such sums and at such times as they shall deem expedient, making all premiums and deposits thus paid in the absolute funds of the company pledged to pay expenses, borrowed money, and losses, and further providing that in case losses happen so as to consume the absolute fund each member shall be held to pay a certain further sum, the absolute funds must be exhausted before any further assessment is made. Appleton Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Jesser, supra.

Earned premiums that are uncollectible and worthless may properly be regarded as "used up" within the meaning of a by-law providing for an assessment to pay losses "after the earned premiums shall have been used up." Whether the claims were worthless was held to be a question of fact for the jury. Marine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Neal, 50 Me. 301.

The other assets of the company are "exhausted," within the meaning of a provision that notes given for premiums in advance as additional security shall be liable for losses after the cash capital and other resources are exhausted, when it clearly appears that these resources are insufficient to pay published a notice of incorporation, containing the matters required in such notices, and, in addition thereto, the following: "The said corporation, by its articles of incorporation and by-laws, authorizes and provides for a guaranty fund, not to exceed $50,000 consisting of limiting individual pledges made by certain of the incorporators and other members, which shall be paid as ordered by the directors, and as required in said contracts and by-laws;" also providing that the private property of subscribers to said fund should be exempt from the debts of the corporation, except to the extent and in accordance with the terms and conditions of their respective pledges. Said guaranty pledge provided: "I promise to take the number of shares of said fund set opposite my name, at $100 per share, payable on the order of the board of directors of said association, provided not to exceed 10 per cent thereof shall be payable in any six months, the liabilities and it is not necessary that the other assets should all be collected and applied before resorting to such notes. Osgood v. Toole, 60 N. Y. 475, affirming 1 Hun, 167.

Moneys received as cash premiums by a company lawfully doing business upon both mutual and stock plans, and properly used to pay losses and expenses to that extent, relieve from assessments members whose premium notes are then held, and the effect is to cast the greater burden upon those whose notes may happen to be in force thereafter when the company becomes insolvent; but there is no remedy for any injustice which may result from this mode of transacting the business of the company. Shaughnessy v. Rensselaer Ins. Co. 21 Barb. 605.

In the absence of any charter provision to the contrary effect, under a provision which fixes the burden of a loss at any particular time upon those who are then members of the company, the proceeds of insurance on the cash plan are subject to the same application as premium notes received during the same period. The cash premium belongs precisely where the premium note whose place it takes would belong and is subject to the same appropriation, with this modification, that it must be first applied and no part of it can be withdrawn upon the expiration of the policy although it should not have been all expended. Therefore the cash premiums cannot be lawfully applied to pre-existing liabilities of the company so as to leave the premium notes given in the same period that the cash premiums were taken subject to assessment for all the losses accruing during that period without the application of the same premiums to reduce them. Ohio Mut. Ins. Co. v. Marietta Woolen Factory, 3 Ohio St. 348.

The failure of the directors to comply strictly with the by-laws and credit the makers of notes the net profits of a certain year is immaterial, where all the profits were much less than the losses during the period which had to be considered, although for that particular year there were some net profits. Marine Mut. M. Ins. Co. v. Neal, 50 Me. 301.

e. How and when made.

Failure to pay an assessment does not work a forfeiture of the policy in a mutual company unless the assessment was made in accordance with the charter. Planters' Ins. Co. v. Comfort, 50 Miss. 662.

No part of an assessment can be recovered where it was partly invalid and the notice was for the assessment as an entirety. Victoria Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Thomson, 9 Ont. App. Rep. 620.

A by-law which makes all members liable to assessment for losses when their policies are in force at the time of the assessment, and all members whose policies have expired liable for unpaid losses which existed at the time of the expiration, is binding on the directors in making an assessment, and must be followed by them. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gackenbach, 115 Pa. 492.

The plain provisions of the charter of a mutual insurance company must be followed by the directors in making an assessment for losses, even if they deem some other rule more equitable. Slater Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Barstow, 8 R. I. 343.

Assessments upon members of mutual fire insurance companies cannot be graduated by the age of the policy under a provision that they shall be made "in proportion to their premium and deposit." Com. v. Mechanics' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 192.

The equitable assessment of all the notes held by a company which is provided for by by-law in a certain contingency is properly made by assessing them upon the basis of the rating of the risk and not by percentage upon the face of the notes, where some of the notes were made with annual interest and others were made without interest, and in a sum much larger than those which bore interest. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Leavy, 136 Pa. 499.

Mere errors of miscalculation constituting a variance between notices of assessment and the amounts proved on trial will not destroy the claim for the assessment. Thropp v. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. 125 Pa. 427.

An assessment made upon all the polices of a mutual company to pay the unpaid salary of its president and bills of lawyers for professional services, if substantially correct, will not be held invalid even if it is not mathematically exact and is not so apportioned that each member will have to pay exactly his proportion for the services performed during the term of his policy. Tobey v. Russell, 9 R. I. 58.

A slight disproportion occasioned by laying an assessment on deposit notes only instead of the amount of the premiums and deposit notes will not invalidate an assessment on premium notes which call for payment at such times as the directors may, agreeably to their by-laws, require, where the by-laws provide that the deposit note shall be double the premium, and that on all policies for less than a year the deposit note may be for such a sum as the president may determine. It is said that the only cases in which any practical difference would result are those of a small number of policies issued for less than a year. People's Mut. Ins. Co. v. Allen, 10 Gray, 297.

Where an ascertained liability was found to exist on a certain day, and it was impracticable to assess this amount if strictly confined to policies in existence when the items of this liability accrued, an assessment upon all the policies outstanding at the time this amount was ascertained in proportion to the time of their existence and the amount of their premiums was sustained as the nearest approximation to the correct result. Re People's Mut. Eq. F. Ins. Co. 9 Allen, 319.

A division of the total expenses for a year into twelve equal parts and adding to each part the amount of losses for a certain month and assessing this upon the policies in existence during that month was sustained as substantially correct. Ibid.

and provided the whole amount of my subscription shall be void, at my option, after three years from" February 24, 1887. The sum of $50,000 was subscribed to this fund. In no other respect was the law touching insurance companies as found in Code, §§ 1122–1131, and other sections relating to stock companies, complied with.

The company proceeded to transact a general insurance business, taking all kinds and classes of risks, issuing several kinds of policies, upon amounts received in cash and partly in cash and partly in notes; and sometimes, when cash policies were issued, and the money therefor was not paid at the time, a promissory note was taken in lieu of cash. Policies were also issued upon the mutual plan, and a note, incorporated in the application, was taken for the amount of the premium, and an assessment for one sixth of said amount, or one year's premium, was collected in advance, and annually thereafter.

policy terminated and exclude that in which it commenced does not make the assessment invalid. People's Mut. Ins. Co. v. Allen, supra.

A reasonable approximation to equality is sufficient in making an assessment, where exact equality cannot be obtained. Citizens' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sortwell, 10 Allen, 110; Fayette Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fuller, 8 Allen, 27.

The approximation to an assessment upon several losses as they occur is sufficient without making an assessment upon every loss however insignificant in amount. Marblehead Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Underwood, 3 Gray, 210.

Computations for assessments need not be made upon the occasion of each loss, but may be made upon a rule that will approximate to it as near as is practicable and reasonable. New England Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Belknap, 9 Cush. 140.

When several losses occur at the same time and so nearly together that the same notes are liable to be assessed for the payment of them all but one assessment is necessary. Shaughnessy v. Rensselaer Ins. Co. 21 Barb. 605.

An assessment may be made upon estimates of liabilities without any reference having been made to determine definitely the amount thereof. Davis v. Parcher & J. & A. Stewart Co. 82 Wis. 495.

Estimates of losses after a great fire in a city, based on the knowledge of the company's risks in that city before the actual liabilities had been fully ascertained, may constitute a sufficient basis for an assessment. Hummel's Appeal, 78 Pa. 320.

But an examination and determination of the amount of losses and expenses to which a note is liable to contribute, and of the whole amount of notes liable to assessment therefor, must be made by the directors of a mutual insurance company or by the receivers before they can make any assessment on such notes, and the omission of the assessment required by the contract cannot be supplied by proof on the trial showing that an assessment might properly have been made. Sands v. Graves, 58 N. Y. 94.

The amount of claims which the receiver of a mutual insurance company or the court will allow as just demands against the company, together with an indebtedness previously allowed by the directors of the company as shown by their books, must be ascertained before an assessment can be made to pay such indebtedness. Downs v. Hammond, 47 Ind. 131; Embree v. Shideler, 36 Ind. 423.

A simple ascertainment of the rate per cent for making an assessment, without completing and consummating the assessment by carrying out the amount which each member is to pay upon an extension book, does not make a valid assessment, and a notice given thereupon is premature. Bangs v. McIntosh, 23 Barb. 591.

An assessment stating the rate per cent at which the premium notes in force at specified dates are respectively assessed is not insufficient because it does not specify the name of a party bound to contribute nor the amount of his notes. The parties interested possess, or are deemed to possess, the means of reducing the notice to a certainty. Bangs v. Duckinfield, 18 N. Y. 592.

A general assessment and notice that every premium note in each class is assessed for its full amount is sufficient as to a note in a class in which the losses exceed the amount of all the notes, especially if the losses of the company exceed what is collectible on all notes of all classes. The particulars of the assets and debts need not be stated in the assessment. Sands v. Sanders, 26 N. Y. 239.

An assessment on a premium note given to a mutual fire insurance company is held within the power of the directors at any regular meeting without prior notice that the assessment would be made, although one by-law prescribes: "In case an assessment be needed for any purpose the directors shall have power to order such assessment at any meeting called for that purpose,"—as the intent of this provision is to provide for exceptional cases and not to negative the ordinary power of the directors. Bay State Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sawyer, 12 Cush. 64.

An assessment or call made at a meeting of a board of directors was held to be void when the only directors present were persons who had not been legally chosen as directors, but had been voted for to increase the board at a meeting called for a different purpose. People's Mut. Ins. Co. v. Westcott, 14 Gray, 440.

The record need not affirmatively show that a quorum of the members were present as required by a by-law of a mutual insurance company at the time when a statute was accepted where the contrary does not appear and the record shows that the meeting was duly called and proper notice given. Citizens' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sortwell, 8 Allen, 217.

A vote by directors of a mutual insurance company is a sufficient requirement of a payment to be made on a premium note under a charter providing that all assessments shall be determined by them. Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sanders, 36 N. H. 252.

A resolution by a board of directors of a mutual insurance company levying a certain percentage on the premium notes of all the members but without specifying their names or the precise sum required to be paid by each may constitute a good and valid assessment. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Rought, 97 Pa. 415.

But an assessment specifying different rates for "small notes" and "large notes" without showing how these notes are distinguished from each other or how it is to be determined which class will include any particular note is insufficient. Bangs v. Duckinfield, 18 N. Y. 592.

The annual assessment enforceable by a penalty provided for by a New Hampshire statute which authorized the company to require a a certain per cent to be paid by a member before his policy was issued and thereafter make an annual assessment not exceeding the original sum paid in was held in Rix v. Mutual Ins. Co. 20 N. H. 198, to be something different from a call for a payment of a portion of a note given for the deposit or premium on which the policy was issued.

In an equity case the court, while relieving the plaintiff from the effects of a supposed forfeiture, imposed on him the condition of treating a resolution to wind up the affairs of the company as hav-

Each note provided that not more than one sixth of the amount should be assessed against the maker in any one year. In these cases applications were made by the insured. In cases where cash was taken for insurance, or notes in lieu of it, no applications were made by the insured. Such policies were ordinarily issued upon a daily report from the agent soliciting the risk. In some cases applications were taken with an instalment note incorporated therein, providing in terms for the payment of the premium in fixed annual instalments. The policies in form were like those issued by regular mutual and stock companies. All policies provided for cancelation by the company,—in one mutual form by tendering to the assured a ratable proportion of the premium received, in the other by returning the obligation or note, or by notice by mail to the assured; in the cash form of policy, upon giving notice to the assured, and returning a pro rata share of the ing the legal effect of an assessment of 100 per cent on the premium notes. Conigland v. North Carolina Mut. L. Ins. Co. Phil. Eq. 341, 98 Am. Dec. 89.

During the war of the rebellion a mutual assurance society in Virginia attempted to assess quotas on property insured in Berkley county, which was within loyal territory while the office of the company was in Richmond. It was held that this transaction was not valid but that the power to make such assessments was suspended, at least during the war. Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Berkley County Supers. 4 W. Va. 343.

Delay in making an assessment, if not unreasonable, will not invalidate it, although the statute requires that it shall be made to pay any just claim forthwith. Marblehead Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Underwood, 3 Gray, 210.

Several months delay in making an assessment is held insufficient to make it invalid. People's Mut. Ins. Co. v. Allen, 10 Gray, 297.

On a loss exceeding in amount all the deposit notes of a mutual company it is bound to assess them for the full value and cannot apportion the losses by annual assessments of 20 per cent thereof each, although its policies are issued for a term of five years. Rhinehart v. Alleghany County Mut. Ins. Co. 1 Pa. 359.

f. Amount; items included.

The limitation of liability of a member to assessment, fixed by Mass. Stat. 1797, chap. 67, at $2 for each dollar advanced as premium on deposit, is not changed as to a company chartered in 1798 by Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 58, § 48. Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 116.

Simple excess in the amount of an assessment arising from error of judgment will not vitiate the assessment, where the managers act honestly and prudently. Rosenberger, L. & Co. v. Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207.

An assessment made by the managers of an incorporated mutual fire insurance company largely in excess of an amount required to pay the loss for which they are empowered by its charter to make an assessment is void and may be disregarded by the members. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Knight (Ill.) post, —.

An assessment upon the members of a mutual insurance company of more than double the amount of the deficiency in its funds is held to be unreasonable and void, if no special circumstances are shown which require so large an assessment. People's Eq. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Babbitt, 7 Allen, 235; Traders' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Stone, 9 Allen, 483. But both these cases are disapproved on this point in Com. v. Dorchester Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 142.

An assessment upon the members must be reasonable and is invalid if it is for a greater amount than is necessary to meet existing claims, with a reasonable allowance for expenses and failures to make collections. People's Eq. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Babbitt, 7 Allen, 235. This case is criticised in Com. v. Dorchester Ins. Co. as overlooking the fact that the statute is not the only authority or source of right to make assessments, and does not attempt to control or restrict the exercise of rights or powers conferred by contract, and the court decidedly disagrees with the earlier decision so far as it denies the right of members to confer upon an association by contract the powers requisite to determine the necessity and amount, and to apportion by assessment the contribution which each shall make to a common fund for their several obligations.

The fact that assessments are much more in amount than the liabilities of the company is not sufficient to show that the assessment is invalid, where it appears that a considerable part of the assessments cannot be collected. Buckley v. Columbia Ins. Co. 92 Pa. 501.

A deficiency in an assessment resulting from inability to collect from a portion of the members may be made good by another assessment on the members who have paid. Davis v. Sharp, 2 West. Law Month. 40 (Walker & Bates' Ohio Dig. vol. 1, p. 657).

Proper allowances may be made on assessment for failures likely to result in collection in consequence of insolvency of members and other causes, and if reasonable in amount and consistent with good faith they will not vitiate the assessment. Rosenberger, L. & Co. v. Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207; Bangs v. Gray, 12 N. Y. 477, Reversing 15 Barb. 264; Wardle v. Townsend, 75 Mich. 385, 4 L. R. A. 511. See also the main case of IONIA, E. & B. FARMERS' MUT. F. INS. CO. v. IONIA CIRCUIT JUDGE.

But if in addition to a sum actually needed the assessment aims to accumulate a fund for payment of future losses, it is in excess of the authority of the managers and not binding on the members because it is no part of the contract that members shall pay pro rata into a fund for payment of losses when they shall occur and which may not occur until after their membership ceases. Rosenberger, L. & Co. v. Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra.

Assessments on members of a mutual insurance company in the hands of a receiver may be made to include the expenses of the receivership and also an allowance for shrinkage and uncollectible assessments. Seamans v. Millers' Mut. Ins. Co. 90 Wis. 490.

An allowance for expenses of making collection of assessments may be included therein. Re People's Mut. Eq. F. Ins. Co. 9 Allen, 319; Sands v. Boutwell, 26 N. Y. 233.

An assessment on members of a mutual insurance company is not to be limited to the indebtedness of the company and the expense of collection, where the statute provides that it shall also include reasonable compensation for a receiver and for the expenses of closing up the business. Tobey v. Russell, 9 R. I. 58.

Including 10 per cent for expenses in an assessment upon premium notes does not render it void. Hyatt v. Esmond, 37 Barb. 601.

Including 35 per cent additional to meet estimated expenses, bad debts, interest, and cost of collection when making an assessment for losses cannot be justified by the general authority of directors to assess agreeably to their act of incorporation and by-laws. York County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Turner, 53 Me. 225.

Including in an assessment for losses 95 per cent premium. Policies could be canceled upon request of the assured, in the mutual forms, by surrendering the policies and payment of all assessments due at that time in the one form, and all assessments charged against it at the end of the month in the other; and in the cash form, upon request of the assured, the company reserving the usual short rates for the time the policy was in force. An instruction and rate book was issued for agents, in which attention was called to the fact that assessments could not exceed one annual premium in any one year, and other matters which need not be set out. When it began business the company also issued cards, circulars, and folders advertising its assets and mode of transacting business, and setting forth that it had a guaranty fund of $50,000 pledged to the payment of losses, in the event that money raised from the assessments on premium notes should be insufficient for that purpose. It also represented that it was do-additional to meet estimated bad debts, interest, expenses, and costs of collection is held illegal in York County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Bowden, 57 Me. 286, when there is no authority for it in the charter and by-laws but the law contemplates assessments to meet actual existing liabilities in just proportions. The court says if made to meet possible contingencies a fund might be raised which might never be called for, and that to sustain such an assessment might do great injustice to the other members of the company. It is further said that such an assessment is in direct violation of some charter provisions, among which is a provision that each note shall pay the expenses of collecting assessments upon it and a lien created upon the property to secure the cost of collection as well as the assessment.

In an assessment by a receiver to pay liabilities, the expenses of a suit establishing a claim and the receiver's pay and expenses, with all other incidental expenses in collecting the assessment and settling up the affairs of the company, may be included. Howard v. Whitman, 29 Ind. 557.

But by Indiana statutes (1 Gavin & H. §§ 46, 47, 50, p. 395), assessments were allowed to pay losses only, and not to pay expenses of the company. Sinnissippi Ins. Co. v. Taft, 26 Ind. 240; Sinnissippi Ins. Co. v. Wheeler, Id. 336; Sinnissippi Ins. Co. v. Farris, Id. 342.

Fraud in the manner of making assessments upon members of a mutual fire insurance company by making them largely in excess of the unpaid loans and losses of the company and including losses which occurred prior to the premium notes assessed may be shown in defense against an assessment. People's F. Ins. Co. v. Hartshorne, 90 Pa. 465.

An assessment which includes the amount of previous assessments for losses which have been paid is invalid. Cooper v. Shaver, 41 Barb. 151.

An assessment is not void because it embraces a prior assessment upon the same premium note which still remains unenforced. Sands v. Sweet, 44 Barb. 108; Jackson v. Van Slyke, Id. 116.

An outstanding unpaid assessment should not be merged in a later assessment, but the latter should be without reference to the former. Campbell v. Adams, 38 Barb. 132.

A promise in a deposit note to pay "in such portions and at such times as the directors of said company may, agreeably to their act of incorporation and by-laws require," will justify an assessment including reasonable sums for interest on money borrowed and probable losses by bad debts, as well as an allowance for collecting assessments in the form of an abatement for prompt payment. Jones v. Sisson, 6 Gray, 288. See also the main case of IONIA, E. & B. FARMERS' MUT. F. INS. CO. v. IONIA CIRCUIT JUDGE.

Interest is recoverable on a premium note for the nonpayment of an assessment after it has become payable. Hyatt v. Wait, 27 Barb. 29; Sands v. Annesley, 56 Barb. 598.

But interest is not recoverable on the amount of a premium note when the right to recover is based upon a default to pay a much smaller assessment and by way of a penalty. Bangs v. McIntosh, 23 Barb. 591.

The case of Bangs v. McIntosh is followed in Bangs v. Bailey, 37 Barb. 630, where it was said that "on nonpayment of a partial assessment, the deposit note is not due and owing in the sense of any rule which imposes interest upon a debt."

An addition of 25 per cent to the amount of an assessment, unless paid within thirty days after notice, is not invalid. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Groff, 154 Pa. 200.

A by-law giving the right to recover 10 per cent per month upon unpaid assessments is held invalid, where the charter of the company gives the company a right of action to recover such assessments when they have remained unpaid for thirty days after demand, and is construed by the court to allow the recovery of simple interest thereon in such action. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Yeomans, 8 R. I. 25, 86 Am. Dec. 610.

The authority of a receiver to levy assessments is strictly limited by the order of court granting it, and an order authorizing an assessment equal in amount to assessments previously levied will not justify an assessment by him including penalties for nonpayment of a prior assessment in addition to the amount of the assessments themselves. Capital City Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Boggs, 172 Pa. 91.

Where the money raised by previous assessments was not apportioned pro rata by the company, but some losses were paid in full, some in part, and some not at all, a receiver may assess the members of the company at the time when each loss occurred respectively for the proportion of money which had been diverted from its proper object to be paid upon such loss for their benefit. Tobey v. Russell, 9 R. I. 58.

Losses occasioned by bad investments may be covered by an assessment on members of a mutual fire insurance company and the fact of a previous illegal assessment which has not been enforced will not defeat an assessment made in lieu thereof, with a provision for crediting those who paid the illegal assessment. People's Mut. Ins. Co. v. Allen, 10 Gray, 297.

An assessment may include a sum to be raised for dividends due and not paid in one class of the company's business when this is necessary to insure the payment of all the liabilities of the company. Re Slater Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 R. I. 42.

A formal assessment to the entire amount of a premium note, made without any inquiry or determination as to the amount of losses outstanding and of the notes liable to be assessed therefor, is void. Sands v. Graves, 58 N. Y. 94.

After policy holders have paid their deposit notes in full, which is the measure of their liability under their contract, they cannot be assessed by a receiver. Seamans v. Millers' Mut. Ins. Co. 90 Wis. 490.

g. Notice or demand.

A notice of assessment before the assessment is complete is inoperative. Bangs v. McIntosh, 23 Barb. 591.

A notice of an assessment on a premium note is not invalid because it says that the assessment

ing business under state authority, and that it was duly authorized, under chap. 4 of title 9 of the Code, to transact a fire insurance ousiness. It also made reports to the auditor of state showing the guaranty fund. The business transacted by the company outside of Iowa was mostly on the cash plan, and generally on policies running a year, and the indebtedness of the company at the time it made the assignment was largely for losses incurred in other states. In February, 1888, the company prepared a statement of the policies it had issued, and sent it to the auditor of state, who issued to it a certificate under § 1153 of the Code, and a like certificate was issued for the years 1889 and 1890. In 1890, and possibly in 1889, the income of the company was not sufficient to meet its losses and expenses.. On January 23, 1891, the guarantors met, and ordered a special assessment of 10 per cent on the amount of each subscription to the guaranty fund, which was charged was made by the company, when the board of directors only have power to make the assessment, as the legal effect is the same. Williams v. German Mut. F. Ins. Co. 68 Ill. 387.

A notice which does not give a member information from which he can tell what amount he is required to pay is not valid. Bangs v. McIntosh, supra.

Under a by-law providing that notice of assessments designating the class or classes of property assessed shall be given, a notice which designates the class need not give notice of the amount to be paid, especially when the members to be assessed have actual notice of the precise amount claimed and of the losses and expenses which give rise to the assessment. Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sanders, 36 N. H. 252.

A notice published in a newspaper to the members of a specified class in a certain mutual fire insurance company, "that the directors of said company have ordered an assessment on the members of said class payable on or before the 15th of February, 1857, with interest thereto," although it does not state the names of parties assessed or the amounts assessed or the percentage of assessment, is held sufficient in York County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Knight, 48 Me. 75, under a charter which in general terms requires notice to be published without specifying the form of it.

A by-law requiring notice of an assessment to be published in one newspaper in a certain county and "in such other newspapers as the directors may deem necessary" seems to be considered sufficiently complied with by notice in one newspaper in the county named, unless the directors order further publication. Sands v. Boutwell, 26 N. Y. 233

It was held in Cooper v. Shaver, 41 Barb. 151, that the publication of notice by the secretary of the company provided for in New York Laws 1853, chap. 466, § 13, cannot be literally carried out after the suspension of the powers of the company by sequestration, and hence that provision must be regarded as directory which is sufficiently satisfied by the making of an actual demand by the receiver before commencing suit.

The court was equally divided in Sands v. Sanders, 26 N.Y. 239, on the proposition that a receiver has no discretion as to giving notice of assessment in a mode different from that required by by-laws when the statutes provide that the directors shall give notice "in such manner as they shall see fit, or as the by-laws shall have prescribed," even if it might be held that the directors had discretion to give notice in another mode.

But in Sands v. Graves, 58 N. Y. 94, the opinion by Grover, J., says that he concurs with those who in Sands v. Sanders thought a recovery could not be had on an assessment in the absence of publication as required by the by-laws.

So the power of the receiver to exercise any discretion in giving notice different from that prescribed by by-laws is denied in Sands v. Shoemaker, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 149.

Personal notice of an assessment and demand of payment cannot aid a defective publication, where the statute requires personal notice as well as publication. Sands v. Sanders, and Sands v. Shoemaker, supra.

That personal notice is not sufficient to supply a defect in publication of a notice as required by by-law is also declared in Sands v. Graves, 58 N. Y. 94.

Personal notice is held sufficient under a provision for an assessment within thirty days after notice "shall have been published." Jones v. Sisson, 6 Gray, 288.

Notice of assessment being required by by-laws to be given in two newspapers after which sixty days were allowed for payment, it was held that personal notice was not a sufficient substitute. Northampton Mut. Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Stewart, 39 N. J. L. 486.

That a personal demand is necessary under New York Laws 1853, 909, § 13, before an action can be brought against the maker of premium notes for an assessment, was held in Sands v. Annesley, 56 Barb. 598.

But without mentioning this case, the court of appeals overrules it by deciding that a personal demand is not necessary under New York Laws 1853, § 13, in order to make a person liable for an assessment on his premium note which he has agreed to pay at such time or times as the directors may require agreeably to their charter and by-laws, but personal demand is thereby made necessary only when recovery on the entire note is claimed because of neglect to pay an assessment within thirty days after publication of notice. Sands v. Lilienthal, 46 N. Y. 541.

There being no requirement of a demand before the commencement of a suit for assessments of which notice was published in the statute under which a mutual fire insurance company was incorporated, such demand is held not to be necessary, but the published notice is regarded as a sufficient demand. York County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Knight, 48 Me. 75.

A notice of an assessment which on its face shows that it includes losses before the party assessed became a member of the company throws on the company the burden of proving that it did not in fact include such losses. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Tunkhannock Toy Co. 15 W. N. C. 306.

Notice of assessment was held, in Frey v. Wellington Mut. Ins. Co. 4 Ont. App. Rep. 293, to be insufficient because mailed on the 12th requesting payment on the 24th of the same month, while the statute required it to be given thirty days before payment.

Failure to give a member of a mutual insurance company notice of an assessment as required by the by-laws will prevent the recovery of the assessment, and a foreign attachment issued to reach the assessment is not a substitute for the notice. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Staats, 4 Pennyp. 313.

h. Conclusiveness.

An assessment by a receiver of a mutual insurance company under order of court, made on his application without notice, is not a judicial determination, and is no more conclusive than an assess-up to them on the books of the company. February 3, 1891, the guarantors rescinded their former action, and ordered all sums paid refunded. January 26, 1891, the board of directors ordered an assessment of 25 per cent upon the gross amount of each deposit not held by the company upon policies in force prior to January 1, 1891, for the purpose of paying losses and expenses. On February 3, 1891, the directors met, and ordered that any moneys paid on account of special assessment of guaranty fund be refunded. At the same time nearly all the guarantors gave notice of their withdrawal from the guaranty pledge, to take effect at that time. At the same meeting the board of directors ordered that a general assignment be made by the company of all its property for the benefit of all its creditors, and on the same day the president and secretary of said company executed an assignment of all the property of the company to James P. Sherman, ment made by the directors. Bangs v. Duckinfield, 18 N. Y. 592; Mutual F. Ins. Co. v. Phœnix Furture Co. (Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 159.

But an assessment upon members of a mutual fire insurance company which a receiver is ordered by the court to make, specifying in detail the exact percentage he shall levy, is held to constitute an adjudication against a member when action against him is brought for the assessment in another state. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Langley, 62 Md. 196.

An order of court authorizing a receiver to levy an assessment upon members of a mutual insurance company, although conclusive as to the amount of the assessment to be levied, does not preclude defenses peculiar to individuals assessed, such as the fact that a person had never been a member of the company. Capital City Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Boggs, 172 Pa. 91.

i. Lien.

The lien on property of a member of a mutual insurance society as security for his liability is dependent on the provisions of the statutes.

A lien upon the property of a member of a mutual insurance company for the assessments made on his deposit note constitutes a legal encumbrance upon the estate in the hands of his administrator, and when the property is worth much more than the assessments it is the administrator's duty to redeem it by payment of them, although a claim against the general funds of the estate has been barred by rejection thereof by a commissioner on failure to take an appeal from his decision. Tuttle v. Robinson, 33 N. H. 104.

A judgment entered for an assessment upon a premium note under the Pennsylvania acts of 1838 and 1843, which are parts of the company's charter, cannot be enforced as a general judgment against any property of the insured, but only as a lien upon the particular property insured. Halfpenny v. People's F. Ins. Co. 85 Pa. 48.

A certificate of discharge in insolvency of a member of a mutual insurance company does not relieve the insured property from liability to a special judgment authorizing a levy of execution upon that property only to enforce a lien for assessments given by Mass. Rev. Stat. chap. 37, §§ 36, 37. Bowditch Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Jackson, 12 Gray, 114.

A by-law giving the company a right to retain a premium note and such amount remaining unpaid thereon as a board of directors may deem sufficient security for assessments that may be made until the expiration of the policy when paying a loss is sustained in Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co.'s Appeal, 105 Pa. 615, as creating a lien thereon for assessments levied on such premium note during the term of the policy, both before and after the loss which occurred under that policy.

This case also decides that payment of money into court pending the determination of the question of the right of the company to retain out of the proceeds of a policy a sum to secure future assessments during the term of the policy does not defeat the company's right to a lien on a fund for such purpose under a by-law of the company.

And the fact that the company defended an action on a policy on the ground that it was forfeited and void does not estop the company from asserting its right to a lien under its policy upon the amount recovered thereon for assessments that may be made for subsequent losses during the term of the policy.

Also that a judgment for defendant in an action for assessments rendered on the ground that proper notices had not been given does not bar the company's right to a lien under its policy upon the proceeds of the policy in case of loss to secure subsequent assessments for losses during the term of the policy.

As to lien, see also Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Watts, and Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Faxon, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 606, 5 L. ed. 342, supra, II. b.

j. Set-off.

A premium note given to a mutual insurance company, payable at such times as the directors require, cannot be set off against a claim for insurance when no assessment on the note has been made. Hagan v. Merchants' & B. Ins. Co. 81 Iowa, 321.

Against the liability of a member of a mutual fire insurance company to assessment in case of the company's insolvency, he cannot set off any claim for an unearned premium on account of his own policy which is canceled by the insolvency of the company. Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 116; Hillier v. Allegheny County Mut. Ins. Co. 3 Pa. 470, 45 Am. Dec. 656.

But a valid claim for a loss by fire which accrued before the insolvency of the company can be set off against a liability of a member after the property of the company is sequestered and placed in the hands of receivers, and the fact that the company holds collateral security for the payment of its claim is immaterial if no other person is interested on either side as debtor or creditor. Com. v. Shoe & L. Dealers' F. & M. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 131.

On the other hand, it was held in New York that a loss adjusted in favor of a member of a mutual company before the commencement of proceedings to dissolve it cannot be set off against his indebtedness for premiums due upon his policies, as the premiums constitute a fund for the benefit of all creditors. The court considers that the mutual feature in such company distinguishes it from the case of an ordinary insurance company which has no mutual relations and obligations existing among its corporators. In this case, however, the notes were not given for the purpose of assessments, but were for fixed premiums which in the contemplation of the charter should be paid in cash, and the notes could only be received as in lieu of cash. Lawrence v. Nelson, 21 N. Y. 158.

Where the member of a mutual insurance company actually paid the premium on a policy of insurance instead of having his premium note applied thereto, when that was given for advance premiums and security, entitling him to certain compensation, he cannot afterwards and after renewing his premium note in full recover back the renewed note and have the premium which he paid defendant herein. On the next day said board of directors met, and elected said Sherman as assignee. On the assessment made by the directors between $4,000 and $5,000 was collected. On May 13, 1891, the assignee made a report to the district court, in which he asked that the assessment heretofore made be set aside, and a new one ordered on a basis prepared by him; and an order to that effect was made, without notice to policy holders, and on September 17, 1891, the board of directors made an assessment. Under this order of the court the assignee was collecting assessments and threatening to bring suits against the policy holders, when plaintiffs' bill was filed, upon which, after a hearing, the court, on June 17, 1892, found for plaintiffs, and set aside the orders theretofore made, making assessments, ordering the cancelation of all notes and obligations made by plaintiffs to the company, and enjoining the assignee and the company from suing or col-taken out of it. Bone v. Ballin, 1 Sandf. 181. The court says the act of renewing the note in full cannot be regarded otherwise than as a determination to have the benefit of a continuing subscription note with its anticipated benefits of the compensation allowed therefor and the extended credit for premiums which they might incur.

But where a person stood a debtor on the books of a mutual insurance company at the time of its failure for premiums for insurance taken by him, and at the same time the company held his renewal note for a balance due on a note given for premiums in advance and security after deducting earned premiums, it was held that on paying the premiums charged to him he could have them deducted from the note sued upon. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Leeds, 1 Sandf. 183. In this case he took the insurance in question after giving the renewal note and made a tender of the premiums to the company after the suit was begun on the note. See also Thropp v. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. infra, IX. k, 1.

A premium note payable as the directors may from time to time require is a note for the full amount of its face within the meaning of a provision basing the jurisdiction of a county court upon the amount sued for. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Marshall, 29 Vt. 23; Washington County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 26 Vt. 77.

An assessment upon a former member of a mutual insurance company, levied after the expiration of his policy, is to be collected, not by suit upon the premium note, but to recover the amount assessed. Davis v. Sharp, 2 West Law Month. 40 (Walker & Bates, Ohio Dig. vol. 1, p. 657).

An attempt to enforce liability on a premium note by suit in chancery was unsuccessful in M'Culloch v. Indiana Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Blackf. 50; Indiana Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Chamberlain, Id. 150.

In a suit for an injunction to restrain the receiver of a mutual insurance company from assessing premium notes for losses upon policies issued on cash premiums the creditors of the company are necessary parties with an interest adverse to the makers of the premium notes, and have a standing to ask for the setting aside of a judgment granting such an injunction. Hubbard v. Eames, 22 Barb. 597.

Assessments or calls made by virtue of the contract contained in the deposit note of a member of a mutual fire insurance company are not within the provisions of Mass. Stat. 1862, chap. 181, § 1, providing for a bill in equity to examine an assessment or call made by directors, but this remedy is provided only in case of assessments or calls made by authority of statute. Com. v. Dorchester Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 142.

The New York act of 1862, chap. 412, authorizing a reference of any controversy between receivers and members of a mutual insurance company is not unconstitutional as an impairment of the right of trial by jury. Sands v. Harvey, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 147; Sands v. Kimbark, 27 N. Y. 147; Sands v. Tillinghast, 24 How. Pr. 435.

There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States or of the state of Pennsylvania which precludes a member of a mutual insurance company from waiving a trial by jury upon an assessment and agreeing to the specific manner in which a judgment may be entered against him under a statute providing for the speedy collection of assessments. Krugh v. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. 77 Pa. 15.

One who accepts a policy in a mutual company expressly declaring that he has deposited a note subject to assessment at such times as the board of directors may by the act of incorporation require thereby subjects himself to the method of speedy collection of assessments provided by the Pennsylvania act of July 26, 1842. Ibid.

A statute providing for the ratification by a court of an assessment upon the members of a mutual fire insurance company upon general notice by publication or otherwise to all parties interested is not unconstitutional, and such proceeding may be made by a case in equity without providing for a jury trial. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. v. Parker, 11 Allen, 574.

A judgment rendered against the maker of the note after the insured building had been burned, and the premises transferred by him, is inoperative and void because there is nothing upon which it can attach, when it is entered under the statutory provision as a judgment by confession by virtue of a warrant of attorney. But these statutes do not abridge the power of the company to collect its assessments by ordinary process. Halfpenny v. People's F. Ins. Co. 85 Pa. 48.

An action after the expiration of a policy to recover assessments upon a member of a mutual insurance company is not such a final determination of his liability as to preclude a subsequent action for other assessments to pay losses not adjusted at the time of the prior action but which occurred during the life of his policy. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Mardoff (Pa.) 23 Pitts. L. J. N. S. 231.

The refusal by the court of leave to set off a claim for interest and assessments upon a policy holder's premium notes against his judgment recovered on a policy for property destroyed does not bar the right to recover such interest and assessments in a subsequent suit. Thropp v. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. 125 Pa. 427.

The right of a receiver to recover costs in an action for an assessment although the amount is less than $100, is sustained in Bacon v. Clyde, 70 Mich. 183, overruling dictum in Tolford v. Church, 66 Mich. 449. See also main case of IONIA, E. & B. FARMERS' MUT. F. INS. CO. v. IONIA CIRCUIT JUDGE.

2. Statement and pleadings.

The subject of pleading is here noticed only so far as it touches matters peculiar to actions against members of mutual insurance companies.

A statement of the president or secretary of a mutual insurance company pursuant to the Ohio act March 27, 1841, is prima facia evidence that the assessment was duly levied and due notice given of the same as against one whose policy has not expired. Davis v. Sharp, 2 West. L. Month. 40 (Walker & Bates, Ohio Dig. vol. 1, p. 657).

lecting the same, and from transferring the same. From this decree the appeal is prosecuted.

2. Appellants insist that plaintiffs cannot maintain this suit in equity, for that they have a plain and adequate remedy at law. This question is first raised in this court. Having failed to make the point below, and by taking issue on the facts alleged in the bill, the defendants have treated the action as properly brought in equity, and are now concluded from claiming to the contrary. If the allegations of the petition did not entitle the plaintiffs to the relief demanded, that point should have been made by demurrer or in answer to the bill. By failing to take issue thereon, the objection must be held to be waived. Code, § 2650; Linden v. Green, 81 Iowa, 366; Benjamin v. Vieth, 80 Iowa, 149; Gould v. Hurto, 61 Iowa, 47; McVey v. Manatt, 80 Iowa, 135; O'Brien v. Putney, 55 Iowa, 295. In Keokuk & N. W. R. Co.

The oath and a statement required by the Pennsylvania act of July 26, 1842, must be made by the treasurer, and it is not sufficient when made by a receiver to the best of his knowledge and belief on taking the statement from the books of the company. Barker v. Beeber, 112 Pa. 216.

A statement of the condition of a mutual insurance company made in a certain year is not evidence to rebut the correctness of an assessment made two years afterwards under a charter providing that the members shall pay in proportion to the amount of their notes and that the certificate of the secretary specifying the amount shall be prima facie evidence of the amount due. West Branch Ins. Co. v. Macklin, 66 Pa. 34.

A statement of the amount of premiums received and of the manner in which the money had been expended, required by the Pennsylvania act of July 26, 1842, to entitle a mutual insurance company to judgment and execution against a member is not sufficient when it states the losses in a gross sum, but the expenditures must be specifically stated in detail. Barker v. Beeber, supra.

A statement filed under the Pennsylvania act of July 26, 1842, pl. 426, § 11, as the basis of a right to execution against a member of a mutual insurance company, purporting to give the amount of premiums received and the amount of moneys expended during the time of his membership, is insufficient to sustain the claim against him when it does not show the premiums received while his policy was in force separate from other moneys, or show that the expenditures were made on claims to which he was liable to contribute. Koehler v. Beeber, 122 Pa. 291.

A statement in an action on a premium note under the Pennsylvania procedure act of 1887, which avers that an assessment for which suit was brought was made by direction of the court and was for losses occurring in the life of the defendant's policy, is not insufficient because it does not give the respective losses. Solly v. Moore, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 333.

A statement which shows the amount of expenditures of a mutual insurance company stating separately such items as loss and damage by fire, amounts paid for reinsurance, for salary of officers, for clerk hire, for interest and exchange, for services of directors, of special agents, for stationery, printing, etc., is sufficiently itemized to comply with the Pennsylvania statute. Lycoming Ins. Co. v. Bixby, 15 W. N. C. 109.

A declaration on a deposit note assigning as a breach the nonpayment of an assessment required by the directors without alleging that it was made in conformity to the statute and by-laws is insufficient on general demurrer. Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Young, 38 N. H. 451, 75 Am. Dec. 200.

Since a member of a mutual insurance company is liable for his proportionate share of losses only when they occur while he is a member a complaint against him for assessments must show that the losses to be paid occurred during his membership. Manlove v. Naw, 39 Ind. 289.

A complaint for an assessment on a premium note, averring that it is to pay liabilities for losses and expenses, is held sufficient where an exhibit required by statute to be made under oath before making the assessment is made part of the complaint and shows that the assessment was only for liabilities incurred for losses by fire. Bersch v. Sinnissippi Ins. Co. 28 Ind. 64.

Under the New York act of 1849, vesting in the directors of a mutual insurance company the right of deciding what amount or portion of the note shall be paid, where it provides for payment at such times as the directors shall deem necessary for the honorable and prompt payment of the losses and expenses of the company, a complaint in an action upon an assessment need not aver that any losses have been sustained. St. Lawrence Mut. Ins. Co. v. Paige, 1 Hilt. 430.

A complaint by a receiver of a mutual insurance company showing its organization, the giving of a premium note for a policy, assessments on the note, notice and demand for their payment, legal proceedings in which the company's franchises were declared forfeited for insolvency, his own appointment as receiver, with the powers usually and properly conferred on such persons, was held valid against a demurrer for want of sufficient facts, in Whitman v. Hall, 34 Ind. 422; Whitman v. Ammons, Id. 423; Manlove v. Scarce, Id. 423.

An answer and cross-complaint in a suit by a receiver of a mutual insurance company upon a premium note, alleging fraudulent representations of the agent of the company as to matters of law and fact, was held sufficient on demurrer. Whitman v. Meissner, 34 Ind. 487.

3. Proof.

The presumptions and burden of proof in case of an assessment are not the same in all jurisdictions or in respect to all matters.

An assessment made in pursuance of a decree of the court, based upon testimony and upon the application of a receiver, is at least prima facie reasonable and correct. Tobey v. Russell, 9 R. I. 58.

The presumption is that all the directors who voted for an assessment, whose duty it was to sign it, did so. Citizens' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sortwell, 10 Allen, 110.

In some cases it is clearly held that the burden is upon a mutual insurance company to show the validity of assessments made upon a premium note. Augusta Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. French, 39 Me. 522; Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 2 Gray, 279.

And it is said that there are no presumptions in favor of the validity of an assessment upon members of a mutual fire insurance company when the amount thereof has never been determined by the court or the assessment confirmed by the court. Swing v. H. C. Akeley Lumber Co. (Minn.) 25 Ins. L. J. 303.

Other cases, on the other hand, declare that the presumption is that an assessment made by the managers of a mutual company is properly made. Rosenberger, L. & Co. v. Washing Mut. F. Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207; People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Bergstresser, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 646, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 771; People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Groff, 154 Pa. 200.

Also that fraud or gross mistake must be shown

v. Donnell, 77 Iowa, 225, cited by appellant, the objection was raised in the answer, and the remarks referred to are dicta, not being essential to a decision of the question presented.

3. It is urged that this is not a case where suit may be brought by one on behalf of others not named, and in support of the claim it is said that when each may sue alone one cannot sue for others having a like interest in the result of the action. In support of this contention we are cited to Fleming v. Mershon, 36 Iowa, 413; Yarish v. Cedar Rapids, I. F. & N. W. R. Co. 72 Iowa, 556. In Fleming's Case two members of the court concurred in the holding on this point. One dissented, and another refrained from expressing an opinion, and the decision on another point rendered it unnecessary to determine the question now presented. In Yarish's Case the question determined was that, when that part of a petition which set out the

in an assessment made by the directors of a mutual company to whom the members have submitted themselves as their common representatives in order to defeat the assessment for excessiveness. Hummel's Appeal, 78 Pa. 320.

But the above Pennsylvania cases are to be construed with the decision that the burden of showing that an assessment is invalid for fraud or gross mistake is on the defendant where the charter of a mutual insurance company provides that in an action for recovery of the assessment the certificate of the secretary shall be prima facie evidence of the assessment and the amount due. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gackenbach, 115 Pa. 492.

But in the absence of such provision in the charter or in the statutes relating to such companies, the company is bound to prove the fact establishing the claim. Ibid.

In general the decisions require some proof of the facts to sustain an assessment and do not hold the assessment itself to be prima facie sufficient.

Thus it is necessary to prove losses to justify an assessment upon a premium note of a mutual fire insurance company. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co. v. Guse, 49 Mo. 329, 8 Am. Rep. 132.

Evidence of losses which render an assessment upon a premium note proper is necessary in an action upon a premium note, but plaintiff need not show the particular loss for the payment of which each assessment was made. Merchants' & Mfrs. Ins. Co. v. Linchey, 3 Mo. App. 588.

A receiver of an insolvent mutual insurance company cannot collect an assessment on a premium note without establishing in court the validity of the claims against the company for the payment of which the assessment is made. Downs v. Hammond, 47 Ind. 131; Embree v. Shideler, 36 Ind. 423; Manlove v. Curtis, 38 Ind. 31; Heller v. McCormick, Id. 30; Manlove v. Burger, Id. 211.

Proof that the losses which are to be paid with the proceeds of an assessment occurred during the time the defendant was a policy holder and member of the company must be made by the plaintiff in an action on an assessment. Downs v. Hammond and Embree v. Shideler, supra; Manlove v. Naylor, 38 Ind. 424; Manlove v. Naw, 39 Ind. 299; Whitman v. Mason, 40 Ind. 189.

The proof must be clear that an assessment made a month after the cancelation of a policy was for losses sustained before its cancelation. Hochelaga Mut. Ins. Co. v. Girouard, 7 Quebec L. R. 348 (Beryman's Ins. Dig. 164).

In the absence of any proof of any liabilities for which an assessment is necessary, the mere fact of an assessment by a receiver and a mere recital in an order directing an assessment of the fact that liabilities were set out in a petition for an assessment are not sufficient to show any liability of the maker of a premium note on such assessment. Thomas v. Whallon, 31 Barb. 172.

Some evidence of the existence of losses which render an assessment proper is necessary in an action to recover an assessment on a premium note, but a record of losses which a witness proves of his own knowledge to have been made from claims allowed by the company or its receiver, with proof that the assessment was to pay such losses, is sufficient, although the witness cannot specify the particular losses when they appear in such record of losses. Jackson v. Roberts, 31 N. Y. 304. The court says that it will be sufficient to give evidence that would have been conclusive against the company while it was engaged in its proper business.

But a mere statement of the existence of losses in an ex parte affidavit of the receiver is insufficient to authorize an assessment and a reference to enforce the same under the New York act 1862, chap. 412. Sands v. Kimbark, 27 N. Y. 147. The court in this case says that upon the trial of an action upon such a note evidence which would have concluded the company while it was engaged in its proper business or notice of a loss and its settlement or allowance or a judgment recovered against the company would be sufficient.

The report of a referee in a general creditor's action to which a receiver and mutual insurance company were parties, in which an account of all the debts and assets of the company was taken, is sufficient prima facie evidence to sustain an assessment on a premium note when it shows that the assets were insufficient to pay the debts and expenses of collection. Sands v. Shoemaker, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 149.

Proof of a loss or assessment is not necessary in order to recover on a note given to comply with the New York act of April 10, 1849, § 5, as part of the original capital of a mutual insurance company. Tuckerman v. Brown, 33 N. Y. 297, 88 Am. Dec. 386. In this case the fact that the note had been withdrawn and destroyed after the organization of the company pursuant to an understanding that it should be done when it had served the purpose of aiding the company to pass the examination required by law did not release the maker's liability, as the transaction was a fraud upon the law.

Under a charter requiring every person insured in a mutual company to pay a cash premium and deposit a written agreement to hold himself liable for an equal amount in the capital stock of the company, to be assessed and collected by the directors in such sums and at such times as they shall deem expedient, which is construed to make such premiums and deposits the absolute funds of the company, it is held that a note thus deposited was subject to collection at any time at the discretion of the directors for the purpose of discharging expenses, debts, and losses of the company, even if they occurred before the insured became a member of the corporation; and in such case it need not be shown what expenses and losses were included in the assessment. Nashua F. Ins. Co. v. Moore, 55 N. H. 48.

A resolution of a board of directors levying an assessment upon premium notes to meet the indebtedness of the company is not of itself sufficient to prove the losses and expenses which authorized the assessment. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co. v. Guse, 49 Mo. 329, 8 Am. Rep. 132; American Ins. Co. v. Schmidt, 19 Iowa, 502.

Where premium notes are by the charter of a mutual insurance company liable to assessment for losses and expenses happening or accruing in and names of other taxpayers for which plaintiff claimed the right to appear and prosecute the action was on motion stricken out, no appeals lie on part of such persons, and that Yarish, being allowed to prosecute the action in his own behalf, could not appeal for them. In Brandiff v. Harrison County, 50 Iowa, 166, this court considered the Fleming Case, and in an action to restrain the collection of taxes by plaintiffs claiming to be owners in severalty of certain real estate the answer set up a misjoinder of parties and causes of action, "in that plaintiffs have no joint interest in the land in controversy, but own different and distinct portions in severalty." The court held that plaintiffs could maintain a joint bill. In Palo Alto Bkg. & I. Co. v. Mahar, 65 Iowa, 78, plaintiff brought suit for itself and others, and the right to prosecute the action for the benefit of other persons was upheld. A learned writer expresses the law touching this matter as follows: "The weight of authority is simply overwhelming that the jurisdiction may and should be exercised, either on behalf of a numerous body of separate claimants against a single party, or on behalf of a single party against such a numerous body, although there to the class in which the property is insured, an assessment must be proved to have been made for losses or expenses in that class only. Great Falls Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 45 N. H. 292.

The plaintiff in an action for an assessment upon a member of a mutual fire insurance company upon a deposit note must prove not only the making of the assessment but that it was in accordance with the act of incorporation and by-laws, and thus establish that the assessment was legal. Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Fitzpatrick, 2 Gray, 279.

The payees of a deposit note for insurance in a mutual company cannot recover an assessment thereon without proving performance of the conditions required to authorize the issue of the policy. Jones v. Smith, 3 Gray, 500.

Under a statute permitting risks to be classified and policies issued in a particular class when the property to be insured in each class shall amount to a specified sum, it must be shown by the insurance company in order to collect an assessment upon a premium note for insurance in such a class that the risks in each class equaled the sum required by the act. Augusta Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. French, 39 Me. 522.

Under the Michigan statute (Sess. Laws 1873, No. 82, § 17) such an assessment is prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of all proceedings up to and including the assessment, but this presumption is not conclusive and may be rebutted by showing that the assessment is excessive. Wardle v. Townsend, 75 Mich. 385, 4 L. R. A. 511.

A certificate of the secretary which is made prima facie evidence of an assessment is not available as evidence thereof after the defendant has filed an affidavit of defense as provided by Pennsylvania act of May 1, 1876, § 56, but in such cases the company must show liabilities which make an assessment necessary and that it was made according to the terms of the charter and by-laws. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gackenbach, 115 Pa. 492.

The burden of proof is on the insurance company or its assignee for creditors when in an action on a note which had been assessed for its full amount it appears that the losses of the company are about $50,000 and the premium notes $174,000, of which $79,391.27 represents unexpired policies and no explanation is offered of the apparently excessive assessment. Lehigh Valley F. Ins. Co. v. Dryfoos (Pa.) 8 Cent. Rep. 162.

A policy of a mutual fire insurance company is admissible in evidence on behalf of the company under a declaration alleging that in consideration of the policy the member agreed to pay his proportion of the losses and expenses. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Clark, 12 Gray, 165.

The records of a mutual insurance company are not sufficient proof of the existence of a premium note to sustain an assessment on such alleged note. Re Slater Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 R. I. 42.

4. Statute of limitations.

The statute of limitations does not begin to run against premium notes until an assessment thereon has been made, where they are payable at such times and by such instalments as the directors shall from time to time assess and order. Re Slater Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 R. I. 42; Howland v. Cuykendall, 40 Barb. 320.

This is true of such a note although the assessment is not made until after the expiration of his policy. Smith v. Bell, 107 Pa. 352. S. C. sub nom. Smith v. Mercer County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 14 Ins. L. J. 302.

After default in payment of an assessment on a note payable as the directors may require the note becomes payable on demand so that the statute of limitations begins to run against action upon it. Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Batcheller & Sons, 62 Vt. 148.

A personal demand for payment was held necessary in one case before the statute of limitations could run against an action for an assessment upon a premium note under the New York act of 1853. Sands v. Annesley, 56 Barb. 598.

But this case was overruled in effect, without mentioning it, by the case of Sands v. Lilienthal, 46 N. Y. 541, holding that a personal demand was necessary only when recovery on the entire note was claimed because of default in payment of an assessment.

A note given to make up the capital stock of a mutual insurance company, although promising to pay as the directors require, is payable on demand so that the statute of limitations runs against it from the time it is given. Howland v. Edmonds, 24 N. Y. 307.

This case in effect overrules Bell v. Yates, 33 Barb. 627, in which it was held that when a premium note given to comply with the New York act of 1849, § 5, as part of the capital stock of a mutual insurance company, is made payable in such portions and at such time or times as the directors may require, although the statute requires it to be payable not more than twelve months from date it is payable absolutely so as to start the running of the statute of limitations at a day not later than the end of twelve months from date, according to its legal import and not according to its form.

A note given for advance premiums by one of the persons organizing a mutual insurance company as a part of the capital and securities on which the company was permitted to begin business is a premium note within the meaning of an injunction against collecting premium notes, and the running of the statute against it is suspended during the existence of such injunction. Sands v. Campbell, 31 N. Y. 345.

A suit by a receiver to recover an assessment upon a member of an insolvent mutual fire insurance company is barred by the lapse of six years after the assessment is made, under How. Stat. (Mich.) § 8713, governing actions of assumpsit or case founded upon any contract or liability, express or implied; and the fact that the assessment was made by the receiver, instead of the board of directors, does not change the rule. Wardle v. Hudson, 96 Mich. 432. B. A. R.

is no 'common title,' nor 'community of right' or of 'interest in the subject-matter,' among these individuals but where there is and because there is merely a community of interest among them in the questions of law and fact involved in the general controversy, or in the kind and form of relief demanded and obtained by or against each individual member of the numerous body. In a majority of the decided cases this community of interest in the questions at issue and in the kind of relief sought has originated from the fact that the separate claims of all the individuals composing the body arose by means of the same unauthorized, unlawful, or illegal act or proceeding. Even this external feature of unity, however, has not always existed, and is not deemed essential. Courts of the highest standing and ability have repeatedly interfered and exercised this jurisdiction, where the individual claims were not only legally separate, but were separate in time, and each arose from an entirely separate and distinct transaction, simply because there was a community of interest among all the claimants in the question at issue and in the remedy." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 269; Keese v. Denver, 10 Colo. 113; Carlton v. Newman, 77 Me. 408; Macon & B. R. Co. v. Gibson, 85 Ga. 1. Our statute provides: "When the question is one of a common or general interest to many persons, or when the parties are very numerous, and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of the whole." Code, § 2549. It is alleged in the bill that "the questions presented by this petition are of common and general interest to a large number of persons, policy holders in said company on the mutual plan, who have not paid the assessment, amounting in all to more than two thousand persons; that there is a unity of interest of all of them as to the object of this action, and it is impracticable, therefore, to bring them all before the court in this action, or for them to bring separate actions individually; and for this reason this action is brought by plaintiffs for and on behalf of them all as well as for their own individual benefit, and also to prevent a multiplicity of suits," etc. While this allegation is denied, still the testimony is ample to show that nearly 3,000 policy holders are interested in the object and result of this action; that the facts and law applicable thereto would be substantially the same in case these 3,000 persons should bring separate suits. It is manifest, then, that plaintiffs have brought themselves within the provisions of the statute; that it was enacted to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and to obviate the very difficulties which would arise if separate suits were brought. It seems to us that to hold that the section referred to does not authorize the institution of this suit by some of the policy holders in behalf of themselves and others not specifically named would be a practical denial of justice. We hold that the action in that respect is properly brought.

4. A point of contention is as to whether defendant company was organized as a mutual or stock company. The statute recognizes two plans of organizing mutual fire insurance companies. By chap. 4 of title 9 of the Code provision is made for the organization of such mutual companies, and it is required, among other things, that before commencing business they must have entered into agreements with at least 200 applicants for insurance, the premiums upon which must amount to $20,000; of which $5,000 shall have been paid in actual cash, and for the remainder of which notes of solvent parties must have been taken. Other provisions are made touching payment of said notes, the publication of notice, obtaining a certificate from the auditor of state, etc. Code, §§ 1122–1125, 1131, 1132, 1138–1142, 1147, 1151, 1159, 1160. In § 1160 of the same chapter it is provided that "nothing in this chapter shall be so construed as to prevent any number of persons from making mutual pledges and giving valid obligations to each other for their own insurance from loss by fire or death, or loss or damage by tornadoes, lightning, hail storms, cyclones, or wind storms, but such association of persons shall in no case insure any property not owned by one of their own number, except schoolhouses or church buildings, as the said companies deem proper to insure within the territory where they do business . . . nor shall the provisions of this chapter be applicable to such associations or companies." It will be seen that under the statute a mutual insurance company may be organized under said chap. 4 of title 9 of the Code, and in compliance with its provisions, or it may be organized under § 1058 of the Code, for the purpose of carrying on the business of mutual insurance, as is contemplated in § 1160 of the Code. It is conceded by appellants that the defendant company was not organized as a mutual company, under chap. 4 of title 9 of the Code, but it is claimed it was so organized under § 1058 of the Code, to transact the business of mutual insurance as provided in § 1160. Under § 1058 any number of people may become incorporated for the transaction of any lawful business, and possess all the powers usually incident to corporations. Code, § 1059. Such corporations must, before commencing business, adopt articles of incorporation, which must be signed, acknowledged, and recorded in the office of the recorder of the county where its principal place of business is located, and must also be recorded in the office of the secretary of state. Id. § 1060. The article must fix the limit of indebtedness of the company. Id. § 1061. It must publish a notice. Id. §§ 1062, 1063. The by-laws must be posted in its principal place of business. Id. § 1076. By § 1089 it is provided that no body of men acting as a corporation shall be permitted to set up want of legal organization as a defense to an action against them as a corporation, nor shall any person sued on a contract made with such a corporation be permitted to set up a want of such legal organization in his defense. In the light of these provisions, and of § 1160, was the defendant company organized and incorporated as a mutual insurance company? In substance, it is clear that all the requirements to organize a corporation under chap. 1 of title 9 of the Code was complied with. In its articles it declared that "we do hereby form an association under the laws of the state of Iowa for the purpose of mutual insurance upon our property and that of all other persons who may become members of this association by the giving of mutual pledges therefor." In article 3 it was provided that the general nature of the business to be transacted "shall be the insurance of the property of its members against loss or damage by fire, lightning, cyclone, tornado, or wind storm." Article 10 provided: "The fund of the association for the payment of insurance losses and the necessary expenses thereof shall consist exclusively of money raised by assessment on mutual pledges given by the members for their insurance. Such assessments shall be made only by the directors or executive committee, and may be limited by the by-laws, and shall always be apportioned pro rata among the members insured." Article 11 provided: "All persons insured in this association shall be members thereof during the period of their insurance, and no longer. The notice of the organization and incorporation declared: "The general nature of the business to be transacted by said corporation is mutual insurance by and among its members . . . by mutual obligations of the members of said corporation therefor." Every step taken in connection with the incorporation of this company clearly indicates an intention to incorporate under chap. 1 of title 9 of the Code for the transaction of the business authorized by § 1160 of the Code. It was then properly organized and incorporated as a mutual insurance company, to do the business provided in § 1160 of the Code. That the company, in the transaction of its business after it was thus organized, exceeded its powers, in no way affects the validity or purposes of the organization.

5. It is said that the company was not mutual, because the right to vote and control the management of the company was vested in the members who were guarantors only. As we have already said, plaintiffs, as members of the company, were presumed to know the provisions of the articles of incorporation and by-laws. They knew that by them the power of directing the affairs of the company was reposed in a body to be selected from members who were guarantors. They could waive any right they might have as members to vote. By acquiescing in the management, they did so waive this right. Again, it would seem that plaintiffs understood this provision of the by-laws, and we are justified in presuming that they assented thereto in the absence of any evidence showing any desire or effort on their part to control the affairs of the company by voting or otherwise.

6. It is claimed that the provision for a guaranty fund rendered the company a stock company. Outside of the question of fraud, we do not see that the provision for this guaranty fund in any way affected plaintiffs' liability. It was provided that this fund might be assessed; that any moneys paid from it should be treated as an advancement, to be repaid from the funds of the association as might be ordered by the directors. It was provided that the fund for the payment of insurance and necessary expenses should consist exclusively of moneys raised by assessment on mutual pledges given by the members for their insurance; that the guarantors might, after three years, withdraw from all liability on said guaranty. Manifestly the purpose of this fund was to furnish money to meet losses due when the assessments did not raise a sufficient sum. The provision for repayment shows that it was only intended for temporary relief. Even if it was a valid obligation (a point we do not decide), plaintiffs have no just ground for complaint that it is not resorted to in advance of making an assessment, as at most the guarantors would be mere sureties for the policy holders. Hope Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Weed, 28 Conn. 51; Hope Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Perkins, 38 N. Y. 404. It is plain, then, that even if the guaranty was valid, and the guarantors were resorted to in the first instance to meet insurance losses, such guarantors could recover the amounts paid of the company; and in a case of a mutual company like that at bar this liability would have to be met by an assessment on the policy holders. So that plaintiffs are in the same situation as if resort had been had to the guarantors, and then an assessment had been ordered to meet the liability of the company to them. Certain it is, there is no express statutory authority for a company organized as this one was to raise a guaranty fund, but, even if such guaranty is valid, it does not operate to change the character of the company into a stock company.

7. As has already been stated, the assessments complained of in this case were made very largely to pay losses suffered by those holding policies issued upon the cash plan; that is to say, their policies were issued to them upon the daily reports of agents of the company, for an all-cash premium. The policy was similar to that issued by stock companies in general, and did not, in terms, make the assured members of the corporation. By its terms the company promised to pay the assured, in case of loss, a certain fixed and definite sum, without reference to assessments. There was, however, a profit-sharing provision in the policy, by which the assured, after a certain number of years, might receive a proportionate share of the profits as a dividend. These "all-cash" payment policies provided for cancelation at short rates, and for a return of the unearned premium. The company established regular rates of insurance on all kinds of property, and issued policies on every description of goods for fixed and determinate rates. An important question in the case is whether it had right to do this under its articles of incorporation and the statutes of this state, or whether the acts of its officers and agents in issuing these "all-cash" premium policies were not ultra vires and void; for, if these cash premium policies were not such as the company had power to issue, and were contrary to law, if its officers and agents had no authority to make them, then they were not binding on the company, and the assessments made to pay them would be invalid.

We have held that this company was organized as a mutual association, under the general incorporation laws of the state, for the purpose of doing the business authorized by § 1160 of the Code,—i. e., of making mutual pledges, and giving valid obligations to each other for their own insurance from losses by fire, etc. This statute contains the following provisions: ". . . But such association of persons shall in no case insure any property not owned by one of their number, . . . but such associations or companies shall receive no premiums, nor make any dividends." Section 1159 of the Code provides: "No company organized under the mutual plan shall do business or take risks upon the stock plan neither shall a company organized as a stock company do business upon the plan of a mutual insurance company." The articles of incorporation of the defendant company provided: "That we, James P. Sherman et al., do hereby form an association under the laws of Iowa for the purpose of a mutual insurance upon our property and that of all other persons who may become members of this association by the giving of mutual pledges thereof. . . . The general nature of the business to be transacted by the said association shall be the insurance of the property of its members against loss or damage by fire. . . . The fund of the association for the payment of insurance losses and the necessary expenses thereof shall consist exclusively of moneys raised by assessment on mutual pledges given by the members for their insurance. Such assessments shall be made only by the board of directors or executive committee, and may be limited by the by-laws, and shall always be apportioned pro rata among the members insured." The incorporation notice contained this among other statements: "The general nature of the business to be transacted is mutual insurance by and among its members against loss by fire . . . by mutual obligations of the members of said corporation therefor." It will be noticed that the provision we have quoted authorized this company to do business under § 1160 of our Code. It had no right to do other than mutual insurance, and in doing that it could not, by the express terms of the statute, receive premiums or make dividends. The articles of incorporation, into which must also be read the statute of the state, for it is as much a part of them as if specifically set forth, are a part of the contract between the company and the insured, and are the contract between the individual members who make up the association. They are a limitation upon the authority of the officers and agents of the company, and give to the association its vitality, and define and limit its powers. Every person who became a member of the company was charged with knowledge, not only of everything in the articles of incorporation, but of the provisions of the statutes we have quoted as well. Lucas v. White Line Transfer Co. 70 Iowa, 546, 59 Am. Rep. 449; Walsh v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 30 Iowa, 144, 6 Am. Rep. 664; Simeral v. Dubuque Mut. F. Ins. Co. 18 Iowa, 319; 2 May. Ins. § 552; Coles v. Ionia State Mut. Ins. Co. 18 Iowa, 431; 2 Wood, Ins. § 538, Mitchell v. Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. 51 Pa. 402; Liscom v. Boston Mut. F. Ins. Co. 9 Met. 205. The articles of incorporation constituted the contract between the constituent members of the association. American Ins. Co. v. Schmidt, 19 Iowa, 503; Ferguson v. Meredith, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 25, 17 L. ed. 604; Rosenberger v. Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207. The following authorities hold that the articles of incorporation are a limitation upon the powers of the corporation, its officers and agents: O'Neill v. Pleasant Prairie Mut. F. Ins. Co. 71 Wis. 621; Eddy v. Merchants' M. & C. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 72 Mich. 651; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 493; Wood, Ins. § 1. That a public statute of the state is a part of the policy of insurance, although not incorporated therein, see: Port Edwards, C. & N. R. Co. v. Arpin, 80 Wis. 214; Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Pettus, 140 U. S. 226, 35 L. ed. 497; Webster v. Rees, 23 Iowa, 269; Van Schoonhoven v. Curley, 86 N. Y. 187; Brine v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 96 U. S. 627, 24 L. ed. 858. "The question, as to whether a contract of insurance is inter vires or otherwise may often arise under policies, and, in determining this question the charter articles of association, and the general laws applicable thereto, are the only touchstones by which the question of authority can be tested and ascertained." Wood, Ins. p. 3. If it be said that the corporation, by its board of directors, authorized this kind of insurance, a sufficient answer to the assertion is that they were not authorized to do so, and the insurance issued pursuant thereto would only be binding upon those members of the company who had knowledge thereof, and assented, or did not object, thereto.

With the propositions of law and of fact before stated settled, and with these for our premises, the conclusion is apparent. The company, its officers and agents, had no authority to issue policies on the "all-cash" plan. It could only accept those who were willing to become members on the plan authorized by the statute and the articles of incorporation. It could not agree to pay those who insured on the all-cash or stock plan a stipulated sum, without reference to the amount which it could raise by assessments. It could only accept memberships upon substantially the plan authorized. Its act in insuring applicants in a specific amount upon payment of a stipulated premium was not authorized. It could not pay dividends, because of the express prohibition of the statute. Even if it had authority to issue policies as a stock company, for an all-cash premium, and thus agree to indemnify persons in specific amounts, it could not compel those who became members of the company under the mutual plan to respond to assessments to pay losses suffered by those who came in on the stock or all-cash plan, for there is no mutuality between them. Illinois F. Ins. Co. v. Stanton, 57 Ill. 354. Mutuality is of the essence of mutual insurance. It is the principle which lies at its foundation, and gives it its name. May, Ins. § 548. Those holding all-cash or stock policies did not become members of the company under the mutual plan. They did not agree to take the amount which might be realized from an assessment of the other members. They were in no sense insurers as well as insured, as is required where the company is mutual. 2 Wood, Ins. § 538. The company alone assumed the risk.

It is contended, however, that these plaintiffs, having had the benefit of their insurance, are now estopped from insisting that they should not be assessed to pay losses on policies issued on the "all-cash" or "stock" plan. There would be much force in this position had the plaintiffs had knowledge of the acts of the company in issuing these policies, but there is no evidence that they had such knowledge. For the benefits they have received there is no question but that they are liable to assessments to meet losses suffered by all who were members with them on the mutual plan, and could not now be heard to say that they are not liable for assessments to meet these losses because the company did business with others, not authorized by its charter. Thus far they are estopped by receiving benefits, but no farther.

Again, it is insisted that they suffered no prejudice, because the cash premiums went to reduce the amount of their assessments; that the cash payments were merely assessments paid in advance. To this it may be said: First, that the articles of incorporation provide that the losses and expenses are to be paid exclusively from assessments made upon the mutual pledges of the members. The company had no authority, by the terms of its charter, to apply the cash premiums in payment of losses, and there is no showing that it did in fact do so. And, second, those who paid these cash premiums did not become members of the company, and did not pay their premiums as assessments. They paid their premiums for insurance, for the full term of the policy, and the only rights they had thereafter to them, or any part thereof, was an unlawful agreement to pay dividends from the profits of the business. Those who insured on the all-cash plan are conclusively presumed to have had notice of the articles of incorporation and of the laws of the state with reference to this kind of insurance; and if they suffer it is by reason of their own negligence in not discovering the character of the company with which they were dealing, its powers and authority.

Further, the defendants insist that the plaintiffs are estopped from questioning the corporate character and ability of the company to issue the policies, because they contracted with it as a corporation possessing the power claimed for it. We do not question the rule announced in the authorities cited by appellants, but we think it is not applicable to the questions here presented. The plaintiffs are not questioning the corporate character of the company, and we have found that it was legally authorized under the laws of this state to do a mutual insurance business under Code, § 1160. What they do controvert is the authority of the company to issue the policies, losses under which they were assessed to pay. This proposition is entirely different from the one covered by the authorities cited by appellants. Again, this is a controversy between the assignee, who represents the creditors assured who suffered losses on their policies, who caused or procured the assessments to be made for them, and the plaintiffs, who were holders of policies in the same company; and the rights of the respective parties must be determined by the contracts between them.

It is further contended that the plaintiffs, by their laches, are estopped from questioning the authority of the company to issue the policies for which the assessments have been made. There is no evidence that the plaintiffs had knowledge of the character of the business carried on by the company, except as they would gather it from the articles of incorporation of the company. These, as we have said, contemplated a lawful business, and they were not bound to assume that the officers or agents were conducting the business in an unlawful manner. They had no actual notice, and cannot be estopped by their laches, unless they knew that the company was transcending its authority and permitted it to do so. We are aware that there are a great number of authorities holding that a mutual insurance company may receive all-cash premiums in lieu of assessments, and still be considered a mutual company; but none of these cases were decided under statutes like ours; and in most of them the assured became members of the company, just as those who paid on the assessment plan, the only difference being that they paid their assessments in advance. We base our decision upon the terms of our statute, and upon the nature of the contract entered into with those who paid cash premiums. We do not think those who insured strictly on the assessment plan, and within the terms of the articles of incorporation, ought to be called upon to pay assessments to meet losses suffered by those who insured on the stock or all-cash premium plan. As sustaining our views, see 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 26; O'Neill v. Pleasant Prairie Mut. F. Ins. Co. 71 Wis. 621; Eddy v. Merchants' M. & C. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 72 Mich. 651; Massachusetts Catholic O. of F. v. Callahan, 146 Mass. 391; Commercial League Asso. v. People, 90 Ill. 166; Miller v. American Mut. Acci. Ins. Co. 92 Tenn. 167, 20 L. R. A. 765; Pearce v. Madison & I. R. Co. 62 U. S. 21 How. 441, 16 L. ed. 184; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Keokuk & H. Bridge Co. 131 U. S. 371, 33 L. ed. 157; State, Richards, v. Manufacturers' Mut. F. Asso. 50 Ohio St. 145, 24 L. R. A. 252; Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Benev. Asso. (Ill.) 19 N. E. 710; Rockhold v. Canton Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. 129 Ill. 440, 2 L. R. A. 420. As the premium notes given by the plaintiffs were lawful and binding as to all who were insured on the mutual plan, and liable for assessments to pay losses suffered by such members of the company, the court erred in canceling these obligations because of want of authority in the company to issue the policies which the assessments were made to pay.

8. Plaintiffs urge that the premium notes given by them do not state on their face that they were given for insurance, as required by § 1146 of the Code. The notes, we think, do not state this fact as clearly as they should if § 1146 is applicable to them; but § 1160, under which we hold this corporation was doing business, provides: "Nor shall the provisions of this chapter be applicable to such associations orcompanies,"—referring to assessments on the plan of mutual obligations. Section 1146 is found in the chapter referred to, and by the terms of 1160 is not applicable to the notes given in this case.

9. The decree of the district court undertakes to set aside, so far as plaintiffs are concerned, the assessment made by the district court; also the assessment made by the assignee, and by the board of directors, on September 17, 1891. We do not understand that the assessment made by the directors of the company is in any manner assailed by plaintiff's pleadings, nor is any relief asked touching it. Under such circumstances it was certainly error in the court below to set it aside.

10. The only remaining question we need consider is the claim of plaintiffs that the assessment and notes are void by reason of fraud practiced by the officers and agents upon the plaintiffs. There is no evidence whatever that any fraud was practiced upon plaintiffs Metcalf, Nabers, Hedges, Goldsworthy, Slade, Miller, and Nemmers (and as to them the allegations of the bill are not sustained). As to the other plaintiffs, the alleged fraud consisted in representing in its articles of incorporation, in its notice, in printed matter, in reports of the state auditor, and through its agents, that it had a guaranty fund of $50,000 pledged to the prompt payment of losses should the funds from the assessments be inadequate; (2) that it was an Iowa company, composed of Iowa men, for Iowa business alone; (3) that it was regularly incorporated under chap. 4, tit. 9, of the Code; (4) that policies were issued for a term of six years, and subject to cancelation at any time on the payment of the amount due; (5) that assessments were made annually, and were not to exceed the annual rate in any one year. It is evident from what has already been said that the representations numbered 4 and 5 were not false. Representation 2 was not of such a character as to warrant us in relieving plaintiffs from liability. It was an Iowa company, and composed in part of Iowa men, and doing business in Iowa. Besides, we find no evidence showing that the plaintiffs, except Corey, became members of the company in reliance on this representation. As to representation 3, we do not think it of such a character as to avoid plaintiffs' liability. True, the company was in fact incorporated under the general provisions of chap. 1 of title 9, but it was transacting business under provisions found in § 1160 of the Code, in chapter 4 of title 9. Furthermore, as shown by the evidence, the chief reliance of plaintiffs seems to have been based upon the representation touching the guaranty fund. Now, it appears that in the first notice of incorporation it was simply stated that such fund should not exceed $50,000, to be paid as ordered by the directors and as required in the articles and by-laws. In the articles it was expressly provided that payments from this fund should be regarded as an advancement, to be repaid by the association. In the second incorporation notice the fund was referred to as "consisting of limited individual pledges," the guaranty itself providing for the withdrawal of parties to it after three years. In the circulars of the company this fund was referred to as securing the policies, and for the prompt payment of losses should the funds from the assessments be inadequate. The evidence shows that much reliance was placed upon this guaranty fund by some of plaintiffs; that the fact that said fund was not of a permanent character was not always brought to the notice of plaintiffs; that in other instances parties were told that, if guarantors were compelled to pay, they might collect of the company. In view of all the evidence touching this matter, we cannot doubt that plaintiffs Corey, Loomer, Gould, Blowers, Morgan, Kelley & Tannyhill, and Brown were, in taking their insurance in this company, deceived by the representations of its officers and agents, and led to believe that a guaranty fund, absolute in its character, was provided for the payment of losses when the amount raised by the assessments provided for in the policies proved insufficient. Nor do we deem it material, for the purposes of this inquiry, whether the guaranty fund was valid or not. It was held out to these parties as an inducement for them to become members of the company. They had a right, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary, to rely upon the representations made to them in respect to it. The evidence shows that but for such representations they would not have become members of the company. Surely, in such cases, it would be aiding the company in making an attempted fraud effectual to hold that such plaintiffs could not rely upon the representations made. The doctrine is well settled that the insured may defeat a suit for an assessment on the ground of fraudulent representations, whereby he was induced to contract with the company; and, if such fraud is established as we hold in this case as to the plaintiffs we have named, the entire contract upon which the assessment is predicated is void, and no assessment can be made thereon. May, Ins. p. 1278, § 560*a*; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Wright, 55 Vt. 526; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Woodworth, 83 Pa. 223; Wood, Ins. p. 1213; Jones v. Dana, 24 Barb. 395; Devendorf v. Beardsley, 23 Barb. 656; Brown v. Donnell, 49 Me. 421; Rohrschneider v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 76 N. Y. 216. It may be admitted that if plaintiffs would avail themselves of the fraud they must act promptly on discovering it. It is alleged in the bill that they had no knowledge of the fraudulent character of the representations touching this guaranty fund, until after the assessment was made; and the evidence, we think, establishes that fact. This suit was instituted within a reasonable time thereafter; hence, as to the plaintiffs named, the decree below was proper, except in so far as it set aside the assessment made by the board of directors on September 17, 1891, which, as we have said, is not attacked in the bill.

11. Many other questions are discussed by counsel, but we think those we have considered are decisive of the case. As to the plaintiffs Corey, Loomer, Gould, Blowers, Morgan, Kelley & Tannyhill, and Brown, the decree is affirmed because of the fraud practiced upon them. As to the other plaintiffs named, and all others for whom they sue, upon whom no fraud has been practiced as indicated in the opinion, the decree, in so far as it sets aside the assessment made by the board of directors of date September 17, 1891, will be modified, because of no attack thereon; and that part of the decree which cancels the notes made by all the plaintiffs and enjoins their collection is erroneous as to all except those who were induced to become members of the corporation by false and fraudulent representations. Otherwise the decree is affirmed. Either party may, at his option, exercised within sixty days from the filing of this opinion, have the modified decree indicated by this opinion entered in this court; but, if no such election is made, the cause will be remanded to the district court for a decree in harmony with this opinion.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed, after which, on October 21, 1895, Robinson, J., on behalf of the court, delivered the following opinion:

The defendants are the Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company of Waterloo, Iowa, James P. Sherman, as assignee of that company, and other persons who were concerned in its organization and business. The plaintiffs are policy holders of the company. Measures were taken to organize the company in February, 1887. Soon after that time, it commenced to insure property owners against loss or damage by fire, lightning, cyclones, tornadoes, and windstorms, and continued in that business until the latter part of January, 1891. On the 3d day of February, 1891, it made a general assignment for the benefit of its creditors. The notice and articles of incorporation provided for a corporation to do a mutual insurance business, and which should have a guaranty fund of not more than $50,000, to be secured by the obligations of persons who should subscribe to it in such form as the directors should approve. The form of the guaranty for this fund which was adopted is as follows: "For the purpose of the guaranty or pledge fund of the Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company of Waterloo, Iowa, I hereby promise to take the number of shares of said fund set opposite my name at $100 per share, payable on the order of the directors of said association, provided that not to exceed 10 per cent thereof shall be payable in any six months, and provided that the whole amount of my said subscription shall be void at my option after three years from date hereof. Dated this 24th day of February, A. D. 1887." Eighteen persons signed this obligation for shares of the fund amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $50,000, all but one or two of whom are made parties defendant. Two kinds of policies were issued by the company. To obtain one kind, the person who desired insurance signed an application which contained a promise to pay the company a specified sum at such time and by such instalments as the directors of the company should order, pursuant to the articles of incorporation and by-laws of the company, the assessments not to exceed in any one year a sum named; and the assessment for the first year was usually paid in advance. If the policy was desired for the term of six years, and the obligation was for the sum of $60, $10 would be paid in advance, and not more than $10 during each year of the life of the policy. For convenience, policies of that class may be termed "assessment policies." For the other, or cash, policies, the assured paid money in advance, or gave their notes payable in full without condition. More than one half the policies issued by the company were on the cash plan. The assessments on the deposit obligations or notes were made each year in advance, and notice thereof was sent to each policy holder, subject to assessment, thirty days before his assessment matured. The receipts of the company from ordinary sources were not sufficient to pay losses and expenses, and during the year 1890 it incurred debts for money borrowed to meet its liabilities to the amount of about $11,000. On the 23d day of January, 1891, the subscribers to the guaranty fund met and ordered a special assessment of 10 per cent of the amount of each subscription to the guaranty fund. This was the first assessment on account of that fund which had been made. Three days later, the board of directors of the company met and ordered a special assessment of 25 per cent on the gross amount of each deposit note held by the company on account of policies which were in force before the 1st day of January, 1891, for the purpose of paying accrued losses and expenses. It was also ordered that no new policies should be issued until a further order by the board. On the 3d day of February, 1891, the subscribers to the guaranty fund met, and adopted a resolution rescinding the action of January 23d making a special assessment of 10 per cent of the guaranty fund, and directing that the portion of the assessment collected should be refunded. On the same day the board of directors also ordered that the portions of the assessment collected should be refunded. At the same time, notice was received from nearly all of the subscribers to the guaranty fund of their withdrawal from it. The board of directors then took action as follows: "On motion, it was resolved that general assignment of the property and business of this company be, and the same is hereby, made for the benefit of all the company's creditors, in proportion to their respective claims." On the next day the board elected James P. Sherman assignee, and directed the president and secretary to execute all papers necessary to carry out all orders of the board, and papers were executed accordingly. In February, 1891, the assignee obtained from the judge of the proper district court an order which in terms authorized the delivery to any policy holder of his deposit note upon the payment by him of the 25 per cent assessment made by the board of directors on the 26th day of January. Not quite $5,000 were realized from that assessment, and notes upon which the assessments were so paid were surrendered to the makers. In May, 1891, the district court set aside the assessment of January 26, 1891, so far as it applied to the deposit notes upon which it had not been paid, and ordered a new assessment upon all deposit notes in the hands of the assignee, and which he had surrendered upon the payment of an assessment of 25 per cent, as directed by the order of the judge made in February. The new assessment varied according to the time the note upon which it was made took effect, from 9 per cent to 35⅝ per cent. The order provided that parties who had paid the assessment ordered by the board, and taken up their notes, should receive credit for the amounts they had paid. In September of the same year, the board of directors, on the suggestion of the assignee that the assessment of January 26 was not on a legal basis, and at his request, set it aside, and made a new assessment, in most if not all respects identical with that made by the district court. The money which the last assessment made by the court and by the board of directors was designed to raise was to be used in paying expenses of the company and losses, including those sustained by the holders of cash policies. It is probable that more than one half the losses were under policies of that class. The indebtedness of the company seems to have exceeded the sum of $35,000, and, to pay it, there has been collected only about $5,000.

The plaintiffs, who are makers of deposit notes which were assessed by the district court in May, 1891, and by the board of directors in September of that year, claim that the organization of the company was not made according to law; that it is not a mutual insurance company; that business transacted by it was not authorized by law; that it was procured by fraud; that the assessments in question are illegal; that an assessment of the subscriptions to the guaranty fund should be made and enforced, and the proceeds used to pay the losses and expenses of the company, before the deposit notes should be assessed. The plaintiffs further allege that the questions presented by their petition are of common and general interest to more than 2,000 persons, policy holders in the company on the mutual plan, who have a unity of interest in the object of this litigation; that it is impracticable to bring them all before the court in this action, or for each one of them to bring separate actions; and that this action is brought for the individual benefit of the plaintiffs, and to prevent a multiplicity of suits, for all who are similarly interested. The district court found for the plaintiffs, and ordered and adjudged that the assessment made by the court in May, 1891, and by the board of directors in September, 1891, be set aside and canceled; that the notes made by the plaintiffs, or any of them, to the company, and held by the assignee, be canceled, and held to be illegal and void; and that the defendants be restrained from collecting or attempting to collect or transfer any of such notes. This cause has been submitted to us twice. On the first submission an opinion was filed, but a rehearing was granted, and the cause is again submitted for our determination.

1. The appellants contend that the district court did not have jurisdiction to hear and determine this cause, for the reason that the plaintiffs had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of the law. This question was not raised by the pleadings, nor presented to the district court, but the defendants insist that the objection that the court has no jurisdiction to try a cause may be presented at any time, and that the court will on its own motion, without objection by any party to the action, refuse to consider it on the merits for lack of jurisdiction to do so. That is undoubtedly true of a court which lacks jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action, but does not apply in this state where an action triable as at law is begun in equity, and there prosecuted to a final determination, without objection by either party. Section 2514 of the Code provides that "an error of the plaintiff as to the kind of proceedings adopted shall not cause the abatement or dismissal of the action, but merely a change into the proper proceedings, and a transfer of the action to the proper docket." An error of that kind may be corrected by the plaintiff, or the defendant may have the correction made at or before the filing of his answer. Code, §§ 2515, 2516. Section 2519 contains the following: "An error as to the kind of proceedings adopted in the action is waived by a failure to move for its correction at the time and in the manner prescribed in this chapter." If the petition shows that the court has no jurisdiction of the person or subject-matter of the action, the defendant may demur; and, if the want of jurisdiction is not so shown, it may be set out in the answer; but, if the objection is not so taken, it shall be deemed waived. Code, §§ 2648, 2650. It is contrary to the policy of the statutes of this state to dismiss an action or defeat a recovery on the mere ground that the plaintiff has erred in selecting the proceedings to obtain the relief to which he is entitled. When a mistake of that kind has been made, it should be corrected by an appropriate change in the proceedings, if a correction is desired. We do not hold that a failure to object to the jurisdiction of a court will confer jurisdiction, nor that a court can determine on its merits a cause where it has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the litigation. But district courts of this state have both law and equity jurisdiction. Courts of equity frequently grant relief which might have been obtained at law, as, in some cases where jurisdiction has been acquired for certain purposes, it will be retained after those purposes have been accomplished, to prevent vexatious and unnecessary delays, to simplify the proceedings, and to grant complete relief. It may be that the plaintiffs in this case could have successfully defended in actions founded on their deposit notes, but they allege fraudulent practices on the part of the company to procure such notes, and courts of equity have power to set aside contracts procured by fraud. The plaintiffs allege that the assessments in question were illegal for various reasons, and courts of equity have power, in proper cases, to restrain attempts to collect illegal claims and the instituting of vexatious and useless litigation. The plaintiffs show an interest in the affairs and property of the company, and claim that its guaranty fund shall be resorted to before the assessments in question are enforced, and ask that an assessment on account of the guaranty fund be made. It is clear that the petition of the plaintiffs showed an apparent right to relief which a court of law could have granted, and which, especially in the absence of objection, authorized the district court, as a court of equity, to hear and determine the cause. McVey v. Manatt, 80 Iowa, 135; Gould v. Hurto, 61 Iowa, 47; O'Brien v. Putney, 55 Iowa, 295; Tugel v. Tugel, 38 Iowa, 350; Van Orman v. Merrill, 27 Iowa, 480. See also Niles v. Williams, 24 Conn. 279; Hine v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 478; Tubb v. Fort, 58 Ala. 277; 1 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 4; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. p. 550, note 3; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 129, 130. We are aware that in Keokuk & N. W. R. Co. v. Donnell, 77 Iowa, 225, it was said that "in the absence of any pleading raising the objection based upon the want of jurisdiction by reason of the fact that there is a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, or the absence of objection in any form based upon this fact, this court will itself, sua sponte, raise the objection." But what was thus said was not applicable to any question presented by the record in the case, and must not be regarded as authority. We do not decide that the relief to which the petition shows the plaintiffs to be entitled could have been obtained at law, but conclude that, even if it could have been thus obtained, the objections now made to the jurisdiction of this court to determine the case on its merits cannot be sustained, for the reasons shown.

2. The appellees affirm, and the appellants deny, that this action may be maintained, not merely for the plaintiffs, but also for the benefit of other policy holders whose interests in the matters in litigation are like those of the plaintiffs. Section 2549 of the Code is as follows: "When the question is one of a common or general interest to many persons, or when the parties are very numerous and it is impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the benefit of the whole." The majority are of the opinion and hold that the plaintiffs have brought themselves within the provisions of that section, and that this action is not only for the benefit of the persons named as plaintiffs, but also for the benefit of all policy holders unnamed, whose interests in the matters in controversy are similar to those of the plaintiffs named. The writer does not express any opinion in regard to that question, for the reason that it is his judgment that the relief granted by the district court was limited to the plaintiffs named, and they do not appeal.

3. It is important to determine the authority under which the company was organized, and its powers with respect to the business it attempted to transact. The appellees contend that it was not a mutual but a stock company; while the appellants insist that it was a mutual company, organized to transact business authorized by § 1160, under the provisions of chap. 1 of title 9 of the Code. All parties agree that it was not organized as a mutual company, as provided by §§ 1122–1125, inclusive, which are a part of chap. 4 of title 9 of the Code. Section 1160 is of the same chapter, and contains the following: "Nothing in this chapter shall be so construed as to prevent any number of persons from making mutual pledges and giving valid obligations to each other for their own insurance from loss by fire, or death, or loss or damage by tornadoes, lightning, hailstorms, cyclones or wind-storms, but such associations of persons shall in no case insure any property not owned by one of their own number, except such schoolhouses and church buildings as the said companies deem proper to insure within the territory where they do business; . . . nor shall the provisions of this chapter be applicable to such associations or companies. . . . And such companies organized under this sction shall pay the same fees for annual reports as are now paid for stock companies, but such associations or companies shall receive no premiums nor make any dividends; but the word 'premiums' herein shall not be construed to mean policy and survey fees, nor the necessary expenses of such companies." This section authorizes the organization of mutual insurance companies which shall not be subject to other provisions of the chapter in which it is found. See State, Auditor, v. Iowa Mut. Aid Asso. 59 Iowa, 133. Section 1058 of the Code authorizes the incorporation of any number of people for the transaction of any lawful business, and following sections of the same chapter prescribe the method of organization and the powers and liabilities of such corporations. The articles of incorporation of the defendant company recite that the persons therein named "do hereby form an association under the laws of Iowa for the purpose of mutual insurance upon our property and that of all other persons who may become members of this association by the giving of mutual pledges thereon;" that "the general nature of the business to be transacted by the association shall be the insurance of the property of its members against loss or damage by fire, lightning, cyclone, tornado, or wind-storms;" that "the fund of the association for the payment of insurance losses, and the necessary expenses thereof, shall consist exclusively of money raised by assessment on mutual pledges given by the members for their insurance. Such assessments shall be made only by the directors or executive committee, and may be limited by the by-laws, and shall always be apportioned pro rata among the members insured; that "all persons insuring in this association shall be members thereof during the period of their insurance, and no longer, and the charges for such insurance and membership shall be regulated by the board of directors of the association." The articles were duly signed and acknowledged by the incorporators, and were recorded in the office of the recorder of Blackhawk county, and in the office of the secretary of state, and a notice of the incorporation was duly published. By-laws were adopted, and the requirements of chapter 1 of title 9 of the Code in regard to the organization of corporations seem to have been fully complied with.

It is claimed, however, that certain provisions of the articles of incorporation and by-laws make the corporation a stock, and not a mutual, company. Those provisions relate to the guaranty fund, and to the privileges and duties of the guarantors. The articles of incorporation provide that the affairs of the association shall be conducted by a board of directors, who shall be chosen by the guarantors or shareholders from among their members; that the guaranty fund shall not exceed $50,000, and shall consist of shares of $100 each, transferable among the members upon the books of the association, and not otherwise; that the fund may be increased by vote of two thirds of the holders thereof at any regular meeting, and that each share shall be entitled to one vote upon all questions affecting the interests of the association; that the articles of incorporation "may be amended at any regular or called meeting of the shareholders by two-thirds vote thereof." Article 7 relates to the guaranty fund, and is as follows: "The said fund shall be secured by the obligations of the holders thereof, to be known as 'fund' or 'guaranty,' in such form as the directors shall approve, and shall be subject to assessment by the board of directors, not exceeding 10 per cent in any six months, for the purpose of meeting losses and expenses for which the association may be liable on its certificates of insurance, but only when there is not sufficient money raised from assessments or pledges of members to pay such losses when due; and all moneys so paid from the guaranty or obligation fund shall be regarded as advancement, which shall be repaid from the funds of the association as may be ordered by the directors." Article 8 exempts the private property of members and the subscribers to the guaranty fund from the corporate debts, "except to the extent of their respective obligations to the association on account of such subscriptions." And article 9 requires the directors to elect from their own number or from the guarantors a president, a vice president, secretary, treasurer, and executive committee. The by-laws are in harmony with the articles of incorporation with respect to the guarantors and the guaranty fund, and provide that the fund shall not be liable to assessment for the payment of insurance losses, "except in emergency and by majority vote of the directors." We do not think these provisions are sufficient to establish the character of the corporation as a stock rather than a mutual insurance company. The guaranty fund was not designed to be any part of the working capital of the company, but was to be drawn upon only in case of emergency, when the money raised from assessments should be insufficient to pay losses when due; and all money obtained from the guaranty fund was to be regarded as a mere temporary advancement or loan, to be refunded on the order of the directors. It was held in Berry v. Anchor Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Iowa) 62 N. W. 681, that it is not unlawful for a mutual insurance company to provide a guaranty fund by means like those adopted in this case. The company under consideration in the Berry Case was organized under chapter 4 of title 9 of the Code; but much that was said in that case and the conclusion reached in regard to such a fund are applicable in this case. The articles of incorporation of the defendant company show that its object is to do a mutual insurance business, insuring only the property of its members. The articles contain no authority to insure the property of anyone who is not a member. Whether the provisions which are designed to give the subscribers to the guaranty fund absolute control of the corporation are valid we need not determine. No objection appears to have been made prior to the commencement of this action to their enforcement, and, if invalid, the legal existence of the company and the obligations of the plaintiffs on their deposit notes are not thereby impaired. We conclude that the company was organized under the provisions of chapter 1 of title 9 of the Code, to insure the property of its members on the mutual plan, as authorized by § 1160 of the Code, and that it cannot be regarded in any sense as a stock company.

4. It is claimed by the appellees that their deposit notes are not collectible, because they do not state on their face that they were taken for insurance, as required by § 1146 of the Code. If we understand the record, it shows that the notes in question recite that they were given in consideration of a policy of insurance, which is described; but, if this were not so, the notes would not be invalid on that ground, for the reason that the section specified is a part of chapter 4 of title 9 of the Code, and therefore is not applicable in this case.

5. It is claimed by the appellants that the cash policies were not issued on the stock plan, but were a part of the mutual insurance business which the company was authorized to do. It is said, in effect, that the chief difference between the holders of the cash and the assessment policies is that the former pay in advance what the latter pay as assessed, and that it would be grossly unjust to hold that the policy holders, having the benefit of time in which to make payments, cannot be compelled to contribute for the payment of the losses sustained by those paying in full for their policies when issued. As we have seen, the company was authorized by its articles of incorporation and by § 1160 of the Code to insure the property of its members only. The funds for the payment of its losses and expenses were to consist exclusively of moneys "raised by assessment on mutual pledges given by the members for their insurance," provision being made for borrowing temporarily from the guaranty fund. The by-laws provide for the acquiring of membership as follows: "Every person wishing to become a member of this association shall, previously to being insured, deposit his application, together with his mutual obligation or pledge, upon which he shall pay ——— per cent, which shall be indorsed thereon at date of the policy; and, if said application and obligation be approved by the directors or executive committee, the policy of insurance shall bear date at noon, unless otherwise directed by the applicant." It is true that one of the articles of incorporation states that "all persons insuring in this association shall be members thereof during the period of their insurance, and no longer; but this cannot be construed to create a membership excepting as authorized by the statute and by the articles of incorporation. The company could not have transacted business on both the stock and the mutual plan. We have found that it was empowered to transact the business authorized by § 1160 of the Code, and that permits insurance on the mutual plan only; but, if the business of the company were not governed by that section, it would fall within the provision of the other sections of the same chapter, and among them is § 1159, which prohibits companies organized upon the mutual plan to take risks upon the stock plan, and also prohibits companies organized upon the stock plan to do business upon the plan of a mutual insurance company. An examination of the policies issued by the defendant company shows that the assessment policies were issued on the application of the persons who desired the insurance, and that appended to each application was an obligation by which the applicant promised to pay to the company a specified sum of money at such time and in such instalments, not exceeding one sixth of the gross amount in any one year, as the directors of the company should assess and order. When the policy was issued on such an application, the insured became a member of the company by virtue of its articles of incorporation and the statute which authorized them. Provision was made in the by-laws of the company and in the policies for the cancelation of the policies and the surrender of the obligation of the insured upon the payment of all sums for which they were liable. The assured under a cash policy was not required to sign an application nor an undertaking of any kind. The policy he received provided for its cancelation and a refund of the premium received, after deducting therefrom the short rates, and also provided that in case the policy had been in force one year or in case of its cancelation by the company, the assured should be entitled to a proportionate share of the benefits of the company during the time his policy should have been in force, but a cancelation by him forfeited his right to dividends. Some reliance is placed upon the last provision, but it is in violation of § 1160 of the Code, which prohibits the payment of dividends by companies organized under it. A section of the by-laws provides that "the association will make insurance for the term not exceeding six years, and the amount to be deposited in cash and obligation for the insurance of any buildings or other property shall be according to the hazard of such risk, and all circumstances affecting such risk." The deposit in cash referred to is that part of the obligation which was to be collected in advance. The company, in issuing assessment policies, required the payment of one assessment when the policy was issued. That practice was authorized by the section of the by-laws quoted, and was important and proper to provide funds for the current necessities of the company, and to prevent insuring property without compensation, and was not a violation of the law which required it to do a mutual business. The obligation of the assured remained subject to assessment, and the mutuality of the pledges of the holders of the assessment policies was not in any manner affected by the payment of the first assessment.

Whether money might be deposited as a pledge under § 1160 of the Code is a question we need not determine, for the reason that neither the articles of incorporation and the by-laws of the company nor its practice warrant the claim that the cash payments were designed to be mere pledges. There was no pretense that the money so paid was to be drawn upon from time to time by means of assessments, and that the portion, if any, remaining at the end of the term of insurance, was to be refunded. The payments were absolute, without condition, excepting in case of cancelation. We conclude that the cash policies were issued on the stock plan, and therefore without authority.

6. The fraud with which the company is charged in procuring the deposit notes in question is alleged to have been committed substantially as follows: In February, 1887, James P. Sherman published a notice to the effect that he and his associates would organize the company, and that "the guaranty fund or capital stock shall not exceed the sum of $50,000, which shall be paid as ordered by the directors and as required in said articles and by-laws." The articles of incorporation we have already considered were adopted, and the company was organized. A notice of incorporation was published, which contained the following: "The said corporation, by its articles of incorporation and by-laws, authorizes and provides for a guaranty fund, not to exceed $50,000, consisting of limited individual pledges made by certain of the incorporators and other members, which shall be paid as ordered by the directors and as required in said articles and by-laws." The notice and articles described the business of the corporation as that of a mutual company. Circulars, folders, and other advertisements were issued by the company, which contained various representations calculated to inspire confidence in the plans and methods of the company, and stated that the guaranty fund was pledged to the prompt payment of the losses should the funds from the assessments be inadequate, thus affording double security to policy holders. The guaranty fund was always described as a part of the assets of the company, and sometimes as permanent and as designed to protect policy holders against an assessment of more than one sixth of the amount of their deposit notes in any one year. There were also representations to the effect that the company was a corporation of this state, composed of people who resided in it, and that it was designed to transact business only in this state. Other claims were also made, which are shown to have been well founded.

We do not think the alleged fraud on the part of the company furnishes sufficient ground upon which to relieve the plaintiffs from liability on their deposit notes. They knew that the company claimed to do business on the mutual plan, and, when they gave their obligations and received their policies, they became members of it. It is well settled that the members of a mutual insurance company are presumed to have knowledge of its articles of incorporation and by-laws. Hobbs v. Iowa Mut. Ben. Asso. 82 Iowa, 112, 11 L. R. A. 299; Walsh v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 30 Iowa, 144, 6 Am. Rep. 664; Simeral v. Dubuque Mut. F. Ins. Co. 18 Iowa, 319. See also Lucas v. White Line Transfer Co. 70 Iowa, 546, 59 Am. Rep. 449; May, Ins. § 552; 2 Wood, Ins. § 538. The articles of incorporation and by-laws showed conclusively that the guaranty fund was not designed to relieve the makers of deposit notes from the assessments to which they were liable by their terms, and there was nothing in the representations of which they complain which could have misled them to their prejudice. Many of them were mere expressions of belief or opinion, and should have been treated as such by the plaintiffs if they knew of them. The notice published by James P. Sherman was not required by law. The notice of incorporation stated that the guaranty fund consisted of limited individual pledges, and as to that was of a nature to provoke inquiry. Very few of the false representations are shown to have influenced the plaintiffs or to have been known by them. They had constructive knowledge, at least, of the provisions contained in the articles of incorporation and by-laws in regard to the funds which were to be used in the payment of expenses and losses, and they had actual knowledge of the obligations they signed. Most of the representations in regard to the guaranty fund were in fact true, and it had an existence in the form of the obligation of the subscribers to it when the policies of the plaintiff were issued, and until the day of the assignment. The plaintiffs had no reason to believe that the guaranty fund would be used to relieve them permanently from any part of the assessments to which their obligations made them liable, and they have no just ground for complaint if they are not required to pay more money in any year, nor to pay more in the aggregate than their contracts warrant. The provisions in the subscription to the guaranty fund for the termination of the liability of the guarantors may not have been known to the plaintiffs, and they are not shown to be chargeable with knowledge of it, but that provision in no manner affects their liability on the deposit notes in question. It may be that representations made by officers and agents of the company to some of the plaintiffs, and statements contained in some of the advertising matter circulated in its interests, if relied upon by them, would have authorized a court of equity to cancel their contracts on the ground of fraud, upon a showing that the plaintiffs were in fact ignorant of the actual contents of the articles of incorporation and of the contents of the by-laws and of the condition of the guaranty fund, had timely application for that relief been made. It is evident that the security to the assured for loss he should sustain, and the value of his policy, would have been greater had there been a guaranty fund which was available at all times when the money from assessments was insufficient to pay losses, and which could not have been destroyed at the option of the guarantors even after a term of years. But the plaintiffs have had the benefit of the insurance during the time for which they are sought to be held liable, and have not been prejudiced by the fraud of which they complain. It would be unjust to their associates in the company, who necessarily relied upon their obligations, as well as those of the other members, for security, to deprive them of it, —especially in view of the fact that the plaintiffs did not ask to be relieved from liability until the company had ceased to do business and had assigned its property for the benefit of creditors.

7. It is claimed that the plaintiffs have shared the benefits which inured to the company from the business which was conducted on the stock plan, and that it would be equitable to require them to aid in paying the losses sustained under cash policies. There is nothing in the record to show which class of policy holders was most benefited by the doing of business on both the stock and mutual plans. The money received from all the business transacted appears to have been used as a common fund from which to pay expenses, and also losses, without regard to the kind of policy under which they occurred. The cash policies were issued largely on property outside the state for short terms. Which kind of insurance produced the largest revenue, and which had the most losses, are facts not shown. It is certain that some of the plaintiffs knew the company was issuing policies for cash premiums, but they do not appear to have been responsible for that plan of doing business, and did nothing which should estop them to deny liability on account of the business so done. We have found that it was not authorized, and that the plaintiffs should not be compelled to contribute to pay the losses sustained by it.

8. The appellees have urged various objections to the organization and proceedings of the company, and the validity of the assignment and assessment, which appear to have been of minor importance. Some of them relate to a failure to observe a part of the requirements of chap. 4 of title 9 of the Code, and are disposed of by what we have already said, and others do not appear to have any foundation in the record.

It is claimed that the by-laws were not properly adopted. The records of the proceedings of the company are shown to be incomplete, but it appears that by-laws were published, and in all respects treated by the company and its officers as in force. We find no reason to conclude that they were not properly adopted.

The claim that the assignment was fraudulent, and that the company was not insolvent when it was made, is not supported by the evidence. The guaranty fund was not, strictly speaking, assets of the company for the purpose of determining its solvency, and would not have been had the subscribers not terminated their liability, for the reason that the company was required to refund all money obtained from it. It is clear that the company was insolvent when the assignment was made, and that it was made in good faith, for a sufficient cause.

The insolvency of the company and its assignment for the benefit of creditors did not have the effect to terminate the obligation of the plaintiffs to contribute to the payment of losses which had occurred prior to the assignment. On the contrary, their liability to pay assessments made to meet such losses and expenses remained unimpaired, for the reason that until that time the contract of insurance was in all respects in force. See Iowa State Ins. Co. v. Prossee, 11 Iowa, 115; Com. v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 120; Doane v. Millville Mut. M. & F. Ins. Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 531; May, Ins. §§ 593, 594.

The articles of incorporation and by-laws do not require that notice of assessments be given before they are made, and no notice of that kind was required to be given by the court. See Wardle v. Cummings, 86 Mich. 395; May, Ins. § 593.

9. Our conclusion is that the deposit notes of the plaintiffs are valid obligations subject to assessment for losses covered by assessment policies which occurred prior to the assignment of the company for the benefit of creditors, and for expenses, but that the assessments can be made and collected only according to the terms of the obligations. By the statutes of this state, the assignee is at all times subject to the order and supervision of the proper court and judge, and, subject to such order and supervision, has as full power and authority to receive, sue for, and recover property of the estate of the assignor, and to dispose of it as the latter had at the time of the assignment. Code, §§ 2123, 2127. The power of the assignor to control and dispose of the property signed is transferred by assignment to the assignee, subject to the order and supervision of the court and judge, and subject to the regulations prescribed by law. It is therefore proper for the court to ascertain what assessments are required, and to order them made as needed and as authorized by the obligations assessed. The assessment made by the court in May, 1891, was on an erroneous basis, and was therefore properly set aside; but the court below erred in deciding the obligations of the plaintiffs to be void, and that they be canceled, and in enjoining all attempts to collect, enforce, or transfer them. The petition did not ask relief in regard to the assessment made by the board of directors in September, 1891, and the court therefore erred in setting it aside, although we do not hold that it was legal. The cause will be remanded, with directions to the district court to proceed in harmony with this opinion.

The decree rendered by it is reversed.

Granger, J.:

I concur in the conclusions in this case, but I do not wish to be understood as concurring in a holding, under § 2549, that a party may appear for another having similar interests, unless such appearance is in some way authorized.

Kinne, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in the result reached in this case, nor am I content with the view of the sixth division of the opinion touching the question of the fraud practiced upon plaintiffs. The question is there treated as though the fraud pleaded and relied upon to avoid the obligations of plaintiffs have been practiced upon them after they in fact became members of the company. Such is not the case. The fraud relied upon was prior to the time they became members of the company. It is claimed to have been by reason of the alleged fraudulent representations that plaintiffs were induced to become members of the company. Now, as to such fraud, no presumption arises or obtains that plaintiffs had knowledge of the articles and by-laws, and they are in no manner concluded or bound thereby; therefore the cases cited have no application. The rule contended for by the majority only applies as to fraud practiced after plaintiffs had become members of the company. Such are not the facts in this case.

Deemer, J., concurs with Kinne, J., in what is said regarding the sixth division of the opinion.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Alabama, ex rel. Shirley BRAGG, Appt.,
v.
C. P. ROGERS, Jr., et al.

1. A statute reconstructing or reforming an existing board of revenue is not invalid because its title is "An Act to Establish a Board of Revenue."

2. A statute original in form and in itself intelligible and complete, although in some respects it modifies and changes existing statutes which are not recited at length, does not violate a constitutitional provision against reviving or amending a law without re-enacting or publishing it at length.

NOTE.—The constitutional requirement that courts shall be kept open is considered also in Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Chowning (Tex.) 24 L. R. A. 504; and a somewhat similar constitutional provision that justice shall be administered freely and without purchase is considered in Henderson v. State, Stout (Ind.) 24 L. R. A. 469.

3. A statute requiring a county board of revenue to act in private when passing on any claim or awarding a contract does not violate a constitutional provision that courts must be open, since in such matters it is not in the exercise of judicial power.

(July 30, 1895.)

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lowndes County in favor of defendants in a quo warranto proceeding to determine defendant's right to act as a board of revenue for Lowndes County. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Cook & Gordon for appellant.

Messers. J. C. Richardson and Charles A. Whitten for appellees.

Brickell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an information in the nature of a quo warranto, and its real purpose is to test the legality of the present organization of the board of revenue for the town of Lowndes. The board is organized in conformity to the provisions of an act of the last general assembly, entitled "An Act to Establish a Board of Revenue for Lowndes County, and Define the Powers and Duties of Said Board of Revenue." Pamph. Acts 1894-95, p. 186. The 1st section declares the board of revenue for the county shall be so changed as to consist of five members, to be elected at the biennial election for state and county officers, and relieves the judge of probate from all official connection with the board. The 2d section declares the board, as changed, shall have and continue in the exercise of all the powers and duties now conferred or hereafter to be conferred on them by law, and that the board "is in nowise changed from what it is now, except as herein provided." The 3d section declares that the four members of the board elected at the preceding August election shall remain members, and that C. P. Rogers, Jr., shall constitute the fifth member. The term of office and compensation is fixed, and vacancies are to be filled by the appointment of the governor. The 4th section requires the board, as changed, to hold its first meeting on the 22d of December, 1894, at the office of the circuit clerk of the county, and fixes that as their general place of meeting. At such meeting, a chairman of the board was to be elected, holding office during the term of the board; vacancies in the chairmanship to be filled by the board. The 5th section declares the clerk of the circuit court of the county clerk of the board, and prescribes his duties and compensation. The 6th section requires the sessions of the board to be held at the time appointed by the existing law, and makes provision for extraordinary meetings. The 7th section declares that claims against the county may be passed on, or contracts for the payment of money entered into, only at the regular meetings; and at least three members must concur in the allowance of a claim or the making of a contract. If there be division, the clerk is required, as part of the proceedings of the board, to record the vote; and the last clause is: "Nor shall any claim be passed on, or any contract awarded, save when the said board and their clerk are in private." The 8th section relates to the issue of warrants for the payment of claims, the payment of jury certificates, and other matters not now of importance.

The primary insistence is that the whole act is unconstitutional and void, because offensive to the clause of the 2d section of the 4th article of the Constitution, which, with exceptions it is not necessary to enumerate, requires that "each law shall contain but one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title." The unity of the subject of the act is not and could not be doubted. The insistence is that the title does not fairly indicate or express it,—that it expresses the purpose to originate or create a board of revenue, while there is no more than a reconstruction or reformation of the existing board,—and that, of consequence, the title is deceptive and misleading. The history and purposes of this constitutional mandate are so well known and understood, and the principles of interpretation which control in determining its application and operation have been the subject of such repeated judicial consideration and decision, that there is no room or reason for further discussion or elucidation of them. In considering whether a legislative enactment is violative of this requirement, the courts proceed upon the presumption which obtains when considering whether any other limitation of the Constitution has been violated. The presumption is that the legislature has not exceeded its powers, and unless it be clear that there has been a substantial departure from the Constitution the validity of the legislative act must be supported. People, Rochester, v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 558. Until 1861, in this state, following the common law, the title of an act was not considered a part of it. It did not control the words of the body of the act, however foreign or diverse to the title they may have been. If, in themselves, the words were ambiguous or of doubtful import to aid in their construction resort was had to the title. Bartlett v. Morris, 9 Port. (Ala.) 266. The Constitution of 1861 was the origin of constitutional requirements relating to the titles of statutes. The words of the requirement were: "Each law shall embrace but one subject, which shall be described in its title." And in this form it passed into the Constitution of 1865. The phraseology was changed by the Constitution of 1868 to the present form. The difference in phraseology has not caused any change or difference of construction, each clause being deemed significant of the same purposes, and each having the same operation. Montgomery Mut. Bldg. & Loan Asso. v. Robinson, 69 Ala. 416. In the first of our cases interpreting or construing this constitutional requirement (Ex parte Pollard, 40 Ala. 98), it was said by Walker, Ch., J.: "The Constitution requires that only one subject should be embraced and that it should be described in the title. 'Subject' is a very indefinite word. A phrase may state the subject in a very general or indefinite manner, or with minute particularity. The subject of laws with such titles as the following: 'To adopt a penal code,' 'To adopt the common law of England in part,' 'To adopt a code of laws,' 'To ratify the by-laws of a corporation,'—would be expressed in a very general way, and very little knowledge of the specific provisions of the laws could be gleaned from the title; yet it would nevertheless be true that the subject was described in the title. . . It is impossible to prescribe any standard of particularity for the legislature. The Constitution has not attempted to do so. It exacts from the legislature an announcement in the title of the subject, but does not dictate any degree of particularity. This is a matter left to legislative discretion. . . . The object of the constitutional provision was to prevent deception by the inclusion in a bill of matter incongruous with the title. The evil contemplated was not the generality and comprehensiveness of titles. Those faults do not tend to mislead or deceive." Again: "The question must always be, whether, taking from the title the subject, we can find anything in the bill which cannot be referred to that subject. If we do, the law embraces a subject not described in the title. But this conclusion should never be attained except by argument characterized by liberality of construction and freedom from all nice verbal criticism." The illustrations employed by the learned chief justice may or may not be in all respects correct, but the principle asserted that the constitutional requirement is not directed against the generality and comprehensiveness of titles, and that all its purposes are satisfied when the law has but one general object which is fairly indicated in its title, underlies all our numerous decisions upon this question. Because of the generality and comprehensiveness of the title, if the general subject of the enactment is fairly indicated, sentence of nullity has not been pronounced. It is only when matter foreign to or incongruous with the title has been introduced that the title has been declared misleading and deceptive, and the enactment pronounced void. Nor is it necessary that the legislature adopt that which the courts may regard as the most appropriate or expressive title. The courts do not subject the title to the rules of a nice verbal criticism, or legislative action, as it has been properly said, would often be frustrated, without fulfilling the intention of the framers of the Constitution. It may be conceded the title of the present act would be appropriate as the title of an act originating and creating a board of revenue. It is the title of the act originating and creating the board of revenue for the county of Lowndes. Pamph. Acts 1875–76, p. 383. But this does not involve the concession that the title is so inappropriate as to offend the Constitution, when it is employed as indicative of the subject of the reconstruction, reformation, or reconstitution of an existing board. The insistence hinges on the use of the word "establish," which seems to be supposed incapable of proper use when employed in this connection, or of any other signification than "to found and set up." Yet it is as often employed to signify the putting or fixing on a firm basis, of putting in a settled or efficient state or condition, an existing legal organization or institution, as it is to founding or setting up such organization or institution. The one meaning is as little recondite, abstruse, or obscure as the other. In People, Drake, v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481, which is regarded in all courts as a leading and controlling authority in the exposition and application of the constitutional requirement, the title of the act was, "An Act to Establish a Police Government for the City of Detroit." It was said by Cooley, J.: "The general purpose of this act is 'to establish a police government for the city of Detroit.' It would be difficult to express it better or more concisely than it is expressed by the title. To accomplish this general object, officers are authorized to be appointed, who shall take upon themselves certain duties before performed by other officers, as well as certain new duties now created, and who are authorized to appoint and govern a force. The act with great particularity prescribes how this police government shall be rendered effectual; but this particularity cannot possibly be objectionable so long as it introduces nothing foreign and incongruous, but is confined to the means supposed to be important to the end indicated." The argument in support of the insistence of the appellant proposes to deflect judicial inquiry from its appointed sphere—the consideration whether the title of the present act fairly indicates the one subject to which the act is devoted—to the consideration whether a more appropriate and expressive title could not have been selected; and this involves nice criticism of the meaning of the word "establish." The discretion of the legislature in the selection of titles is to be invaded, and the presumption in favor of the validity of legislative acts is to be foregone and repelled.

The next insistence is that the act offends the clause of the same section and article of the Constitution which provides that "no law shall be revived, amended, or the provisions thereof extended or conferred by reference to its title only; but so much thereof as is revived, amended, extended, or conferred, shall be re-enacted and published at length." The act is in form original, and is in itself intelligible and complete. In some respects it modifies and changes the existing statutes from which the board of revenue of the county derived organization and existence. The more material of the changes is relieving the judge of probate from official connection with the board, devolving on a chairman, of the selection of the board, and on the clerk of the circuit court the duties the judge had been required to perform. This clause of the Constitution, like the preceding clause relating to titles, has been the subject of frequent judicial construction. Its purposes and scope were explained by Cooley, J., in People, Drake, v. Mahaney, supra: "This constitutional provision must receive a reasonable construction, with a view to give it effect. The mischief designed to be remedied was the enactment of amendatory statutes in terms so blind that legislators themselves were sometimes deceived in regard to their effect, and the public, from the difficulty in making the necessary examination and comparison, failed to become apprised of the changes made in the laws. An amendatory act which purported only to insert certain words, or to substitute one phrase for another, in an act or section, which was only referred to, but not republished, was well calculated to mislead the careless as to its effect, and was, perhaps, sometimes drawn in that form for that express purpose. Endless confusion was thus introduced into the law, and the Constitution wisely prohibits such legislation. But an act complete in itself is not within the mischief designed to be remedied by this provision and cannot be held to be prohibited by it without violating its plain intent." In Ex parte Pollard, supra, it is said: "It was never intended by the Constitution that every law which would affect some previous statute of variant provisions on the same subject should set out the statute or statutes so affected at full length. If this were so, it would be impossible to legislate. The constitutional provision reaches those cases where the act is strictly amendatory or revisory in its character. Its prohibition is directed against the practice of amending or revising laws by additions, or other alterations, which, without the presence of the original act, are usually unintelligible. If a law is in itself complete and intelligible, and original in form, it does not fall within the meaning and spirit of the Constitution." All the purposes of the present act could doubtless have been accomplished by an act strictly and in form amendatory,—by setting out the existing statutes, amending and re-enacting them; but it is obvious the amendatory act would have been cumbersome, and not more intelligible than is the present act, whether an amendatory act or an original act should be employed was matter of legislative judgment and discretion, which the courts cannot control. In People, Washington Park Comrs. v. Banks, 67 N. Y. 575, it is said: "It is not necessary in order to avoid a conflict with this article of the Constitution, to re-enact general laws whenever it is necessary to resort to them to carry into effect a special statute. Such cases are not within the letter or spirit of the Constitution, or the mischief intended to be remedied. By such a reference the general statute is not incorporated into or made a part of the special statute. The right is given, the duty declared, or burden imposed by the special statute; but the enforcement of the right or duty, and the final imposition of the burden, are directed to be in the form and by the procedure given by the other and general laws of the state. Reference is made to such laws, not to affect or qualify the substance of the legislation or vary the terms of the act, but merely for the formal execution of the law. The evil in view in adopting this provision of the Constitution was the incorporating into acts of the legislature, by reference to other statutes, of clauses and provisions of which the legislators might be ignorant, and which, affecting public or private interests in a manner and to an extent not disclosed upon the face of the act, a bill might become a law which would not receive the sanction of the legislature if fully understood."

The remaining objection to the validity of the act is directed to the last clause of the 7th section: "Nor shall any claim be passed on, or any contract awarded, save when the said board and their clerk are in private." The contention is that this clause is offensive to the declaration of the Bill of Rights "that all courts shall be open." If the contention was colorable, it would perhaps be a duty to pass it with the observation that it cannot be said the present record raises the question of the validity of the act in this respect, and until it was shown that the board had assembled in private, excluding from its presence some citizens having or claiming the right to be present, the question could not arise. But the contention is not colorable, and to quiet the controversy we have concluded to pass on it. In the making of contracts, and in the audit and allowance or rejection of claims, the board is not in the exercise of judicial power, nor sitting as a court. It is of peculiar Constitution. It has powers which are in their nature judicial, other powers which are in their nature legislative, and other powers—the powers of most frequent exercise—which are purely administrative or executive. It is in the exercise of mere administrative power in the making of contracts and in the allowance or rejection of claims. Board of Revenue v. Barber, 53 Ala. 589; Clarke v. Jack, 60 Ala. 271; Jeffersonian Pub. Co. v. Hilliard, 105 Ala. 576. Then it bears a close resemblance to the board of aldermen of a municipal corporation, or of directors of private corporations. It would, in the absence of the statute, rest in its discretion whether, in the making of contracts and the audit of claims, its deliberations should be private or public. As the pecuniary interests of the citizens and of the county are brought into antagonism, there may be, often, manifest propriety in their deliberating in private, free from all interference and from all extraneous influences. The act, it will be observed, affords no opportunity for avoiding responsibility for official action. It is only at the regular terms of the board that contracts may be made or claims allowed. A majority must concur in the making of a contract or allowance of a claim. The making of a contract or the allowance of a claim is a matter which will appear of record. If there is division in the board, the clerk records the vote of each member. The records of the board are public records, at all suitable times open to the inspection of any citizen of the county. While the act compels the board to deliberate and act in private, it equally compels publicity of the result of the deliberations, securing official responsibility to the constituency of the board.

For the reasons we have given, we are satisfied that the act is constitutional, and that the board of revenue is legally constituted and organized.

The result is the judgment of the Circuit Court must be affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Patrick F. RYAN, Respt.,
v.
LOS ANGELES ICE & COLD STORAGE COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

1. Tightening up the nuts on the generator of a refrigerating machine without reducing the pressure, when there is an ammonia pressure of about 120 pounds which is increasing, is a dangerous work at which a carpenter employed as a general laborer or handyman, but unfamiliar with and uninstructed as to the danger or the mode of operation necessary to preserve an equal strain on all parts of the generator, cannot be set without rendering the employer liable to him for injury resulting from an explosion caused by his lack of skill.
2. The explosion of the generator of a refrigerating machine a minute or two after tightening nuts to stop a leak, under an ammonia pressure much less than that which had been sustained the day before, is not necessarily the result of an unforeseen and unaccountable cause not chargeable to any negligence, when the nuts were tightened by inexperienced men, and the equality of the strain upon the parts may have been disturbed in tightening them.
3. Instructing the jury to find for plaintiff or for defendant in case they find the existence of certain enumerated facts which are within the issues, on which evidence has been given, does not violate a constitutional provision against charging with respect to matters of fact.
4. An engineer in charge of a refrigerating machine under the direction of the superintendent and general manager of a corporation when he is present, and in sole charge during his absence, with the same power to control workmen that the superintendent had when present, is not at such a time a fellow servant of a workman under his control who is injured while obeying his orders in a dangerous service.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence for which defendant was responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Wells & Lee and Calvin Edgerton, for appellant:

This was an accident, and it arose from an unforeseen and unaccountable cause, the consequences of which cannot with certainty be traced to the negligence of the defendant, and the court is powerless to render relief.

If in a particular case the harm complained of is not such as a reasonable man in the defendant's place should have foreseen as likely to happen, there is no wrong and no liability.

the presumption must be that the explosion was caused by the manner in which or the means by which the nuts were being tightened.

Madden v. Occidental & O. S. S. Co. 86 Cal. 448.

This machine had just been brought on the premises, had never been subjected to ammonia pressure at any time, and the very first time that it was heated up, those inexperienced men were directed to do this work, under conditions highly dangerous, with an implement that greatly enhanced the danger, without a word of warning of the danger or instructions from the employer as to the caution and care necessary to safely do the work.

When the employee is injured as a consequence of this work, without negligence on his part, the employer is liable.

Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 421; Baxter v. Roberts, 44 Cal. 187, 13 Am. Rep. 610.

Haynes, C., filed the following opinion:

Action to recover damages for personal injuries, and this appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The injury occurred March 20, 1890. Plaintiff was a carpenter by trade, and some two years prior to the accident was employed by the defendant in that capacity alone, but after the completion of the buildings he was used in making alterations and repairs when necessary, and as a general laborer, roustabout, or handyman. He was not an engineer, or machinist, or familiar with machinery at the time he entered defendant's service, nor afterwards, and prior to the accident, except so far as his general employment may have given opportunity for observation. A new still or generator had been put in place, and was first attempted to be used the day of the accident. This generator consisted of a wrought iron shell about 2 feet in diameter, and was made in two sections, each about 10 feet long, connected at the center by a cast-iron drum, and each end closed with a heavy cast-iron head, kept in place by iron rods running from end to end on the outside of the shell and through the heads, and secured by nuts on the outside of the heads, by which they could be drawn and secured against the ends of the shell. These heads were rabbeted to the depth of $\frac{5}{8}$ of an inch, corresponding to the ends of the shell or cylinder, the groove being nearly filled with lead, so that the ends of the cylinder were drawn partially into the grooves against the lead, the object being to make a tight joint. Within the generator or cylinder were a system of steam pipes, connected with the boiler in the engine room, for the purpose of heating the aqua ammonia, with which the generator was filled to about two thirds of its capacity, the steam not escaping into the generator, but passing through it within the pipes. The ammonia being thus heated produces a gas which fills the remaining space in the generator in the same manner that steam fills the vacant space in a boiler, and the pressure of the gas thus generated increases rapidly as the heat of the ammonia is increased. The steam, being confined within pipes, does not add to the pressure of the gas except as it operates in heating the ammonia. According to Mr. Troutwein, a witness for defendant, the proper working steam pressure is 45 to 50 pounds, and that produces an ammonia pressure of 180 to 235 pounds to the square inch. On the day of the accident the generator had been charged with ammonia for the first time. The steam pressure being used at the time of the accident appears to have been 20 pounds, and the ammonia pressure is variously stated at from 117 to 120 pounds, as shown by the gauge. A working pressure had not yet been reached, but at this stage it was discovered that the generator was leaking at the drum in the center of the generator, and the plaintiff and another employee, who had no more knowledge or experience, were called upon by the engineer, according to plaintiff's testimony, "to get a socket wrench and a bar, and set up on those bolts or nuts and stop that leak," and while they were doing so, or had just ceased work on it, the generator exploded, and the plaintiff was seriously injured. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff, and also answers to certain special issues submitted to them. It is not claimed, however, that the special issues required a different judgment, but it is strenuously insisted that the evidence does not justify the verdict. It would require more space than can be devoted to this opinion to discuss fully and in detail the many points made by counsel for appellant on this branch of the case. The controlling questions only can be noticed.

It is urged that plaintiff's employment was general; that he worked at anything he was called upon to do, and that this included the work of tightening up the nuts on the generator, and that he was not inexperienced in that particular work. Conceding that, in a sense, his employment in course of time became general, the evidence is uncontradicted that he was wholly inexperienced in the operation of machinery, except so far as he may have acquired it during his employment by the defendant; but there is no evidence tending to show that he understood or appreciated the expansive force of steam, or of the gas generated from ammonia, or the principles involved in the construction of generators, or the care required to preserve an equal strain upon all its parts. Whether he had, prior to the time of the accident, assisted in this particular work, is a matter about which the evidence is strongly conflicting; but the jury found upon one of the special issues that "the explosion was caused by allowing inexperienced men to tighten up on the nuts on the bolts with an increasing ammonia pressure." Even if plaintiff had before this been required to tighten such bolts under similar circumstances, the operation being conceded to be dangerous unless skillfully done, his skill and experience would not thereby be necessarily established. These qualifications require something more than knowing how to handle a wrench. He must be able to determine where the pressure is least, and when he has secured an equal pressure upon all the bolts, then, if further tightening is required, he may turn each uniformly a little, so as not to disturb to any appreciable extent the equal pressure secured. If he is simply told to turn each a little, and go round the whole number, he may commence where the bolts are tightest, and thus increase the already unequal pressure while strictly obeying instructions. Whether the plaintiff had ever tightened the bolts before is disputed. Richards, one of the engineers, says he did not set plaintiff and Richmond at work tightening the bolts, but saw them at work at it. Dempsey, another of the engineers, testified that he did not exactly remember whether he set the men at work at it or not; that he saw them at work at it; that he did not pay any particular attention to how they proceeded. "Of course, they understood how to do it. They had been instructed before. Every man that had ever tightened had always been instructed to turn the nuts first one some and then others, and keep going round and round." It is not clear from defendant's testimony that they received any instructions at that time; and whether the plaintiff had ever received instructions as to the mode of doing the work must depend upon whether he had ever done it before. Plaintiff denied that he had done so while the generator had pressure on. It is clear that he was not an engineer, and was not employed as such. The work was dangerous, and required skill, and should have been performed by the engineers. No man, however skilled and experienced, can tell where the bolts are slack or tight, unless he has hold of the wrench, and therefore cannot tell whether the work is being properly and safely performed, though standing by and directing it; for, though the tension of the rods or bolts may have been equal before heat was applied, it is by no means certain that the expansion of them, when heated, would be equal. Whether the tightening could be done with reasonable safety without first reducing the pressure was strongly controverted in the evidence, but there was no controversy that doing it without reducing the pressure required care and skill.

Appellant also contends that the accident occurred from an unforeseen and unaccountable cause, which cannot with certainty be traced to the negligence of defendant, and that therefore no relief can be granted the plaintiff. In one aspect of the evidence the explosion seems difficult of satisfactory explanation. The generator was manufactured at Carbondale, Pa., and was there tested with water pressure, and also with air pressure, up to 350 pounds to the square inch, and was calculated to sustain a pressure five times greater than the working pressure required of it. The day before the accident, according to the testimony of Engineer Richards, they subjected it to an air pressure of 160 pounds, and according to the testimony of Mr. Hendrick, 130 pounds. Just before the explosion the gauge showed a pressure of 120 pounds, according to Richards. A given number of pounds pressure, whether produced by gas or condensed air, would make no difference in testing the strength of the cylinder or generator, though possibly, if a break occurred, the expansive qualities of the gas might produce more serious results. If, therefore, the generator were in all its parts in the same condition at the time of the accident that it was in the day before when tested with a greater pressure, it would seem impossible that it should have given way. The solution must therefore be found in what was done to the generator at the time of the explosion. All the expert evidence shows that the danger of doing such work while the generator is under pressure lies in disturbing the equality of the strain upon the parts; that is, in making one part sustain more than its just proportion of the pressure; but as to whether it is prudent or reasonably safe to do the work in question while there is a pressure, there is a serious conflict. It is true, as appellant contends, that the mere happening of an accident, the attending circumstances being unknown, is not evidence of negligence on the part of the owner of the machinery or appliance; but in this case, the tightening of the nuts and the explosion concurring in point of time, we are not authorized to say that the jury could not properly infer that the procuring cause of the explosion was the tightening of the nuts. The explosion did occur. A cause—the tightening of the nuts—which might have produced it, if unskillfully done concurred; while the prior tests to which the generator was subjected would seem to exclude all other supposable causes. It is said, however, that the tightening of the nuts and the explosion did not concur in point of time; that plaintiff and Richmond had completed their work. But this statement is not quite accurate. It is true that, after they had been at work some time in tightening the nuts, they stopped, and stepped aside, to see whether the work they did affected the leak, and that at that moment the explosion occurred. But the fact that they were not at work turning up the nuts at the moment, or within a minute or two or three minutes, of the explosion, does not affect the question. The steam had not been turned off the pipes, nor had the steam pressure reached its working point, so that the heating power of the steam was increasing, and the pressure of the gas generated by the heat was also increasing; but this small increase in the pressure could not have affected the generator had it been in the condition it was in the day before, when it sustained a much greater pressure; and hence this extremely short interval between the suspension of the work and the explosion does not affect the theory adopted by the jury that the explosion was caused by the tightening of the nuts by inexperienced men.

But counsel for appellant in their very able brief further contend that, in order to establish negligence upon the part of the defendant, it must not only appear that the explosion was caused by the agencies and in the manner above indicated, but that such result should reasonably have been foreseen by the defendant; "that a party is not to be held responsible for injuries which could not reasonably have been foreseen or expected as a result of his misconduct." There was evidence tending to show that it was unsafe for a skilled engineer or machinist to tighten up these nuts while the pressure was on, though it may be conceded that the preponderance of the evidence was that it could be done by skilled men with reasonable safety; but there was little conflict in the evidence tending to show that it was dangerous for unskilled or inexperienced men to do it. In order to fix the liability of the master, it is not necessary that he should know that injury will inevitably follow, for that would exhibit express malice, or intent to injure; nor that he knew or believed that it would probably occur, for that would be recklessness scarcely less criminal. This court in Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 421, 422, quoted with approbation the following from Jones v. Florence Min. Co. 66 Wis. 277, 57 Am. Rep. 269: "We think it is now clearly settled that if a master employs a servant to do work in a dangerous place, or where the mode of doing the work is dangerous and apparent to a person of capacity and knowledge of the subject, yet if the servant employed to do work of such a dangerous character or in a dangerous place, from youth, inexperience, ignorance, or want of general capacity, may fail to appreciate the dangers, it is a breach of duty on the part of the master to expose a servant of such character, even with his own consent, to such dangers, unless he first gives him such instructions or cautions as will enable him to comprehend them, and do his work safely with proper care on his part." The instructions given plaintiff by the engineer have already been considered; but, in addition to what has been said, it may be added that it nowhere appears that he was informed that the work was dangerous, or that his safety in any degree depended upon the manner of doing it, or the care with which it was done.

What has been said covers appellant's first and second points. Its third point is that the verdict is against law; but, if we are right in our conclusions upon the propositions above discussed, this contention cannot be sustained. In support of it, however, appellant calls attention to the special finding No. 8. That question and the answer of the jury thereto are as follows: "Did plaintiff and Richmond tighten on one nut, and then pass to the next, tightening a little on each nut as they went along? If not, what does the proof show in respect to tightening the nuts? State how they tightened. A. Yes, but was ignorant of the manner in which the same should be tightened." What has been said heretofore in reference to these instructions, and the manner in which the work should be done, is sufficient to show the meaning of the answer given by the jury.

It is also claimed by appellant that the first and second instructions given by the court of its own motion, and instructions 1 and 3 given at plaintiff's request, violate that provision of the Constitution which declares that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." Article 6, § 19. The objection to these instructions is not well taken. The court instructed the jury that, if they found by a preponderance of the evidence that certain enumerated facts existed, they should find for the plaintiff; but that, if the plaintiff failed to prove any of said facts by a preponderance of the evidence, their verdict should be for defendant. The enumerated facts were within the issues as to which evidence had been given. No reference was made to the evidence as sustaining or tending to sustain any fact.

It is also insisted that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by defendant. These instructions were to the effect that Richards and Dempsey, the engineers, were fellow servants of the plaintiff; that, if defendant had exercised proper care in selecting them, and the plaintiff was injured through their negligence, they and the plaintiff being engaged in the same general business, the defendant was not liable. The facts did not justify such an instruction. E. E. Hendrick was superintendent and general manager of the corporation defendant. He testified that Richards "was an engineer, and had charge of the refrigerating machine under my direction when I was there, and had sole charge of running the refrigerating machine in my absence, and hired and discharged men under my direction." Mr. Hendrick had been at the works, directing the starting up of the refrigerating machine,—the generator of which exploded,—and was engaged about it until about half an hour before the explosion, when he left, and went up town for some fittings, and did not return until after the explosion. The testimony of Richards and Dempsey, the engineers, was not clear as to which called the plaintiff to do the work, but it is clear that Richards saw him and Richmond doing the work, and did not object; while the plaintiff testified that it was Richards who called them to do the work. Richards, therefore, had the same power to control the men in Hendrick's absence that Hendrick had when he was present.

The remaining instructions requested by defendant are fully covered by the general discussion, and were properly refused, and the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

Per Curiam: For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PETITION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the discharge of petitioner from custody to which he had been committed for selling wearing apparel without a license in violation of the provisions of the charter of the City of Chico. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. D. E. Alexander and Isaac Joseph, for petitioner:

The amount charged against the business pursued by the prisoner is so great in comparison to the amounts of license charged against other merchants, that it is apparent that such rate of license was established for the purpose of prohibiting the prisoner and others similarly situated from doing business in the city of Chico, which is contrary to the general laws, in this:

(1) It is oppressive; (2) it is unreasonable; (3) it contravenes common right; (4) it restrains trade; (5) it is partial; and (6) it is against public policy.

The board of trustees have a right to levy a license for a revenue, but the grant of authority to impose fees for the purpose of revenues would not warrant their being made so heavy as to be prohibitory, thereby defeating the purpose.

The board of trustees, besides having the right to levy a license for a revenue, have the right also to levy a license for regulation, but in such case a much narrower construction is to be applied, and it must be such a fee only as will legitimately assist in the regulation. It should not exceed the necessary or probable expense of issuing the license.

The ordinance in question here discriminates against Haskell because he does not reside in Chico, because he does not sell to the trade, and also because he has no fixed place of business in said Chico, and is void.

The ordinance is not reasonable either in its provisions or its penalties. It does not harmonize with the general laws of the country or of this state, the Federal or state Constitutions, or with the principle of the common law, and it is therefore void.

This ordinance also contravenes common right in this, that it prevents the citizens of this state from freely trading with the people of Chico upon the same terms as they trade among themselves, and for this reason it is contrary to public policy; and it is an elementary principle of law that ordinances of municipalities must not contravene the common right.

Mr. F. C. Lusk for respondent.

Van Fleet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Chico is a municipal corporation of the fifth class, having power, as such, to license, for purposes of regulation and revenue, all and every kind of business transacted or carried on in such city, and to fix rates of license tax upon the same, and provide for its collection. It has an ordinance which, among other provisions thereof relating to the revenue, has the following: "Persons, outside of those conducting regular places of business, selling different articles of apparel, dry goods, fancy goods, notions, jewelry, cutlery, groceries, harness, pianos, organs, machinery of all kinds, vehicles, hardware, tinware, mill products, or merchandise of any class or character, to persons not regularly engaged in or carrying on such lines of business, whether by sample or otherwise, shall pay a license of fifty dollars per quarter." Haskell, a traveling salesman for a shirt house in Oakland, was arrested and is held by the marshal of Chico upon a warrant issued from the recorder's court of said city, upon a complaint which charges Haskell with a misdemeanor, in vending within said city wearing apparel—to wit, shirts—by sample, without a license therefor, in violation of the provision of said ordinance above quoted. The petitioner asks that Haskel be discharged on habeas corpus, upon the ground that the ordinance is void and of no effect, for various alleged reasons, and so furnishes no competent authority for his detention.

It is urged, in effect, that the particular provision in question is unreasonable and oppressive, and that it is unequal and unlawfully discriminating. But we are unable to regard it as open to either or any of these objections. A municipal ordinance must be very clearly obnoxious to such objections as those made, or some one of them, before it will be declared invalid by the courts. Every intendment is to be indulged in favor of its validity, and all doubts resolved in a way to uphold the law-making power, and a contrary conclusion will never be reached upon light consideration. It is the province and right of the municipality to regulate its local affairs,—within the law, of course,—and it is the duty of the courts to uphold such regulations, except it manifestly appear that the ordinance or by-law transcends the power of the municipality, and contravenes rights secured to the citizen by the Constitution, or laws made in pursuance thereof. That the ordinance in question violates any such right, we are unable to perceive.

It is said that the provision is unreasonable and oppressive because the license charged against the business pursued by Haskell is so disproportionately great, in comparison with the rates charged against other classes of merchants, as to make it apparent that the amount was fixed with a view and purpose of prohibiting Haskell, and others pursuing the same calling, from doing business in the said city,—a result which is in restraint of trade, and against public policy. This contention is based upon the fact that elsewhere in the same article the ordinance provides for licensing those engaged in trade within said city "who at a fixed place of business sell any goods, wares, or merchandise," etc., of the same general character, and divides such into classes according to the amount of their monthly sales, and fixes rates of license based upon such classification somewhat less, perhaps, in proportion than the license tax charged against the business as carried on by Haskell. But we cannot say that the ordinance is either oppressive or unreasonable by reason of this difference. The very power to license for purposes of regulation and revenue involves the right to made distinctions between different trades, and between essentially different methods of conducting the same general character of business or trade. And that is all that is done here. While it may be true, as suggested by petitioner, that Haskell is, in a sense, a merchant, equally with those having a fixed place of business, it is nevertheless true that the manner in which he conducts and carries on his business is so distinct from that of the merchant of the latter class as to make it essentially a different business. And we are not at liberty to say that this difference does not constitute a just ground for the discrimination which the ordinance makes between the two. The tax imposed is not, upon its face, necessarily unreasonable; and to say that it is so simply because the legislative body of the city has seen fit to impose a heavier license upon the business when so conducted, than where carried on in a different way, is as suggested in Ex parte Hurl, 49 Cal. 558, "to argue that, because the common council, in fixing the rates for licenses, have discriminated between the several business pursuits which they were regulating, and have imposed a larger license tax upon one pursuit than upon any other, the ordinance is oppressive and unreasonable. But to argue thus is to forget that the authority of the common council to fix the rates of license is a branch of the taxing power,—which is, in itself, the power to discriminate as to the objects upon which burdens are to be imposed —but which, not being taxation, pure and simple, is as yet untouched by the constitutional requirement of uniformity." It may well be that, to the knowledge of the city council, the profits of such itinerant business, by reason of the fact that there are no rents, taxes, insurance, or other municipal charges to pay in its pursuit, are so much greater, proportionately, over the some amount of business done at a fixed place, as to fully justify the difference in the tax imposed. Indeed, the right to make such discriminating distinctions, based upon like grounds, is amply sustained by authority and in many cases involving a much greater disparity between the rates charged than is exhibited here.

In Warren v. Geer, 117 Pa. 211, where the town passed an ordinance requiring every person canvassing from house to house, soliciting orders for books, pictures, gentlemen's shirts, etc., to take out a license, and the license for selling shirts was $3 a day, it was held that this ordinance was not unreasonable, nor in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or that of Pennsylvania, the court saying: "The effect of the ordinance would seem to be to subject persons who would otherwise pay no license for the privilege of doing business within the borough, to the duty of paying something for the privilege, when they undertake to exercise it without incurring the expense as a mercantile license. There is surely nothing unreasonable in such a requirement." In Cherokee v. Fox, 34 Kan. 16, it was held that an ordinance requiring itinerant hawkers, peddlers, etc., to pay a license fee of $2.50 per day is neither class legislation or unjust discrimination, nor partial or oppressive, nor inconsistent with public policy, as being in restraint of trade. The same principle is involved in Ex parte Heylman, 92 Cal. 492 (decided by this court), upholding a license passed by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco for peddling meats or fish from wagons or baskets, where the license charged was $75 a quarter for a meat peddler, and only $10 a quarter for peddlers of fish, vegetables, fruit, game, or poultry, and where the amount charged for vending meat by this method was a different and higher license from that charged for selling meat at a fixed place of business. In that case it is said: "The validity of such an ordinance is not now an open question here." See also Amador County v. Kennedy, 70 Cal. 460; Ex parte Felchlin, 96 Cal. 360.

Nor is the provision in question unlawfully discriminating. It may be conceded that if it could be said to discriminate in favor of residents of the city of Chico, by requiring such license only from nonresidents engaged in the line of business pursued by Haskell, it would be bad; or if it discriminated against residents of the state, or against merchandise from without, or not the product of the state, that it would be void, as being, in effect, a regulation of interstate commerce,—something entirely within the power of Congress. Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 484. But it does neither of these. In the contention that it does so discriminate against nonresidents of the municipality, counsel has evidently confused this provision with another in the same ordinance, relating to hawkers and peddlers, who carry their goods with them, which last may be, in its terms, open to such objection. But the latter provision is a wholly independent one, relating to a different class, and in no way affects the construction of the feature under consideration. The fact that one portion of an ordinance, or a portion of the same section, may be void for any reason which does not necessarily affect the whole, does not invalidate another part, unless the two are so interblended or dependent that the vice of the one must be held to vitiate the other. Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 211. The provision here involved is general in terms, and applies alike to all—residents and nonresidents equally— who do not maintain "regular places of business" in the city, and who sell to "persons not regularly engaged in carrying on such lines of business." It in no way discriminates, as to the class against which it is directed, between those living within the city and those without, but is broad enough to include all of such class, wherever residing. It does put into a class by themselves those who prosecute their business by the method therein specified, and discriminates in the amount of license as between such class and merchants having their business located in the municipality, and also as between such class and persons "selling to the trade," as is expressed, such as regular drummers and traveling salesmen for commercial houses, who go from place to place soliciting orders from merchants and traders. But such discrimination is lawful, and has been uniformly upheld, upon the principle that, although the different classes are engaged in the same general business of selling merchandise, it is in the several instances carried on under such different circumstances, and by methods so essentially dissimilar, and with such widely different facilities for profit as to furnish just and reasonable ground for such discrimination. See cases cited above, and also East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 46 Ill. 394; St. Louis v. Sternberg, 69 Mo. 301; Howe Mach. Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 679, 25 L. ed. 755. There is nothing in Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642, necessarily opposed to this view. In that case the attempted discrimination was made to depend, not upon the fact of any essential difference in the methods of carrying on the business, or the profits to be derived therefrom, but solely upon the question whether the merchandise, at the time of sale, was or was not within the corporate limits of the city, or in transit thereto. This was held to constitute no just or proper ground for the discriminating difference in amount of license imposed in the two instances, and as being, therefore, partial, unjust, and in restraint of trade.

Within the principles of Ex parte Miller, 89 Cal. 41, we discover no merit in the objection that the ordinance is void by reason of the penalty imposed, even if such objection can properly arise before conviction. See Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400. Nor is there anything in the further point that the ordinance is void because embracing more than one subject and that not expressed in its title. The provision of the Constitution as to the requirement, in that respect, of acts of the legislature, is not made applicable in terms to municipal ordinances, and was evidently not intended so to apply. Its application would practically put an end to the practice of many cities and towns in the state, prevailing before, at the time, and since the adoption of that instrument, of codifying the ordinances of the municipality, as in this instance, into a compact and convenient form, in a single ordinance. A similar requirement of the Constitution of Missouri was held not to apply to city ordinances, in the absence of an express provision of the statute making it so. Tarkio v. Cook, 120 Mo. 1.

We discover nothing in the provision of the ordinance under consideration which renders it invalid under the objections made.

The writ is denied, and the prisoner remanded.

Nicolangelo POMPONIO, Admr., etc., of Germaio Pomponio,

v.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN, & HARTFORD RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(66 Conn. 528.)

1. The duty of using due care not to injure those rightfully on one's premises is the same whether they are there as licensees or upon invitation.

2. A railroad company making a flying switch at a crossing which it has kept planked many years, between shops of a corporation located on both sides of its road, for the use of workmen therein, when it knows that this constitutes practically the only entry to the shops on one side of the track and is used by the workmen in crowds at stated hours of the day, must exercise reasonable care towards them, whether they are to be regarded as licensees or as using the track by invitation.

(July 19, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kellogg & Kellogg, for appellants:

While an invitation, express or implied, imposes the duty of ordinary care upon a person in control of premises, a license, which is inferred where the object is the mere pleasure or benefit of the person enjoying it, imposes no such duty.

Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 51.

An invitation is inferred where there is a common interest or mutual advantage, while a license is inferred where the object is the mere pleasure or benefit of the person using it.

It must be found from the evidence that there was no invitation, either express or implied, according to the meaning which that word has in the eye of the law.

The deceased had no technical right to the crossing in question as against the railroad company. He was there simply with the permission and by the sufferance of the railroad company. But to require a greater degree of care or warning from the railroad company than that contended for by the defendant would be to require from it at this crossing, where the deceased had acquired no legal rights against the company, the same degree that it is bound to exercise at highway crossings which the public has exactly the same legal right to use as the railroad.

The crossing was practically a highway crossing at noon and the defendant recognized it as such by giving the highway signals on that occasion.

The only attempt on the part of the defendant's servants to warn the person struck or to prevent the accident was made by a brakeman on the top of the box car at its rear and was futile as should have been foreseen by the defendant's servants. This was clearly negligence.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 935, 936, and a large number of cases cited in the notes; Brown v. New York C. Railroad, 32 N. Y. 597, 88 Am. Dec. 353; Ferguson v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 63 Wis. 145; French v. Taunton Branch Railroad, 116 Mass. 537; Howard v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 32 Minn. 214; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. State, 61 Md. 108; Grethen v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 609.

Contributory negligence is a question of fact, and the trial court finds that the deceased did not, at the time of the accident, fail to make reasonable use of his senses, and did not by such failure or otherwise in any manner by his own negligence or want of care, contribute to his injury, thus announcing that the deceased was entirely free from it.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought to recover damages for injuries claimed to have been inflicted by the defendant upon the plaintiff's intestate, causing his death. The court below, upon the facts found, rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

The following is the substance of the finding: The intestate, Germaio Pomponio, was, when injured, working for Holmes, Booth, & Hayden, a corporation, in Waterbury. The shops of said corporation are located upon both sides of the defendant's railroad, and extend for a considerable distance parallel with it. Germaio was employed in that portion of the works lying easterly of the tracks, and on the 30th of May, 1892, a few minutes before 1 o'clock in the afternoon he was returning to his work, and in doing so was passing over the tracks of the defendant's railroad, at a crossing leading from one of the streets in Waterbury to one of the two regular entrances to the easterly portion of the works of his employer. On both sides of this crossing was a wooden gate, and a house for a gate tender, belonging to and maintained by Holmes, Booth, & Hayden. This crossing was regularly prepared for the purpose of access to said works, and was regularly used by 300 or 400 of the employees in going to and from their work, as well as by teams and others having business with said corporation. It was the rule of said corporation that these employees should go through the gate at the easterly terminus of this crossing, in going to and returning from their work. None others than said employees, and those having business with the corporation were permitted to enter at said entrance without a pass obtained from the office. This crossing has been thus maintained and used for over thirty years, and said use has always been open, notorious, and well known to all the world and to the defendant. During all this period the defendant has kept this crossing planked and in condition for travel to said shops; and the planking for such purpose has generally been furnished by the defendant, but at times by said corporation. The layout of defendant's road, in 1848, antedated by a few years the erection of these shops, and the establishment of this crossing. It was well known to the defendant that a few minutes before the morning starting, at the noon closing, the 1 P. M., starting, and the evening closing hours, the employees of said works passed in or out in large numbers, over this crossing, while during the other hours of the day it was comparatively little used. South of the crossing were two side tracks, used principally for the storage of cars for the shops. Thirty-four feet north of the crossing was the south end of an iron truss bridge of the defendant over the Naugatuck river. It was 105½ feet long. Its main trusses were 24 inches wide. Its overhead supports were of iron of the various sizes usual in such a bridge, and it was not otherwise enclosed. The defendant was accustomed to switch over this crossing from its freight yard north of the bridge, in order to place its cars on the side tracks south of the crossing. In switching cars upon the more northerly of the two sidings, flying switches were customarily made. This switching could only be done during the intervals between the passing of regular trains, and one of these intervals was between 11:15 A. M. and 1:10 P. M. At the time Germaio was injured the defendant was making a flying switch over this crossing, in order to put a box car from the freight yard onto one of the two side tracks south of the crossing. Said car, having been got under headway, was, near the north end of the bridge, cut off from the engine, which then sped on, at about 12 or 15 miles an hour, until it passed the crossing, and the switch about 150 feet south of the crossing. Upon the engine were the engineer and fireman in the cab, the yard conductor on the forward footboard, and two brakemen on the rear footboard of the tender. Upon the box car, which followed some distance behind, and which was upon the bridge when the engine passed the crossing, was a single brakman, on top of the car at the rear, where the brake was. As the engine approached the crossing the whistle was blown and the bell rung, and Germaio and Loughlin, a fellow workman, observed its approach, and halted for it to pass at a distance of between 6 and 15 feet from the tracks. After it had passed, Loughlin looked up and down the track. He did not see the car coming, being prevented from doing so either by the bridge, or by escaping steam, smoke, or flying dust, or both combined, and proceeded on his way. Germaio advanced at the same time. As they were upon the planking between the tracks, the silently advancing car, going at the rate of from 6 to 8 miles an hour, struck both Loughlin and Germaio, causing the latter the injuries from which he died a few days later. It did not appear in evidence that anyone observed, or was in a position to observe, Germaio, to see whether or not he looked up the track before starting to cross, after the engine passed, and there was no direct evidence upon this point. As the engine passed the deceased, none of the men upon it gave any warning of the approaching car, or did anything to attract his attention to it. When the brakeman upon the box car saw that an accident was imminent, he shouted, but was not heard by the crossers, as the circumstances rendered it little probable that he would be, or that, if heard, the intended warning would be of any avail. He also began to apply the brake, but with no effect in diminishing the speed of the car until the accident occurred. When Germaio started across the tracks, after the engine passed him, the box car was somewhere on the bridge, and it was more or less concealed from his view by the bridge. From any point in the line of said crossing, between defendant's west rail and the gate house, the view to the northward was unobstructed, save by the bridge; and standing in said line, within a distance of 5 feet from said rail, one had a clear view through the bridge. Between 6 and 8 or 9 feet from said rail the trusses and supports of the bridge seriously interfered with the view of objects on the bridge, so that a box car upon it "would be largely obscured from sight." At no point, however, would such a car be wholly hidden from sight. The finding concludes thus: "I find from the evidence as follows: (a) That the deceased was upon the crossing at the time of the accident by the implied invitation of the defendant. (b) That the defendant failed to exercise due and reasonable care towards the deceased in the premises, and was negligent towards him, whereby he received his injuries. (c) That the defendant failed in its duty to the deceased, and did not exercise reasonable care for his safety, under the circumstances, although he was upon said crossing as a mere licensee only, and that the defendant was therefore guilty of negligence directly causing said injuries to the deceased. (d) That the deceased did not, at the time of the accident, fail to make reasonable use of his senses, and did not, by such failure, or otherwise, in any manner, by his own negligence or want of care, contribute to his injury."

Upon the trial below the defendant claimed that the deceased was upon the crossing as a mere licensee, that the defendant at the time owed to him no duty as such licensee, that the defendant was not guilty of negligence, that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence and that judgment should be rendered for nominal damages only. The court rendered judgment for substantial damages. The defendant claims that the court below, upon the facts found, erred in holding it guilty of negligence towards the decedent, and also in holding that the decedent was not guilty of contributory negligence.

We think the question involved in this last claim, as to the contributory negligence of the decedent, is disposed of by the finding as one of fact, and is not open to review upon this appeal. The general question whether the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence involves these two subordinate questions: First. What were the nature and extent of the duty to avoid injury resting upon the decedent under the circumstances? Second. Did he fully perform that duty? The first question is one of law, and is answered by saying that whether the decedent was upon the crossing as a trespasser or a licensee, or was there by implied invitation, it was his duty to use such measures to avoid danger and injury to himself as a man of ordinary prudence would have used under the same circumstances, and this was all the law required of him. The other question, whether his conduct in avoiding the dangers incident to his situation was that of a man of ordinary prudence, is clearly a question of fact, to be answered by the trior from the facts proved by the evidence. The conclusion of the trior upon this point, if he committed no error of law in reaching it, is final, and cannot be reviewed by this court upon this appeal. Farrell v. Waterbury Horse R. Co. 60 Conn. 239. Now, the claim of the defendant, that the court below erred in holding that the decedent was not guilty of contributory negligence may mean that the court erred with reference to this question of law, or this question of fact, or both. But the record does not disclose that the court erred with reference to either question. It nowhere appears that it took an erroneous view of the nature or extent of the decedent's duty, or that it held him to a duty less in any degree than the law imposed on him; and it nowhere appears that, in coming to the conclusion that he had fully performed his duty, the court below committed any error of law. Upon this part of the case, then, the record fails to show that the court below committed any error of law, and this disposes of the defendant's claim upon the question of contributory negligence.

The next question is whether the court erred in holding that the defendant was guilty of negligence towards the decedent. Upon this part of the case the questions relate principally to the nature and extent of the defendant's duty towards the decedent, rather than to its performance of that duty; and the extent of the duty, it is said, depends largely upon the relation which the parties sustained to each other at the time; that is, whether the decedent was upon the crossing as a licensee, or was there upon the implied invitation of the defendant; and these questions are, upon this record, properly questions of law.

The principle upon which the courts distinguish a case of implied license from one of implied invitation, in the technical sense, seems to be this: Speaking generally, where the privilege of user exists for the common interest or mutual advantage of both parties, it will be held to be a case of invitation; but if it exists for the mere pleasure and benefit of the party exercising the privilege, it will be held to be a case of license. Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 51; Campbell, Neg. §§ 43, 44. "It is sometimes difficult to determine whether the circumstances make a case of 'invitation,' in the technical sense of that word, as used in a large number of adjudged cases, or only a case of mere license." Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 102 U. S. 577, 584, 26 L. ed. 235, 237. The defendant contends that the decedent was upon the crossing as a mere licensee, and consequently that its duty towards him was a more limited one than if he had been there upon its implied invitation.

As a general statement, it is undoubtedly true that an owner in charge of land owes a more limited duty to a mere licensee than he does to a party invited, in the technical sense of that word. A licensee must take the premises as he finds them, and the owner is not, as to him, bound to use care and diligence to keep the premises safe, while he does owe such a duty to one using his premises upon invitation. "It has often been held that the owner of land or a building, who has it in charge, is bound to be careful and diligent in keeping it safe for those who come there by his invitation, express or implied, but that he owes no such duty to those who come there for their own convenience, or as mere licensees." Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 427. This distinction between the case of a licensee and that of a party invited, in respect to the duty of keeping the premises safe for their use, is recognized in the following cases, and in many others: Nicholson v. Erie R. Co. 41 N. Y. 526, 532; Barry v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 92 N. Y. 289, 44 Am. Rep. 377; Byrne v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 512; Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Gordon v. Cummings, 152 Mass. 513, 9 L. R. A. 640. But, while this is so, it is also true that the landowner must not himself, by what has been called "his own active negligence," injure either the licensee, or the party invited, while they are upon his land. This is a duty due to both equally. Towards both, in this respect, he is bound to exercise the same amount of care. Both are upon his premises, not as wrongdoers, but by his permission; and, in respect to the duty in question, we know of no good reason why the nature and extent of it should not be the same in cases of license as in cases of invitation.

In a Massachusetts case it appeared that the plaintiff, being sent by his mother upon an errand, passed through a passageway upon the defendant's premises, over a portion of which way a roof had been constructed, and that it was the defendants' habit to supply ale to their workmen, who were accustomed to throw the empty ale kegs out of a window, down upon this roof, from which, from time to time, the kegs were taken away. Just as the plaintiff, in going through the passageway, emerged from under this roof, one of the workmen threw a keg so carelessly that it fell off the roof and injured the plaintiff. It was held that the defendants were liable, and that it made no difference whether the way was public, and thus the plaintiff was traveling upon it as a matter of right, or whether it was private, and he was traveling upon it merely by permission. The court said: "Even if he were there under a permission which they might at any time revoke, and under circumstances which did not make them responsible for any defect in the existing condition of the way, they were still liable for any negligent act of themselves or their servants which increased the danger of passing and in fact injured him." Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery, 98 Mass. 577, 96 Am. Dec. 685. In another Massachusetts case the court says: "The licensor has, however, no right to create a new danger while the license continues. Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 502, 3 Am. Rep. 485; Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery, supra; Corby v. Hill, 4 C. B. N. S. 556. So a railroad company which allows the public habitually to use a private crossing of its tracks cannot use active force against a person or vehicle crossing under a license, express or implied." Stevens v. Nichols, 155 Mass. 472, 475, 15 L. R. A. 459.

In a New York case the court said: "There can be no doubt that the acquiescence of the defendant for so long a time, in the crossing of the tracks by pedestrians, amounted to a license and permission, by the defendant, to all persons to cross the tracks at this point. These circumstances imposed a duty upon the defendant, in respect of persons using the crossing, to exercise reasonable care in the movement of its trains. The company had a lawful right to use the tracks for its business, and could have withdrawn its permission to the public to use its premises as a public way, assuming that no public right therein existed; but so long as it permitted the public use, it was chargeable with knowledge of the danger to human life from operating its trains at that point, and was bound to such reasonable precaution in their management as ordinary prudence dictated to protect wayfarers from injury. . . . The ground of liability in this case is negligence and the duty of the defendant to exercise reasonable care existed irrespective of the fact whether the plaintiff's intestate had a fixed legal right to cross the track, or was there simply by the defendant's implied permission." Barry v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 92 N. Y. 289, 293, 44 Am. Rep. 377.

In this view of the matter, we think it makes no difference whether we hold the case at bar to be one of license or invitation; for the duty which the defendant is here charged with violating is not the duty to keep its premises safe for use, but the duty of using due care not to injure by its own act those rightfully on its premises, and that duty is the same whether those persons are on the premises as licensees, or upon invitation, in the technical sense of that word.

Furthermore, upon the somewhat peculiar and exceptional state of facts disclosed by the record, we think this is a case of invitation, as that word is used in many of the cases, as pointed out in Plummer v. Dill, 156 Mass. 426, 430. In that case the court says: "There is a class of cases to which Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. supra, and Holmes v. Drew, 151 Mass. 578, belong, which stand on a ground peculiar to themselves. They are where the defendant by his conduct has induced the public to use a way in the belief that it is a street or public way which all have a right to use, and where they suppose they will be safe. The inducement or implied invitation, in these cases, is not to come to a place of business fitted up by the defendant for traffic, to which those only are invited who will come to do business with the occupant, nor is it to come by permission, or favor, or license, but it is to come as one of the public and enjoy a public right, in the enjoyment of which one may be expected to be protected. The liability in such a case should be coextensive with the inducement or implied invitation." We think the case at bar, quoad these work people using this crossing at the stated hours, is a case of invitation, rather than of license, within the principle laid down in the above case of Plummer v. Dill, and the cases therein referred to, and in other cases which might be cited. See also our own case of Crogan v. Schiele, 53 Conn. 186, 207, 55 Am. Rep. 88. But after all, whether the decedent is to be regarded as a licensee, or as one invited to use the crossing, is of no practical importance in this case. He was certainly either the one or the other, and the defendant's duty towards him, so far as the present complaint is concerned, was the same in either case; and, upon the facts found, we think the court below was justified in holding that the defendant failed to perform that duty. As before intimated, the facts in this case are somewhat peculiar and exceptional. For more than thirty years the defendant has kept this crossing planked, and in condition for the use of these 300 or 400 work people, and for the teams of their employer. It was specially prepared and adapted for this purpose, and, practically speaking, the employees were compelled to use it in coming to and going from their work. It was used during every working day by 300 or 400 people. It adjoined a public street, and it was the principal, and practically the only, entry to the shops east of the tracks. It was used by these people, in crowds at a time, at certain stated hours of the day. And all of this was well known to the defendant and its servants. The decedent was one of these workmen, and when he was injured he was using the crossing in returning to his work at one of the stated times when it was customary for the employees to use the crossing for such purpose. The defendant was engaged in making what is known as a "flying switch,"—a dangerous operation anywhere, but more especially over a crossing, public or private; and it selected an hour to do this when it might reasonably be anticipated that it would result in injury to some of these people, unless care proportionate to the danger was taken to avoid such a result. Under these circumstances, the defendant was clearly charged with the duty to use reasonable care towards those using this crossing, whether they used it under a license or under an implied invitation; a care proportionate to the danger to be reasonably anticipated from the act done, and reasonably adequate, under the circumstances, to prevent injury from that act to those who at that time would probably be rightfully using the crossing. Taylor v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 113 Pa. 162, 57 Am. Rep. 446; Barry v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra; Byrne v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 104 N. Y. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 512. Whether the defendant at this time used such care was, in this case, as it ordinarily must be, a question to be determined by the trior as one of fact. The trior decided it against the defendant and the record does not disclose that in deciding it any error of law was committed, either with respect to the relation which these parties sustained towards each other, or as to the duties which they owed to each other, or as to any other matter.

There is no error.

William A. BEERS and Wife, Appts.,
v.
BOSTON & ALBANY RAILROAD COMPANY.

(67 Conn. 417.)

A railroad company receiving from another carrier and transporting trunks under the mistaken supposition, induced by checks on the trunks, that they belong to passengers who have bought tickets over its road when in fact the owners of the trunks traveled by another route but supposed their trunks were rightly checked, is not liable, on the ground of mere negligence, for the loss of the trunks by the fall of a railroad bridge.

(March 26, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the value of trunks and their contents which were delivered to defendant for transportation and lost by it. Affirmed.

Plaintiffs were at Saratoga, intending to go to New Haven. Defendant had a contract with the Delaware & Hudson River Railroad Company and the New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad Company for through transportation over the three lines from Saratoga to New Haven. Plaintiffs purchased tickets at Saratoga which entitled them to go by the Delaware & Hudson River Railroad Company's trains to Albany, thence by boat to New York, thence by the New York, New Haven, & Hartford Railroad to New Haven, and they applied for checks for their baggage and received checks marked New Haven and Saratoga via B. &. A and N. Y., N H. & H. The trunks went forward according to directions on the checks on the Boston & Albany Railroad instead of by the boat. During the journey a bridge which formed a part of defendant's track gave way, resulting in the wreckage of the train and loss of the baggage. Plaintiffs claimed that they were informed by the person who gave them the checks for the baggage that their tickets gave them the right to have the trunks go by rail over defendant's road, and that they caused the trunks to be checked in that way, relying upon such statement, under the belief that he had authority to make it from the fact that he had possession of the checks.

The circumstances attending the delivery of the checks, the receipt of the trunks, the forwarding of merchandise and trunks over their own and connecting lines of railroads, the interchange of car and railroad facilities, the adjustment of balances growing out of railroad transportation, all point to the question of agency and contractual relations between the corporations, and the public who have dealings with them.

These questions justify the court in reversing the judgment of the court below and remanding the case for trial.

Baldwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the defendant came under any obligation to make good the plaintiffs' loss, it must have been either by virtue of some contract between them, or of actionable negligence. No such contract is alleged, unless one can be implied from the reception by the defendant at Albany of their luggage, so checked as to indicate that it was to be transported over its railroad to Springfield. It is not averred that the person from whom they obtained the checks was an agent of the defendant, or had any authority to act or speak in its behalf, nor even that he was an agent of the Delaware & Hudson Canal Company, with which the defendant was in contract relations. His statements, therefore, and the plaintiffs' reliance upon them, are of no importance, except as evincing their good faith in the transaction. On the other hand, the effect of the reply was to admit that the defendant received the luggage under the mistaken supposition that it belonged to passengers who had bought tickets over its road, and so that its transportation on its railroad had been duly paid for. Had trunks marked as destined to Springfield been received by the defendant without any particular contract or understanding in regard to their transportation, it would have assumed, simply from its position as a common carrier, an obligation to transport them safely, and have had a right to a proper compensation when the service was performed. But an express contract existed between it and the Delaware & Hudson Canal Company, under which it was bound to receive the personal luggage of passengers who held tickets entitling them to pass over both roads between Saratoga and Springfield, and the defendant was led by the checks to suppose that the trunks of the plaintiffs were luggage of that character. It did not, therefore, receive them under such circumstances as to create such an implied contract with their owners. An implied contract between two parties is only raised when the facts are such that an intent may fairly be inferred on their part to make such a contract Such an intent may be implied, although it be certain that it never actually existed, but not unless the parties are in such relations that each ought to have had it. In the case at bar the facts not only do not justify, but absolutely exclude, such an implication. The plaintiffs did not intend to pay the defendant for the transportation of the trunks. They supposed that they had already paid for this, in purchasing tickets to New Haven by way of the Hudson river. The defendant did not intend to make any charge for their transportation. It supposed that compensation for this had been made already, under, and as an incident of, an express contract, made in its behalf by the Delaware & Hudson Canal Company, for the transportation of the owners, as passengers, over its railroad. The plaintiffs and the defendant were alike misled by appearances. It is one of those cases where a loss must be sustained by one or the other of two parties who are equally innocent of wrong, but one of whom placed it in the power of a third person to do the act which caused the injury. The plaintiffs acted in good faith in accepting the checks in question from some one in Saratoga, and causing them to be placed on their trunks; but it was this that induced the Delaware & Hudson Canal Company to deliver the luggage to the defendant at Albany, and the defendant to receive it as belonging to those whose right it was to have it transported over its line to Springfield. The plaintiffs could not in this way force the defendant into a contract relation which it certainly would never have intentionally assumed.

The defendant, having taken the plaintiffs' property into his possession for transportation over a railroad which it operated as a common carrier, was not free from all responsibility for its safe-keeping, notwithstanding it accepted its custody without any contract, express or implied. It is admitted by the pleadings that not only did the defendant run the train, in which the property was, upon a bridge which was, and long had been, so defective that it could not sustain such a burden, but also that no one was stationed there to give any warning of the danger, or signal the train to stop, and that the luggage was destroyed by reason of its gross negligence in these respects, but "without any wilfulness, malice, or intentional wrong, or anything equivalent or amounting thereto." The defendant did not receive the trunks in the capacity of a common carrier of goods for hire. They were delivered to it, and accepted by it, in the capacity of a common carrier of passengers for hire. In fact, there were no passengers to be carried, to whom they belonged; but this, whether then known or unknown to the defendant, would be no excuse for any wilful or intentional injury to property actually in its possession. We think, however, that it was a sufficient excuse for the negligence which it confessed. Actionable negligence is the neglect of a duty. What duty did the defendant owe to the plaintiffs? Simply that of abstaining from anything amounting to wilful or wanton injury to their property in its possession. Gardner v. New Haven & N. Co. 51 Conn. 143, 150, 50 Am. Rep. 12. That cannot be deemed a wanton exposure of it to destruction which consisted only in running a train of cars upon an unsafe bridge, by which its own property, as well as theirs, was involved in a common loss. "Negligence signifies a want of care in the performance of an act, by one having no positive intention to injure the person complaining of it." Pitkin v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 64 Conn. 482, 490. It is true that this definition might not exclude the liability, in some instances, of a principal, on the ground of negligence, for damage consequent upon a direct act of violence or trespass on the part of servants, but this is not a case of that description. The gross negligence with which the defendant was chargeable consisted wholly of omissions. There was no wilful wrong, nor yet such reckless misconduct as can be deemed its equivalent. Had the defendant voluntarily assumed the position of a "depositary" (taking this term in its strict meaning of a bailee without reward), it would not have been bound under the rules of the Roman law (which have become a part of the common law) to treat the plaintiffs' property with any more care than it gave to its own. Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Ld. Raym. 909; Dig. 16, 3. Depositi vel Contra. Good faith would have been the measure of its obligations. Dig. 16, 3, 20. He who intrusts his property to a careless man, if loss ensues, must lay it to the account of his own imprudence in putting it into such hands. Inst. 3, 15, "Quibus Modis Re Contrahitur Obligatio," 3. But in the case before us the elements of a bailment are wanting, for there was no contract, express or implied, between the parties. 2 Kent, Com. *780. The defendant's obligations, not being contractual, were less than those attaching to bailees of any class. No man can have the care of another's property thrust upon him, without his invitation or consent, in such a way as to raise a duty calling for the performance of positive acts of protection. He might be bound to refrain from acts of direct injury. This is a mere negation of wrongdoing. A man acts at his peril; but he is never liable for omissions, except in consequence of some duty voluntarily undertaken. Holmes, Com. Law, 82. Had the defendant wilfully thrown the plaintiffs' trunks from the bridge into the stream below, a liability would have been incurred; but this would have been an act of violence, not an absence of care. Gross negligence is not actionable where not even slight care was due. Dunlap v. International S. B. Co. 98 Mass. 371, 379. However blameworthy, it is still essentially different from international wrongdoing. Magna negligentia culpa est, magna culpa dolus est. Dig. 50, 16. De Verborum Significatione, 226. Had the checks indicated that the trunks were to be sent over the river route, their reception by the defendant for carriage over its route would have presented a very different question. Fairfax v. New York, C. & H. R. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 167, 170, 29 Am. Rep. 119.

The ruling on the demurrer, with which the pleadings under the original complaint were closed, was in conformity to the views which we have expressed. It is therefore unnecessary to inquire whether, had there been error, it would not have been waived by filing a substituted complaint.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

v.
LEHIGH VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY et al., Appts.

(66 Conn. 512.)

A railroad company is liable to a passenger on its train for negligence of the servants of another railroad company over whose track such train is running under a contract between the companies whereby the train is to be run subject to the orders and signals given by servants of the owner of the track, since they become thereby the servants of the owner of the train for the purpose of its management.

(Baldwin and Torrance, JJ., dissent.)

(July 19, 1895.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been received by plaintiff while a passenger on defendant's road. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. George D. Watrous and Edward D. Buckland, for appellants:

A carrier of passengers is held to a high degree of care and is liable for a failure to exercise such a high degree of care.

2 Wood, Railroads, § 296.

From the nature of the accident the burden of proving negligence is upon the plaintiff.

2 Wood, Railroads, § 325*a*; Curtis v. Rochester & S. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 534, 75 Am. Dec. 258.

The plaintiff has not shown that the Lehigh Company was negligent and the Lehigh Company has shown that it used due care.

The court erred in instructing the jury that the persons operating the Central train were the servants of the Lehigh Company so as to make it liable for their acts in threatening a collision.

Wright v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 8 Exch. 137; Sprague v. Smith, 29 Vt. 426, 70 Am. Dec. 424.

The plaintiff knew before entering upon the defendant's train that this train was to be carried over other roads where the defendants had no exclusive control. He must then look to the company having the control of those by whose negligence he was injured.

2 Wood, Railroads, § 324, and note; 2 Redf. Railways, § 189, and note; 2 Harris, Damages by Corp. § 844.

The doctrine that the Central Company and its servants were the servants of the Lehigh Valley Company is most startling.

Cooley, Torts, 623.

The court erred in striking out the testimony of John H. Robinson as to declarations made by the persons on the Central engine at the time of the approach of the engine and the threatened collision.

Pinney v. Jones, 64 Conn. 549; Reynolds, Ev. § 7; Enos v. Tuttle, 3 Conn. 250; 1 Greenl. Ev. 145, and note b; Hanover R. Co. v. Coyle, 55 Pa. 396.

The court erred in excluding the testimony as to the declarations of Mr. Freck, train master of the Central Company.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 180; Bradner, Rules of Ev. 103, 109.

If true that the train was late it has no tendency to establish negligence, and a verdict based on that evidence only would be preposterous.

Button v. Frink, 51 Conn. 342, 50 Am. Rep. 24; O'Brien v. Miller, 60 Conn. 214.

Mr. Tilton E. Doolittle for appellee.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling question presented by the appeal in this case arises on the charge of the court to the jury. That being disposed of, the other assignments of error become unimportant. And in the charge that question is narrowed to this: Was the court correct in saying to the jury that the servants of the Central Railroad Company, while operating its trains on that portion of its track used in common by that company and this defendant, might, for the purposes of this case, be regarded as the servants of this defendant? A recurrence to the duties which the law imposes on every railroad company as a carrier of passengers will serve to make the answer to this question more distinct.

A railroad corporation, by the contract for a passage over its road, assumes the obligation to exercise the highest practicable degree of human skill to carry the passenger in safety, and undertakes absolutely to protect him against any injury or wilful misconduct of its servants in the performance of its contract; and the obligation in these respects continues until the contract is fully performed. Dwinelle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 117, 8 L. R. A. 224. Every carrier of passengers for hire —although not, like a common carrier of goods, an insurer against everything but the act of God and the public enemies—is bound to use the utmost care which is consistent with the nature of the business to guard the passenger against all dangers, from whatever source arising, which may reasonably and naturally be expected to occur, in view of all the circumstances, and of the number and character of the persons with whom the passenger will be brought in contact. The carrier must provide safe, sufficient, and suitable vehicles for transportation, and must provide such servants for the management of the same, and make all such reasonable arrangements therefor, as the highest care of a prudent man would suggest as necessary to a safe passage. Hall v. Connecticut River S. B. Co. 13 Conn. 319; Fuller v. Naugatuck R. Co. 21 Conn. 557; Flint v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. 34 Conn. 554; Simmons v. New Bedford, V. & N. S. B. Co. 97 Mass. 361, 93 Am. This duty is imposed by law; and this measure for its performance rests upon a railroad corporation to its full extent. A railroad corporation is a carrier of passengers by virtue of the franchise granted to it by its charter, a franchise intended to be used for the public good. By asking for and receiving the franchise, the corporation comes under the obligation to answer in damages to every one who may be injured by any negligence in the use of the privilege it has so received. And public policy will not permit the corporation to relieve itself from this obligation by any contract with others. A railroad company entering into contract relations with another company, by which the safety of its own passengers may be affected, is held to have made the other company in this respect its own agent. It is held to the exercise of due care for the safety of all persons, while exercising its franchise, whether on its own road or that of another company. This duty was imposed by law when it received its charter, and this duty holds good at all times and in all places. If the company operates its trains over the road of another company, it must see and know that the track is in good and safe condition, and that the trains of the other company are so ordered as not to interfere with the full discharge of its own duty to its own passengers, because such trains would be a danger against which it would be bound to provide. If a railroad company permits another company to run its trains upon its track, it is liable for any want of care of its lessee, and may be sued therefor, the same as though the trains were its own. If a railroad company leases its entire road and all its rolling stock to another company, it remains liable for all the laches and neglect of its lessee (except in cases where the lease is approved by the legislature), as fully as if it was itself operating its road; on the theory that the lessee, whether a lessee of a part or of the whole is the agent of the lessor. Driscoll v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 65 Conn. 230; Lakin v. Willamette Valley & C. R. Co. 13 Or. 436, 57 Am. Rep. 25; Virginia Midland R. Co. v. Washington, 86 Va. 629, 7 L. R. A. 344; Whitney v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 44 Me. 362, 69 Am. Dec. 103; Stearns v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 46 Me. 95, 116; Wyman v. Penobscot & K. R. Co. Id. 162; Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. Railroad, 80 Me. 62; Nelson v. Vermont & C. R. Co. 26 Vt. 717, 721, 62 Am. Dec. 614; Clement v. Canfield, 28 Vt. 302; McElroy v. Nashua & L. R. Corp. 4 Cush. 400, 50 Am. Dec. 794; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Barron, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 90, 104, 18 L. ed. 591, 594. And on the other hand, if one railroad company runs its trains over a portion of the road of another company, pursuant to a contract whereby it is agreed that its trains, while on such leased road, shall be under the control and direction of the servants of the lessor company, then the servants of the lessor company at such place, and for the time being, are the servants of the lessee company, and it will be liable for any injury to a passenger caused by the negligent act of such servant, as though he was its own employee.

NOTE.—The above decision as to the liability of a railroad company to a passenger for defects in the track of another company over which its train was running is one for which there are but few direct precedents, but a similar decision is found in Littlejohn v. Fitchburg R. Co. (Mass.) 2 L. R. A. 502.

The case of Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Peyton, 106 Ill. 534, 540, 46 Am. Rep. 705, is an application of this rule. That was a case almost exactly like the one now before us. That case was an appeal. In the lower court the appellee had recovered judgment. It was shown that the appellant, by a lease of a portion of the road of the Chicago & Western Indiana Railroad Company, was permitted to run its trains over a portion of the track of the latter company near to a station, to and from which its trains ran and departed. By the terms of the lease, the lessor company had the control of the passenger train of the appellant while on that portion of track, and its servants directed and controlled the trains of the appellant in coming to and going from that station. The appellee was injured while a passenger on a train of the appellant, by the negligence of the yard master of the lessor company. The court said: "The controlling question of the case . . . is whether the appellant is freed from liability by placing, by the lease or agreement, its employees and trains, at the place where the injury occurred, under the control of the road master of the other road. Appellant did so as a matter of interest or choice, and not from overpowering necessity. When the charter was granted the corporation became a carrier of persons and property, and the law imposed the duty of common carrier, with all the liabilities incident to the occupation, and the responsibility was assumed by the corporation, and imposed on it by law. Nor can the corporation exonerate itself from the duty and responsibility by contract with others, nor in any wise escape or free itself from the liability, unless released by the general assembly. Appellant voluntarily placed its engine and cars, at that place, under the control and direction of the employees of the other road, and for the time being, and for that purpose, the road-master of the other road became the servant of appellant. The engine and train belonged to appellant; the engine driver, the fireman, the conductor and brakeman on board of the train were its servants, under its control; and the yardmaster, under the agreement, pro hac vice, for the time and place, was its servant. Had the agreement not been made he would not have controlled the starting of the train. Appellant, by the agreement, authorized him to act as its yardmaster, and to act for it at that time and place, and it must be held responsible for his acts. The company cannot escape by saying he was employed and controlled by the other road. He was, as we have seen, the servant of appellant, to the full extent he acted, in this case." Oil Creek & A. R. R. Co. v. Keighron, 74 Pa. 316; Vary v. Burlington, C. R. & M. R. Co. 42 Iowa, 246; Laugher v. Pointer, 5 Barn. & C. 547, 559; Eaton v. Boston & L. R. Co. 11 Allen, 500; Abbott v. Johnstown, G. & K. Horse R. Co. 80 N. Y. 27, 36 Am. Rep. 572; St. Louis, W. & W. R. Co. v. Curl, 28 Kan. 622; Balsley v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. 119 Ill. 68, 59 Am. Rep. 784; Eureka Springs R. Co. v. Timmons, 51 Ark. 459.

The plaintiff was a passenger on the railroad of the defendant from Allentown to Jersey City. He was entitled to be carried in safety, and it was the duty of the defendant to so carry him the entire journey, whether it carried him over a track owned by itself or over a track hired of another. If the defendant, for its own convenience, chose to carry him a part of the journey over a hired track, it was its duty to make the track hired as safe as the track owned. If, by reason of being carried on a hired track, the plaintiff was exposed to a danger from which he would have been free had the track been owned by the defendant, and suffered injury therefrom, then for such injury the defendant is liable to him. Pierce, Railroads, 283. The case shows that, in the use of the portion of track owned by the Central Railroad Company, this defendant was bound by its agreement with that company to obey the orders and signals given by the servants of that company. The case shows, then, that to the extent of that agreement, and for the purposes included in it, this defendant had, by the terms of that agreement, made the servants of that company its own servants, and as the case further shows that the train on which the plaintiff was a passenger was upon this portion of track, and was being operated in obedience to the orders of those persons who, by the agreement, were the servants of this defendant, we think the charge was fully justified.

The verdict having established that the danger of collision to which the train of the defendant was exposed was caused by the negligence of the defendant's own servants, the several rulings in respect to the admission of testimony became immaterial. This fact being settled, it matters not whether the men on the trains were friendly or unfriendly to one another, nor whether the train of the defendant was behind time, or the train of the Central Company ahead of time, nor what any person on the rear train may have said, or omitted to say.

The motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence must be denied. In considering the evidence, the jury was bound to accept the charge of the court as correct; and, in the light of the charge, there was abundant evidence to support the verdict. Indeed, the jury could not well have reached a different result. There is no error.

A new trial is denied.

Baldwin, J., dissenting:

If the apparent danger of collision, which induced the plaintiff to jump from the car, was due to the negligence of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, or its servants, there was a good cause of action against it; but there was none, in my opinion, if the accident was due to the wilful act of a servant of the Central Railroad Company, outside of the scope of his employment. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Company claimed, upon the trial, that it was due to such a wilful act, on the part of those in control of the locomotive of the Central Railroad Company. In support of this claim, it offered testimony from its division superintendent that, on the day in question, there was a strike on its road, and its trains were being operated by nonunion men, while the Central Railroad trains were being run by union men; that there was ill feeling on the part of these union men towards the nonunion men; that, in consequence thereof, the accident occurred which resulted in the damage to the plaintiff for which the suit was brought; and that a certain remark was heard by John M. Robinson, the rear brakeman of the car on which the plaintiff was, from a person on the engine of the Central Railroad Company, "at the time of the approach and stopping of said engine, threatening a collision." The exclusion of all this testimony constitutes, in my opinion, sufficient ground for maintaining the appeal.

The finding shows that the plaintiff's evidence tended to prove that a train of the Central Railroad, upon a dark and foggy night, was pushed up within 10 or 15 feet of the car in which he was riding, and was apparently about to crash into it, when he jumped off to save his life. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, in explanation of this dangerously near approach to its train of the train behind it, offered to show that it occurred in consequence of unfriendly feeling on the part of those controlling the Central Railroad train towards those controlling the train ahead of it. Such a consequence, from such a cause, could only have been occasioned by a wilful and wrongful abuse of the power intrusted by the Central Railroad Company to its servants for managing the course and speed of the train in question. If the union men on the Central Railroad engine were apparently intending to use it as a catapult, or were threatening to do so, in order to intimidate the nonunion men in charge of the Lehigh Valley Railroad train, it was a malicious tort, so far outside the scope of their employment as to exonerate even their own employer from any liability for such damage as might be occasioned. Crocker v. New London, W. & P. R. Co. 24 Conn. 249, 265. It would be "an act of positive and designed injury not done with a view to the master's service, or for the purpose of executing his orders." Pierce, Railroads, p. 279. "If the servant, under guise and cover of executing his master's orders, and executing the authority conferred upon him, wilfully and designedly, for the purpose of accomplishing his own independent, malicious, or wicked purpose, does an injury, then the master is not liable." Cohen v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 69 N. Y. 170, 174.

The trial court has found that "no testimony was offered to prove that any person in control of the Central Railroad train was, in fact, actuated in this affair by any feeling of hostility, or did any intentional act which sprung from that motive." The evidence, however, was at the same time certified up at length by the court, for our consideration upon the motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. In the evidence thus certified appears that of John M. Robinson, the rear brakeman of the car upon which the plaintiff was riding. He testified that a stop signal was given by the Lehigh Valley Railroad train, the customary answer to which was two whistles; that the engineer of the Central Railroad train did not give this answer, but continued right on, and, as he neared them, blew a long, shrill whistle; and that some one on the latter's engine, just as it finally slackened speed, a short distance behind the rear car of the train ahead, shouted to the witness, "You scab sons of bitches!" ("scab" being a word of reproach used by union men in referring to nonunion men). The court ruled that these words might have been a mere expression of vexation at finding the Lehigh Valley train on the track, and behind time, and struck out the testimony regarding it. The only reference to the particular nature of this testimony in the finding prepared for the purposes of the appeal is that which I have previously mentioned; and whether in that finding the words "threatening a collision" can be understood as characterizing the remark which was excluded is quite doubtful. It might with perhaps more propriety be read as referring to the engine, or the approach and stopping of the engine. Be this as it may, both parties have argued this exception as if the remark in question had been duly incorporated in the finding, and it would seem to me a sacrifice of substance to form to disregard it, in view of the passage which I have quoted from the finding, to the effect that no testimony was offered to prove any intentional act of malice on the part of the union men in charge of the Central Railroad train. The reason given by the trial court for ordering Robinson's testimony about this remark to be stricken out shows that that order was based on the opinion that, as the words used might have indicated mere vexation, they ought not to be allowed to go to the jury as evidence of hostility or hostile acts. In my judgment, this ruling proceeded upon a mistaken view of the law which, under the special circumstances of this case, may and should be taken into account by us in determining the true meaning and effect of the finding. Styles v. Tyler, 64 Conn. 432, 439. What this language, heard by Robinson, meant, what disposition it evinced, who said it, and what light it threw on the accompanying acts, were all questions, it seems to me, proper for the consideration of the jury. Ritchie v. Waller, 63 Conn. 155, 27 L. R. A. 161.

The act of running one train almost into another, which was ahead of it on the same track, in disregard of the customary signals, was one of an unusual nature. The circumstances attendant on the strike seem to offer a possible, if not a probable, explanation. Coupled with the insulting and indecent remark hurled after the receding train, they might well have led the jury to conclude that the threatened collision was in the nature of a wanton and malicious assault by servants of the Central Railroad Company, not in their master's service, nor in the execution of any authority which had been confided to them. An act of doubtful meaning can often be explained by the word that went with it, or the circumstances under which it was done. I think that the passage above quoted from the finding, to the effect that no evidence was offered of hostile acts, should be read as if it stated that none was offered unless the testimony of the division superintendent and the rear brakeman could be considered such; and, therefore, that a new trial should be granted for errors in the exclusion of that testimony.

I concur with the court in the opinion that, under the testimony admitted and instructions given, the verdict was not against the evidence in the cause. I dissent from the opinion so far as it holds that the verdict cures any errors in excluding testimony. The jury, upon the evidence before them, were called upon to consider no other question than that as to whether the conduct of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company or the acts of those in charge of the second train were negligent or not. They have found these acts to have been negligent; but, had they had the excluded evidence before them, they might have attributed to them a different character.

The jury were, in effect, told that, for the purposes of this case, they might consider the servants of the Central Railroad Company, in charge of the rear train, as the servants of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company. I think this was not a correct statement of the law, in view of the claim made by the latter company that the plaintiff's injury was due to the wilful and wrongful acts of servants of the other company, done wholly outside the scope of their duty; and, furthermore, that it would not have been had it been undisputed that the injury was due to the negligence of those in charge of the rear train. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Company was permitted, by contract, to run its trains over a part of the Central Railroad Company's road, subject to the rules and orders of the latter company; and this is all the record discloses as to the nature of that contract. Under such an arrangement, and, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, this part of the Central Railroad track should undoubtedly be considered, pro hac vice, the track of the Lehigh Valley Railroad; and the servants of the Central Railroad Company, of whose services the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company actually or necessarily made use, in running its trains over it, were, pro hac vice, the servants of the latter. But, in my opinion, those servants of the Central Railroad Company, of whose services the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company did not make use for this purpose, either actually or necessarily, were not in law, and as a matter of course, to be regarded as its servants. For example, the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company may be said to have necessarily made use of the track repairers of the Central Railroad Company to keep this part of the track in good order; and their negligence in this matter would be the negligence of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, because they are for that purpose, pro hac vice, its servants. So, too, for a similar reason, the man at the signal tower might properly be regarded as the servant of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, because it necessarily made use of his services in running its trains upon this portion of the track. It may be also true that in the management of all the necessary switches and signals and other things of a like nature, appurtenant to this common track, the servants of the Central Railroad Company who performed these duties were the servants of both companies, because they were engaged in doing things necessary to the running of the trains of both over the same roadbed. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Company might be held responsible for any injuries resulting from a failure to make due provision in the contract under which it made use of the track in question for the admission of trains upon it only at proper intervals, and under proper conditions for securing the safety of the passengers it might carry. But the servants of each company, who only managed the trains of each, and who performed no sort of service for the other, were not, I think, in law, the servants of that other, but remained throughout the servants only of the company whose trains they managed. In the present case, the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company had no occasion for, and made no use whatever of, the services of the men in charge of this rear train, and they had no connection of any sort with the running of its trains.

According to the principles laid down in the cases of Wright v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 8 Exch. 137, and in Sprague v. Smith, 29 Vt. 421, 426, 70 Am. Dec. 424, I think the court below should have instructed the jury substantially as requested, that, if the injury was wholly due to the negligence of those in charge of the rear train, the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company was not liable. I therefore dissent also from the opinion of the court as to the propriety of the charge to the jury.

JAMESVILLE & WASHINGTON RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(115 N. C. 602; 117 N. C. 565.)

1. The right to bring an action ex delicto does not of itself authorize the allowance of smart money.
2. A railroad company is not liable for punitive damages on account of its failure from inability to run a train on the return trip at the stipulated time merely because it sold a return ticket for that trip, when it had but two engines, one of which was in the shop for repairs and the other was not in good condition, and its roadbed and equipment had been used for a considerable time in a dilapidated condition, although the earnings of the road were all applied to its improvement.
3. The bad, dilapidated, and ruinous condition of a railroad, and the old, worn, and bad condition of its two engines, render the company liable for compensatory damages to a passenger whom it was unable to carry in accordance with its contract on a return trip because one of its engines had broken down while the other was in a shop for repairs, although the company was poor and struggling for existence and expending all its earnings and more on the road.

NOTE.—Liability to passenger for default or delay in running railroad train.

Some decisions upon the question of the liability of the owner of a vessel for default or delay in the performance of this contract, while not strictly within the scope of this note, tend to throw light on the state of the law, and are therefore inserted here.

In case of the sale of tickets from a certain port to another by a vessel at a certain time, if the vessel does not arrive at the initial port at the time designated the purchaser of tickets may demand a return of the money paid for them. Cobb v. Howard, 3 Blatchf. 524.

In case of the sale of a ticket direct from one port to another, the purchaser may recover the purchase money if the vessel makes a deviation to deliver cargo without his consent which delays him six days in his passage. De Colange v. The Chateau Margaux, 37 Fed. Rep. 157.

If after taking money for a voyage the carrier decides to change his course and puts his passengers on shore at a place not designated in the contract without accommodations and with no means of getting to their destination, the carrier will be liable for the damage. West v. The "Uncle Sam," McAll. 505.

The owner of a steamship line may be held liable for a detention even beyond his own route, if he has contracted to carry the passenger through to his destination. Quimby v. Vanderbilt, 17 N. Y. 306, 72 Am. Dec. 469.

If a carrier breaks his contract by refusing to carry the passenger further the latter may recover back the money paid and his expenses while at the point to which he was carried and in returning to his home. Williams v. Vanderbilt, 28 N. Y. 217, 84 Am. Dec. 333; Ward v. Vanderbilt, 34 How. Pr. 144, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 521.

A person contracting for the transportation of passengers is liable for damages arising from unreasonable delay along the route occasioned by the fault or negligence of those legitimately engaged in the line of transportation. Van Buskirk v. Roberts, 31 N. Y. 661, Overruling Bonesteel v. Vanderbilt, 21 Barb. 26.

In case a vessel is advertised to sail on a particular date and money is paid for passage upon it, if it does not do so the intending passenger may embark on another vessel and recover back the deposit money. Cranston v. Marshall, 5 Exch. 395.

If after a passenger has paid a portion of the passage money the vessel sails without him, prior to the appointed date, the vessel will be liable for the amount so paid, the loss of time in procuring other passage, and the cost of passage upon the other vessel. The Zenobia, Abb. Adm. 80.

Duty of railroads as to punctuality.

Most of the cases in which the question has been raised either decided or assumed that a railroad is liable for injury to a passenger from delay or default in the running of its trains if caused by its wilful act or negligence.

A railroad company which fails to run a train according to its published schedule, unless prevented by some valid reason, is liable to a person sustaining injuries from such failure for the damages actually sustained by him as a direct and necessary result thereof. Savannah, S. & S. R. Co. v. Bonaud, 58 Ga. 180.

It is the duty of the carrier upon receiving a passenger and starting upon the journey to carry him to his destination with all reasonable diligence. Weed v. Panama R. Co. 17 N. Y. 362.

In Wibert v. New York & E. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 253, Hand, J., says no one will contend that a railroad company will be justified in leaving a passenger midway on his journey because it has not sufficient cars.

In Burke v. Great Western R. Co., cited in 2 Wood, Railway Law, p. 1176, the court said that at common law the duty of the carriers was to use all reasonable means to convey passengers to their destinations in the reasonable time which the passengers to a particular place desire, without specifying any time. But that railroad companies have fixed their own times of arrival and thereby railroad because an engine was broken down, where there was no personal insult, indignity, or intentional wrong to him.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Beaufort County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's failure to furnish plaintiff with transportation according to its contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. J. H. Small and W. B. Rodman for appellant.

Mr. Charles F. Warren for appellee.

Per Curiam:

We are of the opinion that the plaintiffs in the above cases are not entitle to punitive damages. An opinion will be filed hereafter.

New trial.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As this controversy grows out of an admitted failure on the part of the railway company to perform its agreement with a passenger to carry him to and from a particular place within a given time, and involves especially the question whether the testimony warranted the court in instructing the jury that they were at liberty to add exemplary damages to the estimated loss actually sustained by reason of the delay, it is not improper to state in the outset several leading principles of the law governing the relative rights and duties of carriers and passengers, and the rules generally applicable in the assessment of damages in such cases. The contract of carriage begins when the passenger comes upon the carrier's premises, or upon its means of conveyance, with the purpose of purchasing a ticket within a reasonable time, or after having purchased a ticket. The relation, once constituted, continues until the journey expressly or impliedly contracted for has been concluded, and the passenger has left the carrier's premises, or has been allowed a reasonable time to leave such premises. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 742– fixed what are reasonable times, and if they fail from want of diligence to perform their contracts they are liable for the loss thereby caused.

In case an excursion train is stopped before reaching its destination, a person who has paid for a ticket through may recover the price of the ticket and the value of the time lost by the delay. Eddy v. Harris, 78 Tex. 661.

An advertisement of the time of arrival and departure of the trains imposes upon the carrier the obligation of using due care and skill to have the trains arrive and depart at the times indicated. But it does not make the company warrantor and liable for delays not due to its fault but to mere accident. Gordon v. Manchester & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 596, 13 Am. Rep. 97.

An action against a carrier for failure to stop and take a passenger on board is founded upon a tort for violation of the general duty to the public and not for breach of a special contract with the passenger. Heirn v. M'Caughan, 32 Miss. 17, 66 Am. Dec. 588.

If a train goes on another road than that advertised, so that a passenger is not carried to his destination but is compelled to walk some distance to his home, he may recover damages for the personal inconvenience but not for sickness caused by the exertion and exposure. Hobbs v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. 111.

If a railroad company advertises in the public newspapers the hours at which its trains will start, it cannot change the hour by merely posting notices in its stations and cars without being liable to one who has purchased tickets with reference to the advertised time, and who is inconvenienced by the change. Sears v. Eastern R. Co. 14 Allen, 433, 92 Am. Dec. 780.

In case a car is cut off and left standing on the track without notice to passengers in it the carrier will be liable for compensatory damages to them. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Lipscomb, 90 Va. 137, 20 L. R. A. 817.

But in Martin v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 32 S. C. 592, where a train passed a station without stopping, resulting in a suit by intending passengers, the court affirmed a nonsuit, saying there was no evidence of any pecuniary damages or of any personal injuries resulting in any loss whatever to any of the parties.

And in case of the failure of the carrier to carry out his contract for a Sunday excursion no damages can be recovered for breach of the public duty for failure to carry, and the only damages will be compensatory under the special contract. Walsh v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 42 Wis. 23, 24 Am. Rep. 376.

The carrier is not liable for delays caused by floods. Fitzgerald v. Midland R. Co. 34 L. T. N. S. 771.

And the fact that a train is behind time when wrecked by an overturn which does not extend to the section of the road where the train would have been had it been on time will not render the company liable for the damages resulting from the accident. McClary v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 3 Neb. 44, 19 Am. Rep. 631.

As to liability for permitting a train to become so crowded that there is no more room for passengers, see note to Lynn v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal.) 24 L. R. A. 710.

Effect of limitation of liability in time-tables.

If the company expressly states that it will use due care to have its trains on time but will not insure punctuality, a passenger cannot recover damages for delay in the absence of negligence on the part of the carrier. Prevost v. Great Eastern R. Co. 13 L. T. N. S. 20.

If the time-table states that the company will not hold itself responsible for delays arising over its lines, a passenger cannot hold it responsible for such delay. Thompson v. Midland R. Co. 34 L. T. N. S. 34.

If the time-table states that every attention will be paid to insure the punctuality, but that the directors will not undertake that trains shall be on time, and that they will not be responsible beyond their own line in case a train becomes late so that connections are missed, the passenger may hold the company to some responsibility if it was due to the negligence of the company, but he cannot engage a special train to take him to his destination at the expense of the company unless passengers would ordinarily have incurred such expenses on their account under similar circumstances. Le Blanche v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 286.

If a carrier circulates a time-table with a particular train marked on it which it knows does not run, it will be liable for the injuries suffered by an intended passenger who is delayed because of reliance upon the time-table. Denton v. Great Western R. Co. 5 El. & Bl. 860.

745. There is always, on the creation of a relation, an agreement express or implied, and a legal obligation to perform the stipulation of the contract by transporting the passenger in accordance with the published schedule, or within a reasonable time. Hutchinson, Carriers, §§ 603 et seq. If an action be brought for a breach of this contract, the amount recovered is limited (with the single exception of a breach of marriage contract, say many law writers) to damage supposed to have been in contemplation of the parties, and actually caused by such breach. The measure of damages is ordinarily not materially different whether the defendant fails to comply with his contract through inability, or wilfully disregards it. We shall have occasion presently to advert to the distinction between actions of tort founded upon a wilful omission of a common law duty, but involving at the same time a breach of contract, and such as are brought to obtain redress for the intentional failure or absolute refusal to comply with the terms of an agreement. Actionable negligence must be the proximate cause of a legal injury and damage. It may be (1) a pure tort; (2) an inadvertent breach of contract, which cannot be regarded as independent of the contract and tortious; (3) a breach of contract in the nature of tort, and which may be treated as such independent of the contract. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, suprd. Treating of torts of this third class, Bishop Non-cont. L. § 74, says: "Because a common carrier, whether of goods or passengers, is a sort of public servant, the law imposes its duties upon him, a breach whereof is a part, though there is also a contract which is violated by the same act." Whenever there is a public employment from which arises a common-law duty, an action for a breach of such duly may be brought in tort. Southern Exp. Co. v. McVeigh, 20 Gratt. 264; Clark v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 64 Mo. 440; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 32. In actions ex delicto the motive of the defendant becomes material. 1 Sutherland, Damages, § 373. If a tort is committed through mistake, ignorance, or mere negligence, the damages are limited to the actual injury received. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 21, note 3. But where there is an element of fraud, malice, gross negligence, insult, or other cause of aggravation in the act causing the injury, punitive damages are allowed, said the court in Holmes v. Carolina C. R. Co. 94 N.

If the time tables state that the railroad company does not warrant that its train shall be on time the mere taking of a ticket will not render the company liable for connections missed because a train gets behind time so that the passenger is delayed in reaching his destination. Hurst v. Great Western R. Co. 19 C. B. N. S. 310.

But a railroad company cannot absolve itself from liability from negligence in not starting a train on time by stating in its time tables that it will not hold itself responsible for delay or any consequences arising therefrom. Buckmaster v. Great Eastern R. Co. 23 L. T. N. S. 471.

Passenger's rights.

If a train is delayed by a wreck and there is no prospect of its being able to move for some time, a passenger may leave the train for necessary accommodations at an hotel and pursue his journey upon another train at his convenience. Wilsey v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 83 Ky. 511.

Where the train carrying a passenger was delayed the court held that the passenger was justified in hiring a conveyance which would get him to his destination half an hour sooner than the railroad company were prepared to carry him, and to charge the cost to the railroad company. Turner v. Great Western R. Co. cited in 2 Wood, Railway Law, p. 1175.

If connections are not made as advertised the passenger may complete his journey at the expense of the carrier, but cannot hold it liable for money lost by reason of failure to keep engagements at the point of destination. Hamlin v. Great Northern R. Co. 1 Hurlst. & N. 408.

Where a passenger on a branch road bought an excursion ticket good to return on certain advertised trains for fourteen days, and upon taking one of such trains to the junction found that no train would run during that day upon the branch, he was entitled to hire a conveyance to take him to his home and charge the cost to the carrier. Hawcroft v. Great Northern R. Co. 16 Jur. 196, 8 Eng. L. & Eq. 362.

What damages are recoverable.

In case a train fails to stop for a passenger who could reach his destination by hiring a conveyance, the damages for which the carrier will be liable are the cost of the conveyance and the value of lost time. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cleveland (Tex.) 33 S. W. 687.

If the carrier takes the passenger only part way, which results in extra expense to him and considerable delay, he may recover for such expenses and for the mental suffering caused thereby. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Berry (Tex.) 15 S. W. 48.

In case a train does not make a regular stop as advertised an intending passenger will be entitled to compensatory damages, if it was through mere negligence, and punitive damages if the failure to stop was wilful. The court says it will be a denial of justice to permit a common carrier to exhibit such inability and wilful neglect of the duties it has assumed and such disregard of the rights of others. Purcell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 414, 12 L. R. A. 113.

Damages not shown to be the direct result of the delay cannot be recovered from the carrier for the delay. Benson v. New Jersey Transp. Co. 9 Bosw. 412.

If a passenger delayed by a wreck does not follow the instructions of the conductor as the means of going forward on the journey, and is left and has to go home, he can recover only compensatory damages, if anything, although when the relief train leaves the conductor knows that that passenger is being left. Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Purnell, 69 Miss. 652.

In case a train runs by a station without stopping for passengers more than actual damages may be recovered for the protection of the public. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Green, 52 Miss. 779.

If a train refuses to stop on signal to take up a passenger at a flag station such action may subject the company to exemplary damages. Wilson v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. 63 Miss. 352.

A person for whom a train fails to stop cannot walk to his station and recover from the company for sickness brought on by the exertion. Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Birney, 71 Ill. 391.

Money which a theatrical manager is compelled to refund because of failure to reach his engagement in a town by delay on a railroad cannot be recovered from the company. Georgia Railroad v. Hayden, 71 Ga. 518, 51 Am. Rep. 274.

Remote and contingent damages cannot be recovered for delay in carriage. Yonge v. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. 1 Cal. 353. H. P. F.

C. 318; but the statement of the rule was modified by omission of the term "gross negligence" in the subsequent cases of Rose v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 106 N. C. 170, and Tomlinson v. Wilmington & S. C. R. Co. 107 N. C. 327. The modification mentioned was due to the fact that this court meantime had said, in McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 105 N. C. 149, that "the most learned and discriminating text-writers concur in the opinion, that in actions arising ex delicto there is no degree of negligence that can be described by the word 'gross' alone. But where an injury is due and can be traced direct to the wilful act of another he is not absolved from liability. . . . Hence, we often find, in opinions emanating from this and other courts, the expression 'gross and wanton negligence'; but the former word is never used to describe a degree of carelessness that will excuse the fault of a plaintiff in exposing himself to danger, except where it is improperly held synonymous with either the word, 'wilful,' 'malicious,' or 'fraudulent.'" Thompson, in his work on Carriers of Passengers (p. 573, § 27), says: "Such damages are termed 'exemplary,' 'punitive,' or 'vindictive' damages,—sometimes called 'smart money,'—and are only awarded in cases where there is an element either of fraud, malice, such a degree of negligence as indicates a reckless indifference to consequences, oppression, insult, rudeness, caprice, wilfulness, or other causes of aggravation in the act or omission causing the injury. . . . Some of the authorities include 'gross negligence' on the part of the defendant as one of the elements which . . . entitles the plaintiff to exemplary damages. But the better view is given in an opinion delivered in a recent case in the Supreme Court of the United States. . . In reversing the case Mr. Justice Davis, who delivered the opinion, . . . said: 'Some of the highest English courts have come to the conclusion that there is no intelligible distinction between ordinary and gross negligence.'" Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. ed. 374. The general rule, therefore, is that, where the violation of duty makes the defendant a wrongdoer, only compensatory damages are allowed, while proof of a wrongful purpose may take a case out of it as an exceptional one. Fraud, malice, or insult imply from their very definitions the existence of an intent on the part of the wrongdoer to cheat, to injure through hatred, or to oppress. Where even the rightful ejection of a passenger is accompanied with undue force, "rudeness, recklessness, or other wilful wrong" (Rose v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. supra), the law assumes the existence of bad motive on the principle applicable in ordinary cases of assault,—that every person is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his own act. Tomlinson's Case, supra. It must be noted that Mr. Thompson carefully excludes "gross negligence" as an element warranting the allowance of such damages, and substitutes the expression "such a degree of negligence as indicates a reckless indifference to consequences," which is equivalent to wanton carelessness; yet the learned justice who wrote the opinion in Holmes' Case, supra, inadvertently cited that author (94 N. C. 323) in support of his statement of the doctrine. In the consideration of the case at bar, therefore, it is proper to dismiss from our minds the idea that the weight of authority in our own court or elsewhere leaves us at liberty to hold that punitive damages may be awarded in every instance where a court can, by giving a very comprehensive meaning to that undefined and improper term, "gross negligence," as descriptive of the degree of carelessness, classify a case as an exceptional one, taken out of the general rule by the evidence of intent.

Counsel for the defendant asked the court, on the trial at the case at bar, to charge as follows: "(1) That upon the complaint and the facts as stated in the complaint, in the absence of any allegations of wilful or gross negligence, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover punitive damages; (2) that, taking the entire evidence in view, the plaintiff is not entitled to punitive damages . . .; (4) that if the plaintiff knew, when he contracted for transportation to Jamesville and return, of the general character, quality, and condition of the defendant's equipment, and the general condition of its road, plaintiff would be entitled to recover no damages except the cost of transportation back to Washington; (5) that the cause of action being laid in tort, the plaintiff cannot recover damages for a breach of contract of carriage in this action; (6) that, upon the entire evidence, the jury should respond to the several issues in favor of the defendant; (7) that, if the defendant was expending the entire income from its road in the maintenance of its roadway and the equipment of said road, it is not guilty of such wilful negligence as will subject it to punitive damages, but the plaintiff can only recover such actual damages as may have been proved." The court refused to give the instructions asked, but charged the jury, among other matters, as follows: "(2) The plaintiff claims that he bought a ticket from Washington to Jamesville, and back to Washington; that the defendant negligently failed to have a train to bring him back; and also punitive damages for the wrongful act of the defendant in failing to bring him back. He alleges that the defendant has wilfully failed and neglected its duty to the public in not properly keeping its roadbed, tracks, engines, and cars in such condition as to do the business which it naturally gets; and if you are satisfied that the defendant has wilfully neglected to do this, and in consequence of this wilful negligence they failed to run the engines and cars to return the plaintiff to Washington, then he would be entitled to punitive damages; otherwise he will only be entitled to compensatory damages." The court also charged the jury that it was the duty of defendant to have known the condition of its road and cars; and if they found that the roadbed, track, and engines of defendant were, at the time alleged, in such condition as not to render it reasonably certain, in the ordinary running of its trains, that the engine would be able to carry the trains through, etc., it would be wilful negligence, for which they might allow punitive damages.

It appeared from the testimony that the road was originally constructed for the purpose of hauling lumber, but ultimately engaged in the business of transporting passengers across the intervening swamp from its northern terminus, at Jamesville, to its southern terminus, at Washington. The roadbed had been made by driving down piles of various kinds to make a foundation for the cross-ties. In the earlier years of its operations, as a carrier of passengers, the company had owned two engines, one regular narrow gauge passenger car, and one passenger car constructed out of a street car; but the latter car had become unservicable sometime before the injury complained of, and on extraordinary occasions a flat or box car had to be used to accommodate passengers. The engines had become worn, and had been jolted and injured on account of the bad condition of the roadbed and the consequent jarring in passing over it. The earnings of the road had been applied exclusively to its improvement during the whole period of its use as a road for transporting passengers, but latterly the income had been greatly diminished, and was insufficient to keep the roadbed in repair, much less to provide additional cars or engines. These are some of the facts testified to by the witnesses. The gravamen of the complaint is that the defendant company carried the plaintiff from Washington to Jamesville November 7, 1892, but failed to furnish means of transportation at the stipulated time, November 9, to bring him back to Washington on his return ticket. In applying the abstract principles which we have stated more specifically to the case before us, we find it to be a well-settled rule that where a passenger is delayed or carried contrary to the agreement, so as to lead to a failure to accomplish the object of the trip, such person is entitled to recover in all cases at least the sum paid for the ticket, with interest thereon, together with compensation for the whole of the time lost in the trip, and in some instances the reasonable cost of reaching the objective point by means of some other conveyance. Yonge v. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. 1 Cal. 353; Hamlin v. Great Northern R. Co. 1 Hurlst. & N. 408; Savannah, S. & S. R. Co. v. Bonaud, 58 Ga. 180; Hawcroft v. Great Northern R. Co. 8 Eng. The rule of damage just stated is to be adopted, not only when the suit against the railway company is brought for, or the proof confined to, the breach of contract of carriage, but as well where the plaintiff elects to sue in tort and rely upon the disregard of duty on the part of the carrier as a cause of action, unless it appear that the plaintiff has suffered, in addition to the expense, loss of time, and inconvenience incident to every failure to comply with such a contract, some personal injury of which the wilful failure to transport him according to the schedule time is a proximate cause. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 40; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, supra; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Sellers, 93 Ala. 9; 3 Sutherland, Damages, §§ 934–938; Martin v. Columbia & G. R. Co. 32 S. C. 592; Wilkinson v. Searcy, 76 Ala. 176; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 23. In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Sellers, supra, where the conductor carried a female passenger beyond the station to which the company had contracted to carry her, and ordered her off the train in a driving rain with an infant in her arms, and so encumbered with baggage that she could not protect herself by using an umbrella, thereby subjecting her to exposure from which she contracted sickness that lasted for three weeks, the court carefully and in express terms rested the decision that the jury might allow exemplary damages upon the ground, not of the "omission of the duty" on the part of the conductor of stopping at the station, but of his wilful disregard of her comfort and health in forcing her to expose herself and her infant, instead of letting her off at a house or backing the train to the station. In discussing this doctrine, Sutherland (vol. 3, § 938) says: "Where a person has bought a ticket and is carried beyond the station for which he is ticketed, without any fault on his part, he has a right of action for at least nominal damages, though he suffers no actual injury, and for such actual injury as he may in fact suffer." After laying down the foregoing as the ordinary rule, when the conductor, with a full knowledge of the destination of a passenger, merely takes him beyond that point, and lets him off without circumstances of aggravation, he proceeds to refer with approval to the ruling of the court of Alabama, already cited, that where there was evidence in addition that a female passenger was ordered off the train with her infant, the circumstances attending her expulsion were evidence to be considered by the jury of wilful wrong on the part of the conductor, and consequent liability on the part of the company to punitive damages. It is an error that will lead to endless confusion to hold that "smart money," which is allowed as a punishment to the wrongdoer, may be recovered in every case where, under the common-law practice, an action of ex delicto would lie. Wanamaker v. Bowes, 36 Md. 42; Wilkinson v. Searcy, supra; Phelps v. Owens, 11 Cal. 22. All of the actions brought against railway companies for breach of duty arise out of tort; but it is only in those where the elements already mentioned as indicative of bad motive exist, and where, in addition, some personal injury or indignity is sustained, that the plaintiff is allowed to recover more than compensatory damages. Morse v. Duncan, 14 Fed. Rep. 396. In Tomlinson v. Wilmington & S. C. R. Co. supra, the court said: "'The fact that the plaintiff was wrongfully expelled places him in no more favorable attitude, as a claimant of punitive damages, than if he had been rightfully ejected, but in an unlawful and unwarranted manner or with undue force. It is an essential prerequisite to the acquisition of the right to recover exemplary damages for the wrongful expulsion of a passenger from a train, that there should be evidence of undue force, unnecessary rudeness in the application of the force, or insult, malice, or some wilful wrong accompanying the act of ejecting him or causing him to leave the train.' Rose v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. supra, and authorities there cited." Justice Clark, for the court, in Wallace v. Western N. C. R. Co. 104 N. C 452, approving the rule laid down in 3 Sutherland Damages (1st ed.) 261, said: "Plaintiff is to have a reasonable satisfaction . . . for loss of both bodily and mental powers, or for actual suffering both of body and mind, which are the immediate and necessary consequences of the injury." "In the absence of any sufficient testimony to make the company liable for wilful disregard of the intestate's danger," said the court in Roseman v. Carolina C. R. Co. 112 N. C. 719, 19 L. R. A. 327, "we think the court below erred in submitting the case to the jury."

It is true that smart money may be awarded by the jury when no actual but only nominal damage is shown, as when a conductor rightfully expels a person from a car or the owner puts a trespasser off his premises, and either of them uses excessive force or subjects such persons to useless indignity. Tomlinson v. Wilmington & S. C. R. Co. supra; White v. Barnes, 112 N. C. 323. The allowance is made, in these instances, on account of the assault or rudeness. But where a trespass is committed by mistake, the case is not governed by the same principle as when a wilful assault is committed. Beveridge v. Welch, 7 Wis. 465. It is not sufficient ground for allowing punitive damages that the defendants, when they committed a trespass, had reason to believe, but did not know, that their acts were wrongful and might result in injury to plaintiff. Inman v. Ball, 65 Iowa, 543. On the other hand, a trespasser is always responsible for such actual damages as legitimately follow from his act, whether he contemplated the result or not (Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542), while one who assaults another is presumed to have intended the personal injury,—that is, the consequence of committing the assault,—it being a wrongful act, done purposely and without cause. Goetz v. Ambs, 27 Mo. 33; United States v. Taylor, 2 Sumn. 586, Fed. Cas. No. 16,442; Causee v. Anders, 4 Dev. & B. L. 246. We think that the case at bar is one of those where the plaintiff, under the old common-law practice, might have elected to bring his suit either for the breach of contract in failing to bring the plaintiff back on schedule time, or for the disregard of his duty to the public as a carrier,—either an action of assumpsit or of trespass. But because he chose then to sue for the tort, and now to allege such facts as show an omission of duty, it does not follow that, upon proof of such allegations, exemplary damages will be allowed. There has been a failure to show the sort of wilfulness that manifests its presence in malice, rudeness, violence, indignity, and reckless disregard of consequences, and there is no evidence that the plaintiff suffered from sickness contracted by exposure incident to the delay, or was subjected, in consequence of the defendant's failure to furnish transportation, to any other personal injury or to indignity. If neither the intentional or wrongful expulsion of a passenger not accompanied with undue force (Tomlinson's Case, supra), nor the negligent carrying him beyond his destination (3 Sutherland, Damages, § 938), after having inspected his ticket or received it, is sufficient evidence of the wilful infliction of personal injury to warrant the allowance of punitive damages, we fail to see upon what principle we can hold a railroad company liable to be so punished because, with a full knowledge on the part of its manager that the company had but two engines, one of which was in the shop at Norfolk for repairs, it undertook to haul to Jamesville and back, with the other, not then in good condition, the train on which the plaintiff and others who had return tickets were to be carried as passengers, because only of the delay and inconvience incident to such detention. If the same engine, in consequence of the bad condition of the track or the engine itself, had, with the cars, been derailed, only those passengers who received bodily injury could have maintained actions against the company, and have recovered, as a part of the compensation for the consequences of the accident, exemplary damages. It is not necessary to cite authority in support of the soundness of so plain a proposition; and yet, if we sustain the court below, the logical result would be that a passenger who is delayed without suffering bodily injury by a defective engine is entitled to smart money, though he could not have subjected the company to such punishment had he escaped unharmed when it was derailed and upset. "Neither negligence without damage, nor damage without negligence, will constitute any cause of action." Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 23–25. The case of Purcell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 414, 12 L. R. A. 113, seems to have been confidently relied on to sustain the contention of the plaintiff. The facts in that case were that the plaintiff had purchased a ticket, and was waiting at the time at which it was advertised that the train would stop at the station where he was to embark; but the cars being overloaded because a circus was to give an exhibition at the station to which the passenger was destined, the conductor did not stop at the station, but left him standing. It was held that the failure to provide sufficient means of transportation, when by reasonable diligence it could have been ascertained that they would be needed, was such evidence of wilfulness and gross negligence as to warrant the court in instructing the jury that they might allow punitive damages. In the opinion, Heirn v. M'Caughan, 32 Miss. 17, 66 Am. Dec. 588, was cited as "exactly in point" to sustain the ruling, though even that extreme case was distinguishable from Purcell's Case, as well as that at bar, in that the jury must have found preliminary to the assessment of exemplary damages, (1) that, after advertising that the boat would stop for passengers at the landing where the feme plaintiff was waiting, the owners or their agent wilfully and capriciously passed by, when they could have effected a landing there and had room to accommodate the plaintiff; (2) that the instruction excepted to and sustained was that the plaintiffs were entitled, "from the exposure and discomfort they suffered" in waiting for the boat, to exemplary damages (p. 24); it appearing on the trial that the feme plaintiff was pregnant, and that, the weather being unusually cold, she suffered great pain and anguish, whereby her health and life were in peril.

In addition to the authorities already cited upon this point, we find a summary of the doctrine (compiled from the leading cases in Ray on Negligence of Imposed Duties, Passenger Carr. p. 228, § 68), which is as follows: "Where, according to the schedule of trains, a passenger arrives at a station, intending to take passage, and he finds no train ready, and is compelled to remain over the night, and in consequence of the delay he fails to keep an appointment and complete business arrangements, while he will be entitled to recover the actual expense incurred at his hotel, he cannot recover beyond more than nominal damages," —citing Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Green, 52 Miss. 779, to sustain the proposition; and the court says in that case, on page 229, that "punitive damages will not be allowed in the absence of any circumstances of malice, oppression, insult, personal injuries, damages to business, mental or physical suffering, although something more than actual damages may be awarded against common carriers by way of punishment for neglect of duty and protection to the public." In the application of the proposition which is taken from that case, the court held that where a passenger train ran 60 yards beyond the platform, and failed to stop there long enough for a passenger who had bought a ticket and was waiting to embark, to reach it, the allowance of $1,500 damages was excessive because "no damages were proved except disappointment, delay, and inconvenience." The reasonable rule adopted in Mississippi will not, therefore, apply either to Purcell's Case or to that at bar, since no personal injury was sustained by the complainant in either case, nor was there any ground for compensatory or punitive damages shown, except the disappointment, delay, and inconvenience resulting from the failure to furnish means of transportation. We conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff was not entitled, upon any phase of the evidence, to recover punitive damages, for the reasons (1) that he had not proved that he sustained any personal injury, or shown any grounds for asking damages except inconvenience, delay, and disappointment; (2) that in no aspect of the testimony is there evidence of bad motive sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to more than compensatory damages.

In passing upon this question we must invoke the aid of common sense and common observation, since the question whether a given act amounts to negligence at all, and if it does, what degree of culpability attaches to it, depends not only upon surrounding circumstances, such as the condition of the parties, but the condition of the country and the progress of improvement in science and the arts. We cannot shut our eyes to the history of railways in North Carolina, and the daily developments of the country by new branch lines, built first for the transportation of lumber, and gradually extending their business as carriers to other freight, until at last, though the corporation has been able to purchase not more than two or three engines and a single passenger car with few appointments, its patrons induce it to transport passengers in order that they may have the advantage of saving time and expense by substituting such a conveyance as an improvement on a road wagon or other vehicle. We are not disposed to check the process of evolution which we see around us, from a lumber road into a comfortable line for passengers, as the development of business justifies the change. Even where a road appears to be retrograding, we see no reason why we should interpose with a harsh rule, such as would have stopped the operation of the Raleigh & Gaston Road nearly fifty years ago with the best efforts of our distinguished Governor Graham, representing the state, as a principal stockholder, and running it with poor equipments and constant danger of injury to passengers by derailments and snakeheads, and frequent delays of many days to purchasers of tickets. History has repeated itself in the gradual improvement of the roadbed and equipments of the Western North Carolina Railroad. If the axe is to be brought to the root of the tree by stopping these roads from transporting persons at all unless the conditions be improved, the legislature has wisely attempted to vest the necessary power in a railroad commission to accomplish this end either by ordering a cessation of operations, or the improvement of the roadbed and the purchase of new equipments. Meantime, neither the law, fairly interpreted, nor considerations of public policy, warrant the adoption of so harsh a rule as that proposed. It necessarily follows that Purcell's Case is overruled as inconsistent with the principles we have laid down. We are less averse to taking this course because the doctrine there enunciated can never become a rule upon which the title to property depends, and, as we have intimated already, because it may operate in its enforcement to check the improvement and development of sections now too remote from market to justify the most costly roadbeds and the best equipments. For the reasons given, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the other exceptions, which we may state, in a general way, are untenable, and we feel constrained to grant a new trial.

Clark, J. dissenting:

It is the duty of railroad companies to run their trains according to schedule. "Passengers, if delayed, are entitled to compensation for a loss of their time (Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Books, 57 Pa. 339); for expenses during delay, or, when necessary, expenses for procuring another conveyance. As to the compensation for loss of time, it . . . is admissible . . . to prove the rate of wages at the place of his destination." 2 Harris, Damages by Corp. § 545. "A passenger, in order to avoid a delay, can only incur a reasonable expense. He cannot take a special train in order to avoid a slight delay. . . . The value of the time lost may be recovered. Evidence of the rate of wages earned by persons of the plaintiff's trade at the place of his destination . . . is admissible to guide the jury in fixing the damages." 2 Sedgw. Damages, §§ 862, 863. Such are the general principles applicable in cases where, by reason of the train being behind the schedule time, the passenger misses connection with the first train on a connecting road, or is delayed even in reaching his destination on the carrier's own line according to the advertised schedule, when the action is for breach of contract. As in every such case of delay each passenger is entitled at least to nominal damages, it is of importance to the public and the common carrier to revert to the settled principle, in actions for breach of contract,—that the parties are only liable for those damages which were reasonably in their contemplation at the time of making the contract. This is the usual limit of damages, but there may be cases where the neglect of the carrier is so wilful as to make it liable in an action of tort for exemplary damages. The plaintiff, however, contends that, as the present is an action of tort upon the evidence, he is entitled to recover exemplary damages. The question was decided by this court, no one dissenting, in Purcell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 414, 12 L. R. A. 113, where it is said (pp. 417, 418, 108 N. C.,): "The Code, § 1963, provides: 'Every railroad corporation shall . . . at regular times, to be fixed by public notice, . . . take, transport, and discharge such passengers and property . . . on due payment of the freight or fare legally authorized therefor, and shall be liable to the party aggrieved in an action for damages for any neglect or refusal in the premises.' For a violation of such statutory duty the plaintiff might have sued in contract (Hodges v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 105 N. C. 170), but he could elect to sue in tort for the injury and the breach of public duty (existing independent of the statute) by the wilfulness or negligence of defendant. Bishop, Non-cont. L. §§ 73, 74; Redf. Carr. § 422; Tattan v. Great Western R. Co. 2 El. & El. 844. If the tort was committed by mere negligence of the defendant as simple carelessness or inadvertence, the plaintiff would be restricted to compensatory damages, and as no special damages were alleged and shown other than obtaining another conveyance, the measure of damages as laid down by the court, to wit, the price of the ticket and of procuring such other conveyance—40 cents in all—would have been correct. But if the conduct of the defendant was wilful, or showed such gross negligence as to indicate a wanton disregard of the rights of the plaintiff, he was entitled to recover punitive damages in addition." In the present case there was evidence of great dilapidation of cars, rolling stock, engines, roadbed, and trestles, and of continued neglect to repair the same. So gross was it that for defendant to continue to offer to transport and to receive for transportation passengers, with such defective machinery and roadway, was such a disregard of its duties and the rights of the public that, in case of death resulting to a passenger while en route, there are authorities which would have sustained an indictment for manslaughter against the president, directors, and other chief officers. It is very certain that, with such machinery and roadbed, to contract to take the plaintiff and others on a round trip, and, having gotten them to the other end of the line, to leave them there to get back as they could, was such "gross and wilful disregard of plaintiff's rights as would entitle him to recover punitive damages." As was said in Purcell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. supra: "Should an excessive verdict have been found by the jury, the discretion rested with the trial judge to correct it; but it would be a denial of justice to permit a common carrier to exhibit such arbitrary and wilful neglect of the duties it has assumed and such disregard of the rights of others. Yet such is the effect if, without adequate excuse, it should be allowed so to act with no other penalty than refunding the price of the ticket and the price paid for another conveyance, since the latter would be demanded in very few cases and only when the destination is at a short distance. . . . The refunding the price of the ticket would amount in most cases to nothing, as the passenger would usually buy a ticket by the next train. Yet the inconvenience, annoyance, and injustice to the traveling public by such detentions would be great and difficult to estimate." In that case the plaintiff sued for damages because the train ran by its regular station without stopping to take him on. Here the condition of the machinery and roadbed was such that it was dangerous to travel over the road. The defendant company showed a criminal indifference to the rights of the public in offering to transport passengers when it knew the uncertainty alike of transportation safe and on schedule time, both of which are implied in its offer. The company owed it to the public to keep its appliances and roadway in proper condition to transport safely and according to schedule. If it had not money in the treasury, it should have borrowed it, and, if unable to do that, it should have suspended operations, as we learn it has since done.

It is not in every case where a railroad is in a bad condition and there is delay or failure to convey, that the jury can give punitive damages. The court here told the jury that "if the defendant had reason to believe, and did believe, from the business of the road for several years past and the condition of its engines, that it would be able to keep its contract to transport plaintiff, and an accident occurred which they could not, in the ordinary course of their business, have foreseen and provided for, it would not be wilful negligence." To this the defendant did not except. The court further charged, if the jury "found that the roadbed, track, and engines of the defendant were at the time alleged in such condition as not to render it reasonably certain, in the ordinary running of its trains, that the engines would not be able to carry the trains through, or the roadbed and track in such condition as to render it unsafe to carry its trains over it, and they permitted this condition of things to continue up to the alleged time, it would be wilful negligence, for which you may allow punitive damages. If you find that they had allowed their road, track, and engines to get in such condition as not to be able to do the ordinary business of the road, by their negligence, and the character of that negligence was such as to satisfy you that defendant did not care, or was indifferent, as to whether they had the train there or not, it would be wilful negligence." To this the defendant excepted. The action was brought for a tort. The second paragraph of the complaint was as follows: (2) That the defendant so carelessly and negligently conducted and managed the said railroad, and so carelessly and negligently allowed its track, cars, locomotives, and other appurtenances belonging to the said railroad as a common carrier to become so out of repair, and the equipment of the said railroad to become so run down and incomplete, and so negligently failed to provide adequate facilities for the transportation of passengers, that the plaintiff, by reason of the premises, having on the 7th day of September, 1892, purchased at the town of Washington a ticket to the town of Jamesville and return,—to return on the 9th day of September, 1892,—and for which the defendant charged and received from the plaintiff the sum of $1, was carried over the railroad of the defendant company to the town of Jamesville; that upon the said 9th day of September, 1892, at the advertised time plaintiff presented himself at the defendant's depot in Jamesville, N. C., for transportation over said railroad to Washington, N. C., and because of the negligence, carelessness, and lack of proper equipment of a railroad receiving the profit of a common carrier and owing duties to the public, and without fault on the part of the plaintiff, defendant failed to provide locomotive, cars, or other means for the transportation of, and failed to transport, this plaintiff to the town of Washington, according to its public duty and advertisement, to plaintiff's damage $500." And one of the issues submitted was: "Did the defendant negligently suffer and permit its road, rolling stock, and equipment to become in the condition described in section 2 of the complaint, so that it was unable to discharge its duties to the public as a common carrier of freight and passengers?" The above charge was therefore appropriate to the controversy in the pleadings, and it was most amply supported by the testimony. It will be seen by reference thereto that the roadbed, the engines, and the rolling stock were all unfit and dangerous to be used; that the manager of the company reported the condition of the same to the owners in Philadelphia, but that in wilful disregard of their public duties they neither put the road, engines, and rolling stock into fit condition, nor discontinued holding themselves out to the public for the safe and regular carriage of passengers. If such conduct as the evidence described was not such wilful disregard of the defendant's duties to the public as will entitle the plaintiff to recovery punitive damages, it will be absolutely impossible for a railroad company in this state to show such "wilful disregard of its duties and indifference to the rights of the public" as will, under all the authorities, make it liable for punitive damages. The damage recovered was $50. Upon the evidence, the defendant has cause to congratulate itself that it is not defendant in an action for damages for death or personal injuries caused by its gross and wilful negligence, or that its officers are not under indictment for manslaughter. This is not a breach of contract of carriage by a private party; but it is the direct result of a long-continued disregard of duties assumed in regard to the public by a corporation which sought and obtained the exercise of the right of eminent domain to furnish it a right of way and other special privileges. These were granted solely in consideration of the services which the defendant undertook to render to the public, but which it has wilfully and grossly neglected to properly render. The defendant's own evidence was that its manager had repeatedly, time and again, notified the president and directors of the dilapidated and dangerous condition of the machinery and roadbed, but that adequate relief had always been denied. In New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hurst, 36 Miss. 630, 74 Am. Dec. 785, it is said: It is "the right of the jury in such cases to protect the public by punitive damages, against the negligence, folly, or wickedness, which might otherwise convert these great public blessings into the most dangerous nuisances."

The railroad commission act (1891, chap. 320, § 11), provides that for a wilful violation of the rules and regulations made by the commissioners railroad companies are liable for exemplary damages. It would be an anomaly, certainly, if they are not liable for exemplary damages for a wilful violation of statutory regulations, as in this case.

This disposes of the exception to the charge. The exception to the evidence that an engineer in defendant's employ a year previous was allowed to testify to the bad condition of roadway and machinery at that time cannot be sustained. This was competent, taken with the other evidence, to show the gross neglect of defendant in permitting the dilapidation to continue, all the while holding itself out to the public for the safe and regular carriage of passengers. The exception to issues is also without merit. Every phase of the controversy raised by the pleadings could be fairly presented upon the issues submitted. Humphrey v. Front Street M. E. Church, 109 N. C. 132.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed by Messrs. Chas. F. Warren and L. T. Beckwith for petitioner, Messrs. John H. Small, MacRae & Day, and W. B. Rodman, Contra,—in response to which, on October 22, 1895, Furches, J., delivered the following opinion:

This is a petition to rehear this case, decided at September term, 1894, of this court, and published in 115 N. C. 602. The defendant is a corporation under the laws of this state, running and operating its road between the towns of Washington and Jamesville, transporting both freight and passengers as a common carrier for pay. The plaintiff, a citizen of Washington, wanting to go to the town of Edenton and back, on the 7th of September, 1892, purchased a ticket of defendant to Jamesville, and from Jamesville back to Washington on the 9th. The defendant carried plaintiff to Jamesville on the 7th, and he went on to Edenton and was in that town on the 8th of September. (It is not stated in this case that plaintiff went to Edenton, and was there on the 8th, but this was stated and agreed to by counsel on the argument.) On the 8th of September, soon after leaving Jamesville for Washington, the axle of defendant's engine broke, and when the plaintiff returned from Edenton to Jamesville on the 9th the defendant was unable to carry him on its road from Jamesville back to Washington as it had contracted to do. Thereupon plaintiff brings this action for damages, which he lays at $500, and alleges that defendant's roadbed was in a bad, shackling, and ruinous condition; that defendant had but two engines, both of which were worn and in bad condition, one of them at that time being in the shops for repair, and not in a condition to be used; that the bad condition of defendant's roadbed had rattled the other one so as to cause the axle to break; that all this showed such wilful negligence on the part of defendant towards the public and towards the plaintiff as to entitle him, not only to compensatory damages, but to exemplary damages. The defendant answered, denying the allegation of negligence, admits that the road was not in good condition, says that it was poor and struggling for existence, and that it was expending the whole earnings of the road, and more, in trying to keep it in good repair, and was not able to do so. Therefore defendant denies that it is liable to plaintiff for anything, and certainly not for punitive damages. And, without reviewing the evidence, it is such as to warrant us in saying that the roadbed was in a bad, dilapidated, and ruinous condition; that defendant had but two engines, and they were old, worn, and in bad condition. That plaintiff is entitled to compensatory damages there can be no doubt, but as to whether he is entitled to exemplary damages is the question. It is said that railroads are quasi-public servants; that they are created by the public (the legislature), and owe duties to the public in return for their right of franchise. And, while this is true, it can only be considered by us as a reason for establishing the law as we shall find it, and not as a reason for us to establish the law. Nor can we consider the question as to whether defendant's road is a poor corporation, struggling for existence, and expending all its earnings, and more, on its road; or whether it is a rich corporation. These are questions we have no right to consider in passing upon the question of law as to whether plaintiff is entitled to recover damages against defendant or not. Taylor v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 48 N. H. 317, 2 Am. Rep. 229.

The legal question involved in this case is conceded to be an important one, and is entitled to our best consideration. It is one that has been so much discussed by law writers and by the courts in judicial opinions in which different phases or facts appear, that it is somewhat difficult to establish ourselves on what we consider solid ground. Often a very slight difference in the facts changes the reason upon which a case is decided. We find that decided cases, unless closely attended to, are often misleading. Also often a misunderstanding of some of the facts, or an inadvertence to some fact in the case, leads to error. This, we think, was the case with the learned justice who wrote the opinion we are now reviewing. In stating the facts in Purcell's Case, 108 N. C. 414, 12 L. R. A. 113, he stated that when the defendant's train passed the depot it "was overloaded," when there was evidence tending to show that there was room for a number of other passengers; and this was the hypothesis upon which the court was asked to charge the jury, and which was refused by the court. This inadvertence, as we think, led the court to overrule Purcell's Case, supra. After as full investigation as we have been able to give to this case, we are of the opinion that the true ground for allowing exemplary damages is personal injury to plaintiff, caused by the negligence of defendant (and we do not undertake here to enumerate all the causes for exemplary damages where there is personal injury). And where there is no personal injury, there must be insult, indignity, contempt, or something of the kind, to which the law imputes bad motive towards a plaintiff; and when they are allowed they are in addition to compensatory damages. 1 Sedgw. Damages, 520; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 43, note, and cases cited. This principle we find is recognized and enforced in the following cases: A railroad conductor kissed a lady passenger on his train, and she was allowed to recover punitive damages, upon the ground that it was a personal indignity. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 43. Where a railroad conductor refused to carry a passenger after he had paid his fare, the road is liable to exemplary damages. 3 Sutherland, Damages, §§ 935, 937. This is upon the same ground. Plaintiff is not entitled to exemplary damages unless there is a wilful or intentional violation of plaintiff's personal rights. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. ed. 374. Where a railroad carried a lady passenger a few hundred yards beyond the station, and upon application of the passenger refused to back the train to the station, but put the passenger out in a driving rain with her infant child and baggage, the defendant was held to be liable to punitive damages. But this was put upon the ground of personal indignity and insult, as all the cases we have cited are; and the fact that the passenger could not use her umbrella, got wet, and was sick from the effects, was only allowed in evidence upon the measure of damages. But the gravamen of the action was the personal indignity with which the plaintiff had been treated by the defendant. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Sellers, 93 Ala. 13. We might cite many other cases to sustain the principle we have laid down, but do not deem it necessary.

We make no question under our system of liberal pleading, that plaintiff may recover either in contract or tort, if he has made out his case. But he can no more recover in tort without making out his case than he could recover in contract without making out his case. The fact that the defendant's road was in bad condition was no insult or indignity to plaintiff, and as there was no personal injury on account of its bad condition, this affords him no cause of action. The fact that defendant's engine broke down on the 8th when plaintiff was in Edenton was no personal insult, indignity, or intentional wrong to plaintiff. No doubt the defendant regretted the breaking down of the engine as much as plaintiff. The fact that plaintiff had a right of action for breach of the contract gives him no right of action for tort against the defendant. And unless he had the right to maintain an action for tort, he had no right to punitive damages. There can be no damage recovered when there is no right of action. Damages are not the cause of action, but the result of the action. Taking all the evidence in the case offered by the plaintiff, or that may be considered in his favor, we do not think it makes a cause of action against the defendant in tort, and that the defendant was entitled to have his second prayer for instruction submitted to the jury, to wit, "Taking the entire evidence in view, the plaintiff is not entitled to punitive damages." This was refused by the court, and we think there was error. We have arrived at our conclusion by a different treatment of the case, to some extent, from that adopted by the court in the opinion published in 115 N. C. 602, but our judgment is the same. And in this opinion we do not think it necessary to disturb the judgment as announced in Purcell's Case, supra. But the judgment in that case should be put upon the ground that the defendant treated the plaintiff, Purcell, with indignity and contempt in rushing by the station at faster speed when there was room for other passengers, or at least when there was evidence tending to show this, and the court refused the prayer for instruction submitting this question to the jury.

The petition is dismissed.

Clark, J., concurring in part:

Concurring in the opinion in so far as it reinstates the authority of Purcell v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 108 N. C. 414, 12 L. R. A. 113, the vast and growing importance of the principles involved in this case to every one who shall travel over or ship freight by these great public agencies forbids my acquiescence in some of the reasoning relied on in the present case. In the recent case of Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 106, 37 L. ed. 101, Mr. Justice Gray commends the historical instruction of Chief Justice Pratt (afterwards Lord Camden) that: "A jury have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received. Damages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury of the action itself." And Mr. Justice Gray, for the court, adds: "The doctrine is well settled" that the jury, in addition to compensatory damages, "may award exemplary, punitive, or vindictive damages, sometimes called smart money, if the defendant has acted wantonly . . . or with criminal indifference to civil obligations." In the present case his honor below charged the jury that "if defendant failed to provide proper means for transportation of passengers—as, for instance, the plaintiff in this case—as they had undertaken to do, wantonly and wilfully, the jury may give punitive or punishing damages; and the amount of such is largely a matter for the jury to determine, but the court will supervise, so as to see that no wrong is done." This sums up in a few words the whole controversy in this case, and it is this charge which "is this day brought into question." In Purcell's Case, supra, this court, in a unanimous opinion, laid down the wholesome, and it would seem the necessary, principle that for the wilful and wanton violation by a railroad corporation of the regulations prescribed for its control and conduct by the lawmaking power (Code, § 1963) such corporation is liable to punitory damages. These words, "wilful and wanton," have a well-defined meaning in our courts, and have been construed in State v. Brigman, 94 N. C. 888, and State v. Morgan, 98 N. C. 641, to mean "purposely, intentionally, and with reckless disregard of the rights of others." Our courts have upheld the authority to grant punitory damages in all proper cases, and if they could ever be granted against a corporation in any case it would seem certainly they should lie whenever the conduct of its officials, has shown a "wilful, intentional violation" of the statutes enacted by the legislature for the control of these corporations, and a "reckless disregard of the rights of the traveling public" or shippers of freight. The sovereignty which, through its agents, created and gave existence to this corporation, has recognized this rule as wholesome and just, for in the act creating the railroad commission (act 1891, chap. 320, §11), it is provided in almost identically the same words (indeed the very same, leaving out the word "wantonly") that for a "wilful violation of the rules and regulations made by the commissioners railroad companies are liable for exemplary damages." It would be the strangest of anomalies if a railroad corporation is liable to exemplary damages for the wilful violation of the regulations of the railroad commission, but is not thus liable for the wilful and wanton violation of the regulations prescribed by the legislative power which created them both. And we should have this further anomaly in the law: A telegraphic dispatch announcing the critical illness of a near relative is sent. If not delivered promptly, the sendee, as is properly held by numerous decisions of this court, is entitled to exemplary damages, though he has suffered no personal injury, nor has any indignity been inflicted upon him. Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 370, 9 L. R. A. 669; Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 449; Sherrill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 116 N. C. 655. The reason is that, being put upon notice by the tenor of the dispatch, it is wanton and wilful violation of the duties for which it was incorporated for the company to fail to deliver the message promptly, and the highest reasons of public policy require that exemplary damages should be imposed. Now, suppose the dispatch is delivered and the sendee starts for his home, but the railroad corporation finding that it can send a larger number of passengers to another point, stops its car,—as in the present case they stopped it, because it was cheaper to send a broken piece of machinery to Norfolk to repair than to keep necessary repair shops or another engine,—and by this wilful and wanton violation of its statutory duties to furnish sufficient transportation the recipient of the telegram does not reach the bedside of his dying wife, would it not be an anomaly that for a wilful and wanton violation of its duty to deliver the telegram promptly the telegraph company is liable to exemplary damages, but for an equally wilful and wanton violation by the railroad corporation to transport the passenger according to schedule that company is only liable to pay the passenger's board bill during his detention. In a case where the corporation failed to bring the passenger home on his round-trip ticket, as the defendant in this case failed to do, punitive damages were sustained in Head v. Georgia P. R. Co. 79 Ga. 358.

But it was contended on the argument that though the railroad corporation is liable for the wiful and wanton violation of its statutory duty in running its trains by a station without stopping, and thus failing to take on a passenger when there happens to be a vacant seat, it is not so liable if with full notice of more pass.

engers waiting at a station than the cars can carry, and in time to add more cars, it fails to do so. It is difficult to recognize the authority to hold that this act of wilful violation of its statutory duties and wanton disregard of the rights of the public does not subject the corporation to punitive damages, while the same wilfulness and wantonness in running by a station without stopping does so subject the corporation if there happens to be a vacant seat. It is the same wilfulness and wantonness to fail to have sufficient seats when the corporation has notice in time and cars in its control as not to stop to fill the empty seat. The statute authorizes no such discrimination. It provides (Code, § 1963): "Every railroad corporation . . . shall furnish sufficient accommodation for the transportation of all such passengers and property as shall within a reasonable time previous thereto be offered for transportation at the place of stopping and . . . at the usual stopping places established for receiving and discharging passengers and freight for that train, . . . and shall be liable to the party aggrieved in damages for any neglect or refusal." The statute nowhere intimates any distinction whereby one wilful and wanton violation of the statute is cause for exemplary damages, and that another equally wilful and wanton violation of the same statute incurs no such liability. The reasonable and impartial rule laid down by a unanimous court in Purcell's Case is that, if the breach of the statute "was mere inadvertence or negligence, or was caused by an unforseen number of passengers presenting themselves which rendered it unsafe to take a greater number aboard, and the company could not by reasonable diligence have increased the number of cars, then the plaintiff would be held to recover only the bare compensatory damages laid down. If, however, the defendant . . . by reasonable diligence could have ascertained that the number of cars was insufficient, and made no effort to supply the deficiency, but regardless of its duties and of the rights of those whom it had invited to leave their ordinary avocations and present themselves at its regular station for passage, or if, having room for additional persons, it passed without stopping, this displayed "a gross and wilful disregard of the rights of the plaintiff which entitled him to recover punitive damages." This is sustained by numerous authorities in other states. Heirn v. McCaughan, 32 Miss. 17, 66 Am. Dec. 588; New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hurst, 36 Miss. 660, 74 Am. Dec. 785; Silver v. Kent, 60 Miss. 124; Wilson v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. 63 Miss. 352; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Sellers, 93 Ala. 9; 3 Sutherland, Damages, § 937. It was urged on the argument that it would be difficult often to decide what state of facts would or would not constitute a wilful and wanton disregard of statutory duties. But that does not authorize a judicial repeal of the statute, either in whole or in part. It must, in each case, be determined whether the facts proved show a "wilful and wanton disregard of statutory regulations," and, if they do, the jury is empowered to impose exemplarly damages, subject to the protective supervision of the court to prevent abuse by setting aside the verdict.

But it was further argued before us that, while a railroad corporation is by statute liable for "a wilful violation" of the regulations of the railroad commission, it is not liable for "a wilful and wanton violation of statutory regulations;" and hence when a train with several vacant seats passes its regular station without taking on a passenger waiting there, the liability is only because of the indignity offered the intending passenger. But it will be noted that this is a mere substitution of words. The sole indignity offered him is the wilful and wanton disregard of his rights as guaranteed by the statute (Code, § 1963), that "sufficient accommodation for transportation shall be afforded at the usual stopping places;" and the same indignity is equally offered him by the violation of the same statute if the company knows in reasonable time that the number of cars are insufficient, and can supply them, and fails to do so, running by without stopping, though with crowded cars, because it chose not to supply enough. The duty to furnish sufficient cars is clearly stated in Branch v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 77 N. C. 347, independently of the express requirement of the statute (Code, § 1963),—above quoted. In the present case the learned judge charged the jury in accordance with the ruling of this court, that, if the defendant was guilty of wilful and gross negligence, the plaintiff could recover, otherwise not; and further, that if the accident occurred, which they could not have, in the ordinary course of their business, foreseen and provided for, this would not be wilful negligence, but, "if the character of the negligence was such as to satisfy the jury that the defendant did not care or was indifferent as to whether they had the train there (to bring the passengers home), it would be wilful negligence." It was in evidence that when the plaintiff, who held a return ticket, applied for transportation, the official in charge gave himself no concern whatever, made no effort to have the plaintiff brought home, and refused the use of the hand car. His honor, after stating correctly and more fully what facts would constitute wilful negligence and what would not, instructed the jury that only in the event they found wilful negligence could the plaintiff recover. There was ample evidence to submit to the jury the inquiry whether or not there was wilful negligence. Both authority and reason sustain the proposition that "the liability of a railroad company for exemplary damages cannot be made to depend on the ability of the corporation to earn enough money to keep its road in such condition as to be operated with safety." Texas Trunk R. Co. v. Johnson, 75 Tex. 158, 162; Taylor v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 48 N. H. 304, 317, 2 Am. Rep. 229. If the company is unwilling or unable to furnish money to run its trains according to the statutory requirement, it should cease to hold itself out to the public as a common carrier.

The jury having found that there was a wilful violation by the defendant of its statutory duty to transport the plaintiff, and a wanton disregard of the plaintiff's rights in that respect, it is not the province of this appellate court to review the facts and disturb the verdict.

The principle involved is one of universal interest. It is nothing less, when reduced to its last analysis, than whether these corporations, primarily created for the convenience and advantage of the public, with the incidental benefit of profit to their owners, are subject to exemplary damages when they wilfully and wantonly violate the statutes passed for their regulation by the power which created them. If they are not, then clearly and unmistakably the public are in the power and at the mercy of the arbitrary will of corporations, which, daily aggregating into larger and larger masses, are powerful beyond any control other than the law. And if they possess the power of violating wilfully and wantonly the statutory regulations prescribed for the protection of the public, without fear of punishment by the imposition of exemplary damages at the hands of a jury, then the law-making power in creating them is, like the magician in the Eastern story, evoking a spirit which mastered and destroyed him. The rights of the people are too much at stake in maintaining the principle that railroad corporations are liable to exemplary damages for the "wilful violation" of statutes passed for their regulation, equally with similar violations of the regulations of the railroad commission, for any denial or limitation of such principles to pass unnoticed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

John F. McCARTNEY et al., Appts.,
v.
Thomas S. RIDGWAY et al.

(160 Ill. 129.)

1. A court of equity will not aid a mere volunteer to carry into effect an imperfect gift or an executory trust; but where a voluntary trust upon a meritorious consideration has been perfectly created, it is irrevocable and may be enforced in equity.

2. An executory trust is one which is not fully and finally declared, but requires some other act or acts in order to perfect it and carry out the intention of the settler.

3. An executed trust is one fully and finally declared by the person creating it, so that nothing further remains to be done in order to make it effective.

4. An agreement between the devisees of lands, providing for the selection of a trustee by the parties or an appointment by the judge, and that the lands shall be transferred to such trustee by a proper and suitable conveyance to hold a portion thereof for the benefit of the sisters of such devisees, with remainder to their children, no consideration moving from such children, is both voluntary and executory,—especially where by its terms it is impossible to tell what lands will go into the trust estate.

5. To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, possession and title must pass to and vest in the donee or in a trustee for the donee. Anything which remains to be done to complete the gift cannot be enforced; and the gift, while so incomplete, may be revoked.

6. A gift of a legal estate capable of legal conveyance is revocable at any time before conveyance is made.

7. A voluntary settlement intended to be effectuated by a certain mode will not be given effect by the court by applying a different mode.

8. A voluntary settlement in trust providing that it shall take effect by conveyance will not be held to operate as a declaration of trust.

9. An agreement between devisees of land to convey a portion thereof to a trustee to be appointed, for the benefit of their sisters for life with remainder to the latter's children, cannot be considered as creating a trust for the benefit of the remaindermen on the ground that it creates the relation of vendor and purchaser, and that in equity vendors are trustees of the land for the purchasers, where there is no consideration as between such remaindermen and the signers of the agreement.

10. The sureties upon the bond of a trustee under an agreement that he shall sell and convert lands to be conveyed to him, as soon as can be conveniently, without sacrifice, invest the money and pay over the interest, with authority to make public or private sale for cash or on credit as he may deem best, except that the consent of four persons is required to a private sale, are released by a subsequent agreement by which the trustee can make no public sale for a year, and no private sale at any time without the consent of seven persons, is deprived of all discretion as to the sales, and by which his duties are changed and his responsibilities increased.

APPEAL by the trustee under a certain trust agreement and beneficiaries of such agreement from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiffs in a proceeding to enforce the liability of sureties on the bond of a deceased trustee for his alleged breach of duty. Affirmed.

Statement by Magruder, J.

This is a bill filed on February 26, 1890, by Cornelia Peeples, a minor, by her next friend, against Thomas R. Reid, of Gallatin county, Ill., administrator of the estate of George H. Potter, deceased, who died, intestate, on September 30, 1889, and who, in his lifetime, was a trustee under the agreements hereinafter set forth; John F. McCartney, of Massac county, appointed on October 31, 1889, as successor in trust to said Potter; the widow and children and grandchildren, hereinafter named, of Orva Pool, deceased; Thomas S. Ridgway, David Reid, Robert Reid, Henry O. Docker, and John M. Peeples, jr., sureties upon the bond of said

---

NOTE.—The distinction between executory and executed trusts has an important illustration in the above case in determining the effect of a contract to create a trust.

As to the rights of the beneficiaries of a contract to enforce provisions made for their benefit, see note to Jefferson v. Asch (Minn.) 25 L. R. A. 257.

Potter, trustee, the said Henry O. Docker and John M. Peeples, jr., being husbands of two of the daughters of said Orval Pool; and Harriet M. Peeples, executrix, and Thomas S. Ridgway, executor, of the will of John M. Peeples, sr., or J. McKee Peeples, deceased, who died, testate, on December 22, 1878, and who, in his lifetime, was also one of the sureties upon the bond of said trustee. The bill charges, in general terms, that the trustee George H. Potter was guilty of negligence and mismanagement in his administration of the trust estate, and prays that an accounting be had, and that the amount of the liability of such of the defendants as are liable may be ascertained, and ordered to be paid over to the successor in trust of said Potter. It appears from the allegations of the bill and the evidence in the case that Orval Pool, of Gallatin county, died, testate, on June 30, 1871, leaving, him surviving, his widow, Madeline Pool, and four children,—one son, Marshall M. Pool, and three married daughters, to wit, Mary Pool Docker (wife of Henry O. Docker), Augusta M. Pool Townshend (wife of Richard W. Townshend, since deceased), and Ellen Pool Peeples (wife of John M. Peeples, jr.). These four children were the only heirs at law of Orval Pool. At the death of Orval Pool, his daughter Mrs. Docker had four children, William, Guy, Henry, and Daisy; and, since his death, she has had one son, George, born November 19, 1874. At the death of said Orval, his daughter Mrs. Peeples had one child, Clarence, and, since his death, has had one daughter, the complainant Cornelia, born November 11, 1875. The bill was answered by all the adult defendants, except the widow, Madeline Pool, and the son, Marshall M. Pool, against whom defaults were entered, and by the infant defendants, through their guardians ad litem. A cross-bill was filed by Thomas R. Reid, administrator of Potter's estate, and a cross-bill was also filed by McCartney, the successor in trust, and Ellen Pool Peeples and Mary Pool Docker. Several petitions were also filed by several of the parties. These cross-bills and petitions were answered. A reference was taken to a master in chancery, who made an elaborate report upon the issues involved. The cause was heard upon exceptions to the master's report. On April 2, 1894, the circuit court rendered a decree against the sureties on the bond of George H. Potter, trustee, requiring them to pay to John F. McCartney, as trustee, succeeding Potter, who died insolvent, the sum of $19,795.24, with costs. Said sureties, except John M. Peeples, jr., and Henry O. Docker, to wit, Thomas S. Ridgway, executor, and Harriet Peeples, executrix, of the estate of John McKee Peeples, deceased, and Thomas S. Ridgway, Robert Reid, and David Reid, took an appeal to the appellate court. The appellate court reversed the decree of the circuit court, and dismissed the bill as to the appellants there, who are the appellees here, to wit, the executor and the executrix of the estate of John McKee Peeples, deceased, and Ridgway and the Reids. The present appeal is prosecuted from the judgment of the appellate court, by John F. McCartney, trustee, Ellen P. Peeples, and Mary P. Docker.

The estate of Orval Pool is alleged in the bill to have been worth, at the time of his death, about $400,000. By his will he devised lands worth about $9,041.23 to his daughters Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples, for life, with remainder over to their children, and gave all the rest of his estate, real and personal, to his son, M. M. Pool, and his daughter Mrs. Townshend. Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples claimed that the will was void, and demanded from the two other devisees enough of the estate to equalize the shares of the four. M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend insisted that the will was valid, but proposed a settlement, and the following agreement, dated November 2, 1871, was entered into, to wit:

It is agreed between the parties hereto that the estate of Orval Pool, deceased, shall be divided upon the following basis, to wit:

(1) Equal division as near as may be of the entire estate, real and personal, of which Orval Pool died seised and possessed, between the four children of said Orval Pool, to wit, Marshall M. Pool, Augusta M. Pool Townshend, Mary Pool Docker, and Ellen Pool Peeples. The shares of the said Mary and Ellen shall be limited to them during their lifetime, and at their decease to descend to their children or descendants of children; and in case of the death of said Mary or Ellen, or both, so dying without children or descendants of children, then the share of said Mary and Ellen, or both, so dying without children or descendants of children, shall go in equal shares to the children of said Orval Pool, deceased, and their heirs. The lands and personalty heretofore devised to the said Mary and Ellen by the will of Orval Pool, deceased, are to be taken into consideration in equalizing the division of said estate, and the same to be deducted from the shares of said Mary and Ellen.

(2) The interest of the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples in the moneys, personal property, and proceeds of real estate that may be converted into money, as hereinafter provided, shall within a reasonable time, by a proper and suitable conveyance or conveyances, be conveyed and transferred to some suitable and responsible trustee, whose duty it shall be to keep the principle invested in United States interest-bearing bonds, or in some other profitable manner, and pay semi-annually the accumulations and interest thereon to the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, or their order, respectively, during their natural lives, the principal to be kept intact and paid to their children or descendants of children, as hereinbefore provided, subject to the reversion aforesaid. A trustee shall be chosen by the parties to this agreement, whose duty it shall be to carry out and execute the trust hereby created, and shall enter into a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the judge of the circuit court of Gallatin county, for the faithful performance of his duty as such trustee. Said bond shall be made payable to the parties to this agreement for the use of all parties interested in the provisions of this agreement; and, if the parties hereto cannot agree upon the person who shall act as such trustee, then the said judge of said Gallatin circuit court shall appoint said trustee; and the said appointment and the approval of said bond may be made by him either in vacation or term time, as may be most convenient.

(3) Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend shall retain thirteen hundred and ten (1,310) of the stock of the Gallatin National Bank, and four hundred (400) shares of the said stock shall be conveyed to the trustee, aforesaid, for the use of the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, subject to the limitations and conditions aforesaid; the interest of the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples in said bank stock to be equalized with the interest of the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend in said stock, as hereinafter provided.

(4) The trustee herein provided for shall have power, and it is made his duty, to sell and convert into money, as soon as the same can be conveniently done without sacrifice, so much of said lands and real estate, except the homestead, with the lands adjoining thereto, and real estate in Shawneetown, as may be necessary to equalize the interest of the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples with the interest of the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend in the shares of said bank stock, which said sum of money so to be first raised shall be invested, and the interest thereon paid over, in the manner and upon the conditions and subject to the limitations as hereinbefore provided; and provided, further, if the proceeds of the sale of said lands shall not be sufficient to equalize the interest aforesaid in said bank stock, then the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend are to pay the deficit in money to the said trustee for the use of the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, to be invested by him under the conditions and limitations aforesaid; and provided, further, that, until said real estate shall be converted by said trustee for the purpose above mentioned, it shall be the duty of said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend to account for and pay over to said trustee one half of the net rents and profits of the above-mentioned real estate, for the use of Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples; and provided, further, that the said Marshall M. Pool and his wife and the said Augusta M. Pool Townshend and her husband shall, on the request of the said trustee, or any purchaser from him, join with the said trustee in all necessary deeds and conveyances for the purpose of fully and completely assuring the title to the lands to be sold by him as aforesaid; and provided, further, that, after the interest of the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples in the bank stocks shall be made equal as above provided, the residue of said lands shall be held by the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend, subject to the following trusts, to wit: To pay to the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, respectively, one fourth of the net rents, issues, and profits thereof, until the same shall be conveyed by them to the trustee, as herein next provided; secondly, to convey one undivided half thereof, whenever requested by the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, to the trustee hereinbefore provided for, who shall hold the same for their use during their lives as aforesaid; provided that whenever said lands, or any portion of them, shall become unprofitable, or the value thereof can be more profitably invested, it shall become the duty of said trustee, upon the request of the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, to convert the same into money and invest the proceeds as hereinbefore provided; and provided, further, the words 'residue of said lands,' as last above used, shall be held and understood to include the said home farm or homestead, together with the farms and lands adjoining the same, as well, also, as the lots and real estate in said city of Shawneetown, excepted in the first part of this paragraph. It is further understood and provided that said trustee, for the purpose of equalizing the interest of the parties in the shares of the bank stock as hereinbefore provided, may sell and dispose of the lands and real estate subject to sale and disposition for that purpose, either at public or private sale, either for cash in hand or upon a credit, as he may deem best; provided that, in case of public sale, a notice of the time, place, and terms of sale shall be published in one or more weekly newspapers published in the county where the lands offered for sale lie, at least four weeks next before the time of such sale, with a like notice posted upon the court-house door and three other of the most public places in the county where the sale is had and lands lie; provided that the failure to post up the last-mentioned notices shall not vitiate any sale made by said trustee when the same shall have been advertised in some newspaper or newspapers, as above provided.

(5) And provided, further, that should there be no such newspapers or newspaper in the county where said lands or any part thereof may lie and where it is sought to sell the same, then it shall be sufficient as to such lands to post up written or printed notices as above provided; and provided, further, that all public sales shall be at the court-house door, and no lands shall be sold outside of the county in which the same shall lie; and provided, further, that, in case of sale upon time, a longer credit shall not be given in any case than one year, unless by and with the written consent of all the parties to this agreement, and the purchaser in every such sale shall give a note, with one or more solvent sureties thereto, for the amount of the unpaid purchase money, together with a mortgage on the premises to secure prompt payment of said note and all interest thereon. The note in all such cases shall be made to bear interest from date, at the rate of 10 per cent per annum until paid; provided that, when the purchaser at any such sale shall pay as much as one third of the purchase money in hand, then no personal security shall be required, unless the said trustee for good reasons shall think proper to do so; and provided, further, that said trustee shall make no private sale under the authority above granted until he shall have first obtained the written consent of said Marshall M. Pool, Augusta M. Pool Townshend, Mary Pool Docker, and Ellen Pool Peeples. And it shall be the duty of said trustee in all cases of public sale to furnish within a reasonable time before said sale, to each of the parties hereto, a copy of the notice thereof; provided the failure to furnish a copy of such notice shall not vitiate the title of any purchaser at such sale.

(6) A committee of three persons is hereby constituted, whose duty it shall be to fix and determine the cash value of the lands and real estate bequeathed to the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples by the said Orval Pool, deceased; and the amount, when so ascertained, shall be charged to them respectively by way of equalizing their interest with that of the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend in the shares in the bank stock aforesaid. In the event that the parties hereto cannot agree among themselves as to who shall constitute said committee, then the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend shall select one of the said committee, and the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples shall select another, and the two so chosen shall select the third; and said committee before proceeding to the discharge of their duties, shall take and subscribe an oath, to be administered by some person authorized by law to administer oaths, to the effect that they will, to the best of their ability, skill, and understanding, faithfully, fairly, and without favor or partiality, ascertain, fix, and report the cash value of the lands in question, and, for this purpose, that they will use all practicable and reasonable means within their power to arrive at a true and correct conclusion in fixing the value of said lands; said committee to ascertain and report the value of said lands as soon as practicable.

(7) And the undersigned Madeline Pool, widow of the said Orval Pool, deceased, in consideration of the promises, covenants, and agreements by the other parties to this agreement, and the conditions, provisos, and provisions herein contained, hereby waives, releases, and absolutely renounces all right, title, and interest that she may in any wise have in the real or personal estate of Orval Pool, her late husband, as his widow, devisee, or otherwise, and hereby accepts, in lieu thereof, the provisions made for her in this agreement; this concession on her part being made in the spirit of love and affection for her children, and with a sole view of securing good feeling and harmony between them, and promoting their common welfare and happiness.

(8) In consideration of the renunciation by the said Madeline Pool of her entire interest in the estate of the said Orval Pool, deceased, it is hereby agreed and expressly stipulated by all the other parties to this instrument that she shall have and hold, during her natural life, the house now occupied by her, and the twenty (20) acres of land upon which it is situated, together with the garden, orchard, and outhouses, and all the conveniences, improvements, and appurtenances thereon, being the same messuage and premises given to her by the will of the said Orval Pool, deceased; provided, however, that if, at any time, she, the said Madeline Pool, should desire to abandon the above-mentioned premises, and acquire a new residence in the city of Shawneetown, then a suitable lot of ground shall be procured in said city of Shawneetown, and a dwelling house, with necessary fencing and outhouses, shall be erected thereon, equal in value, convenience, architecture, workmanship, and finish to the house and premises above-mentioned; and, in the plan and construction of the same, her wishes and tastes shall in all things be respected and observed, and the cost of said lot of ground, dwelling house, and other improvements made thereon shall be equally borne by her four children, Mary Pool Docker, Marshall M. Pool, Augusta M. Pool Townshend, and Ellen Pool Peeples, which said lot of ground and buildings thereon, when so provided for her by the children as aforesaid, shall be held by her in lieu of her homestead and ground now occupied by her, for and during her natural life; and a suitable and apt conveyance shall be made to her, limiting the same to her for life, with remainder in fee to said trustee, in trust to convey one undivided fourth part thereof absolutely upon her death to the said Marshall M. Pool and his heirs, and another one-fourth part thereof to the said Augusta M. Pool Townshend and her heirs, and upon the further trust to sell and convert the other undivided half of said lot and premises into money when requested by the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, and invest the proceeds thereof in manner, upon the conditions, and subject to the limitations hereinbefore provided; and, until such sale by said trustee, it shall be the duty of said trustee to pay over to the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, in equal parts, the rents, issues, and profits of said undivided half of said lot and premises.

(9) And the said Mary Pool Docker and the said Ellen Pool Peeples, for the consideration last aforesaid, hereby jointly and severally covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said Madeline Pool to pay to her as a personal annuity, at her residence, the sum of $1,000 semi annually, for and during her natural life; the first payment to be made on the 1st day of December, 1871, the second payment to be made on the 1st day of June, 1872, and so on, every six months, for and during her natural life.

(10) And the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend, for the consideration last aforesaid, hereby jointly and severally covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said Madeline Pool to pay her semi-annually as a personal annuity, at her residence, the sum of $1,000 for and during her natural life; the first payment to be made on the 1st day of December, 1871, and the second on the 1st day of June, 1872, and so on every six months thereafter, for and during her natural life, as aforesaid.

(11) And it is hereby expressly provided that if the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, on the one hand, or the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend, on the other, shall at any time fail to pay the annuities above mentioned at the time and place above provided, or if the said Madeline Pool shall at any time hereafter, for good cause, become alarmed or apprehensive about the solvency of the above-mentioned parties, or either of them, and the ultimate payment of said annuities, or either of them, then it shall be the duty of the said parties about whom and whose annuity such apprehension exists, upon notice thereof, and upon request of the said Madeline Pool, to make and file with the circuit clerk of Gallatin county, Illinois, a good and sufficient bond, payable to the said Madeline Pool, to be examined and approved by the circuit judge of said court, from time to time, in like manner as official bonds are now by law required to be approved, to secure the punctual and faithful payment of said annuity; and if the said parties shall fail to execute and file the same, and give additional security whenever the said judge of said court shall require the same to be done, then it shall be lawful, and the circuit court of Gallatin county is hereby authorized, upon the application of said Madeline Pool, to enter a decree against such defaulting party or parties, requiring them to pay said annuity as herein provided, which decree shall be made a lien by said court upon the entire estate, both real or personal, of the party or parties being in default as aforesaid, and shall provide for the payment and satisfaction of said decree by execution, as in other cases.

(12) And Richard W. Townshend, husband of Augusta M. Pool Townshend, and Henry O. Docker, husband of Mary Pool Docker, and John M. Peeples, jr., husband of Ellen Pool Peeples, each covenants with the parties hereto for the true and faithful performance of all the stipulations contained in this agreement of their respective wives.

Witness our hands and seals, this 2d day of November, 1871.

The parties being unable to agree upon a trustee, the judge of the circuit court of Gallatin county, on December 26, 1871, appointed the said George H. Potter as such trustee. On the same day, to wit, December 26, 1871, Potter gave a bond in the penal sum of $400,000, the terms and phraseology of which were substantially the same as those of the bond hereinafter set out; but the bond of December, 1871, was defective in certain respects, not necessary to be mentioned here. Pool v. Potter, 63 Ill. 533. Potter thereupon entered upon the duties of the trust, and continued to act as trustee until his death. Afterwards, on account of the defects in the first bond, he executed a new bond, dated May 15, 1872, which was accepted and approved by the judge of the circuit court of Gallatin county, and which is in the following words and figures, to wit:

Know all men by these presents, that we, George H. Potter, as principal, and Robert Reid, David Reid, John M. Peeples, jr., Henry O. Decker, J. McKee Peeples, and Thomas S. Ridgway, are held and firmly bonded unto Mary Pool Docker, Henry O. Docker, Marshall M. Pool, Richard W. Townshend, Augusta M. Pool Townshend, John M. Peeples, jr., Ellen Pool Peeples, and Madeline Pool, for the use of all persons who may now and [or] hereafter have any rights or interests arising under or growing out of a certain instrument in writing hereinafter mentioned, in the penal sum or $400,000, for the payment of which well and truly to be made we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly, severally, and firmly, by these presents.

Sealed with our seals, and dated the 15th day of May, A. D. 1872.

The condition of the above obligation is such that whereas, the above-mentioned obligees did, on the 2d day of November A. D. 1871, execute and deliver in duplicate, under their respective hands and seals, a certain instrument in writing, providing for a division of the estate, both real and personal, of Orval Pool, deceased, and the appointment of a trustee to execute and carry into effect certain duties therein created and defined; and whereas the above-named George H. Potter has been duly appointed trustee, under the provisions of said instrument in writing. Now, if the said George A. Potter shall faithfully and efficiently discharge said trust, and in good faith do and perform all such duties as may be now or hereafter imposed upon him by, or otherwise arise under, said instrument in writing, and growing out of the trust therein created, and shall also well and truly account for, and pay over to the party or parties entitled thereto all moneys and property which may come into his hands as such trustee, at such times and in such manner as is provided for in said instrument, and finally, when the objects of said trust shall have been accomplished, make all such transfers and conveyances of the trust property, and account for and pay over all moneys and effects, that may be in his possession or under his control, or for which he is in any manner liable as such trustee, to those then entitled thereto under said instrument, then this obligation to be void; otherwise, to remain in full force and effect. The word "dollars," in line 14, page 1, interlined before signing.

Subsequently, on November 19, 1872, the parties signing the first agreement of November 2, 1871, and George H. Potter, the trustee, executed a new agreement, which is in the words and figures following, to wit:

This memorandum of an agreement made and entered into by and between the parties hereto, this 19th day of November, 1872, witnesseth and provides as follows:

(1) This agreement is made for the express purpose of carrying into effect, and supplementary to, a certain other agreement and indenture, bearing date the 2d day of November, 1871, and duly signed by Madeline Pool, Mary P. Docker, Henry O. Docker, Augusta M. P. Townshend, Richard W. Townshend, Ellen P. Peeples, John M. Peeples, jr., and Marshall M. Pool, and is not intended and is not to be construed as conflicting with said last-mentioned agreement.

(2) Inasmuch as some of the parties hereto are of the opinion that a postponement of the sale of the lands belonging to the estate of Orval Pool, deceased, by the trustee, at public auction, as provided for under said last-mentioned agreement, would subserve the best interest of all persons having any right to or in said lands or the proceeds thereof, it is therefore agreed and hereby expressly provided that there shall be no such public sale of any of said lands for a period of one year from this date, without the written consent of all the parties hereto.

(3) The trustee provided for in the agreement and indenture hereinbefore referred to may sell at private sale any and all of the lands and town lots belonging to said estate, except the homestead and farm adjoining thereto, at the best prices that can be obtained for the same, with the written consent of the parties hereto, and not otherwise.

(4) The said Marshall M. Pool, Mary P. Docker, Augusta M. P. Townshend, Ellen P. Peeples, and their respective husbands hereby agree to give whatever aid they may be able to secure the best prices that can be obtained for said lands and town lots to be sold by the trustee as herein provided.

(5) That the said trustee is to perform only such services in procuring and completing said sales as the parties hereto may deem necessary.

(6) All suits or motions now pending against the executors of said estate, or between the parties hereto, in the supreme or any other court, at the suits of any of the parties hereto, are to be dismissed without damages; and the costs and expenses attending the case now in the supreme court, including attorneys' fees on both sides, are to be borne by and paid out of the funds belonging to said estate.

(7) It is also agreed and hereby provided that the said Marshall M. Pool, Augusta M. P. Townshend, and her husband, Richard W. Townshend, shall respectively pay to said trustee, for the use of those entitled under said agreement, interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on whatever excess of their shares of the personal estate, at the time so receiving them, they may have respectively received, exclusive of said bank stock, from the date they so received this sum.

(8) That the said Marshall M. Pool, Augusta M. P. Townshend, and Richard W. Townshend, her husband, are not to be held liable for any rents which have heretofore accrued, except such as have actually came into their hands; but hereafter they shall be liable for the rents which they receive or might receive by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence.

(9) The taxes of 1871 are to be paid by the executors, and all thereafter, until the difference in the bank stock is equalized, are to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of lands by the trustee.

(10) The value of each share of $100 of said bank stock is hereby fixed at $111, being the estimated value of said stock on the 2d day of November, 1871; and until the shares of said bank stock are equalized, as provided for in said original agreement, the parties hereto who have received an excess of said bank stock, after deducting the value of the lands willed respectively to Mary Pool Decker and Ellen Pool Peeples, as provided for under said original agreement, so as to be equalized, shall, respectively, pay semiannually to said trustee, for the use of those entitled thereto under said original agreement interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, the interest to be computed from the 2d day of November, 1871, and be paid as above provided, until said bank stock is equalized as aforesaid.

(11) That inasmuch as it is apprehended by some of the parties hereto that some of the lands inventoried by the executors of said estate, and valued by the appraisers under said original agreement as land having been willed respectively to Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, did not belong to said Orval Pool at the time of his death, and hence no title passed by his will to some of his lands to said devisees, and whereas the entire value of all of said lands supposed to have passed by said will to the said Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples, including those the title to which is apprehended to be bad as well as those believed to be good, is for the present to be deducted from the excess of the estimated value of the bank stock, it is therefore hereby expressly provided that the said Marshall M. Pool, Augusta M. Pool Townshend, and Richard W. Townshend shall refund and pay to the said trustee, for the use of those entitled under said original agreement, the estimated value of all such lands as have been taken by them, respectively, to which the said Orval Pool did not at the time of his death have a good title, or which have not now become good since his death, or which cannot be made good by resorting to a court of equity, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, to be computed with half-yearly rests from the 2d day of November, 1871; and it is hereby further provided that all costs and expenses incurred in perfecting or attempting to perfect, the title to any of said lands under the provisions of this article, are to be equally borne by the children of said Orval Pool, deceased, or paid out of funds belonging to said estate.

(12) The parties hereto hereby pledge themselves each to the other, and hereby expressly bind themselves, that they will in good faith do all reasonably within their power to effect a final settlement between the said executors and said estate during the November term, 1872, of the county court. And it is hereby further agreed that, when such final settlement is had, there shall be an equal division of the moneys and effects, exclusive of said bank stock, between the parties entitled thereto, as provided for under and in said original agreement, and the interest to be paid to those entitled as provided for under this agreement. And it is hereby expressly understood and agreed that if from any cause, without the fault of said trustee, or the said Mary Pool Docker, Ellen Pool Peeples, their respective agents and attorneys, said executors should refuse, neglect, or be unable to make a final settlement as herein contemplated, then the said Marshall M. Pool, Augusta M. P. Townshend, and the said Richard W. Townshend, on behalf of his said wife, hereby covenant and agree to pay to said trustee, under said original agreement, whatever they have received of said moneys and personal estate, as shown by the report of the said executors approved at the September term, 1872, of the county court, in excess of their respective shares of said moneys and personal estate actually recovered by them, as shown by said last-mentioned report, exclusive of said bank stock, together with interest thereon, as hereinbefore provided, and the same, when so paid over to said trustee, to be held by him for the use of those entitled under said original agreement; provided that if there shall be a final settlement as contemplated at said November term of said county court, by said executors, and there is a complete division of said personal estate, as herein before provided, then and in that case the said trustee is to receive, as part payment of said moneys and personal estate coming to him as trustee, such good notes, with accrued interest thereon, as may be in the hands of said executors and belonging to said estate.

(13) That by computation upon the basis fixed by article 10 hereof the total value of the bank stock on the said 2d day of November, 1871, received by the said Marshall M. Pool and Augusta M. Pool Townshend in excess of the amount of said bank stock received by the said Mary P. Docker and Ellen P. Peeples, is found to be, and is hereby fixed at, $———. And whereas the parties hereto are desirous that the same shall be liquidated at as early a day as practicable, it is therefore hereby provided and made the duty of said trustee, at the date of each sale of lands made by him, under the provisions of this agreement and the original agreement to which this is a supplement, to credit the above mentioned indebtedness by one half of the proceeds of such sale, and retain the other half of said proceeds as such trustee, for the use of those entitled thereto, under the provisions of said original agreement. The provisions of this article, however, are not to be construed as extending to so much of said proceeds of sales as may be required to be paid out for other purposes specified in this agreement, or to so much of said proceeds as are required to defray such expenses as are necessarily incurred in the execution of this trust.

(14) And it is hereby further provided that said trustee shall provide himself with a well-bound book, in which he shall record the particulars of every sale made by him as such trustee, in which such record, so to be made out and kept by said trustee, must appear the time of each sale, a description of the tract of land or lot sold, the amount for which it sold, the name of the purchaser, the terms of sale, what portion of the proceeds have been applied towards liquidating the indebtedness mentioned in article 13 hereof, and what portion kept by him in trust for those entitled under said original agreement, and what portion, if any, retained by him for defraying the necessary expenses of this trust, which book so to be procured and kept by said trustee shall be open to inspection at all reasonable hours to the parties hereto, their agents and attorneys.

(15) And the said trustee hereby agrees, and it is made his duty, to carry into effect and consummate any and every proposed sale and transfer of land or lots, under the provisions of this agreement, whenever the parties hereto shall, in writing, request him to do so.

November 19, 1872.

After the execution of the second bond and the second agreement, controversies arose from time to time between the parties thereto. Some of these controversies may be understood by reference to the following cases: Pool v. Potter, 63 Ill. 533; Potter v. Peeples, 92 Ill. 430; Pool v. Docker, Id. 501.

Mr. John H. Mulkey, with Mr. Frank A. Johnson, for appellants:

By the contract of November 2, 1871, an equitable estate for life in one fourth of the estate, real and personal, of Orval Pool, immediately upon its execution, passed to Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples, respectively, and an equitable vested estate in remainder immediately passed to the children of Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples, respectively, then living, subject only to be opened to let in afterborn children to shares.

Lane, 21 Ill. 194; Beasley v. Webster, 64 Ill. 458; Steele v. Clark, 77 Ill. 471.

The contract of 1871 operated to convey to the children of Mary and Ellen an equitable vested estate in remainder subject only to be opened to let in afterborn children.

A vested remainder is where the estate is fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate is spent or comes to an end.

Nicoll v. Scott, 99 Ill. 540.

A remainder is never held to be contingent when, consistently with the intention, it can be held to be vested; and an estate once vested will not be devested unless the intent to devest clearly appears.

In the bonds signed by the appellees as sureties they recite and acknowledge in writing that by the agreement of 1871, therein referred to, a trust was "therein created."

They are now estopped from making a claim that it was simply an agreement to create a trust at some future time.

2 Brandt, Suretyship, §§ 42–46.

The agreement of 1871 was not executory.

There are no special equities in favor of sureties. They are not wards of chancery, in whose favor most refined technical objections are to be seized upon and the evident intention of parties to an instrument, as evidenced by the instrument itself and their own construction of it, is to be disregarded and well-settled principles of law avoided.

Messrs. John H. Mulkey, Charles F. Beach, and S. P. Shope, in support of petition for rehearing:

The agreement of November 2, 1871, by which the trust estate was created, was, so far as it operated to create estates in Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples and their children, obviously intended as a mere enlargement of the estates theretofore devised to them by the will of Orval Pool.

A construction of a written instrument by the parties themselves, although it has not the force of a judicial decision, is of great weight, and should not be lightly disregarded by the court.

Vermont Street Church v. Brose, 104 Ill. 206.

The estates secured by the agreement of November 2, 1871, to Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples were, like the estates devised to them by the will of Orval Pool, life estates, with vested remainders in their children.

Pool v. Docker, supra.

The language of the contract itself, in creating the estate in favor of Mary and Ellen and their children, is under the decision of this court amply sufficient to support a vested remainder.

The supplementary agreement of November 19, 1872, was obviously a compromise of quarrels and dissensions that had arisen between the parties over the details of the administration of the trust, and was in no wise intended and did in no wise operate as an essential or substantial modification or change in the trust agreement of November 2, 1871, and did not therefore operate to release the sureties upon the bond of May 15, 1872.

Pool v. Docker, 92 Ill. 501.

Messrs. Oliver & Showalter for appellees.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The original bill herein filed by one of the owners of the estate in remainder, and the cross bill filed by the life tenants and the present trustee, seek to charge the administrator of the deceased trustee and the sureties on his bond with what is alleged to be due upon accounting from the estate of said deceased trustee. The only defendants below who appealed from the decree of the circuit court were the sureties upon said bond. The bill here is not a bill to enforce either of the agreements set forth in the record; nor is this a controversy between the parties to those agreements as to the proper construction to be given to either of them. The real dispute is between the remaindermen and the life tenants on one side, and the sureties upon the bond of the deceased trustee on the other side, as to whether such sureties should be held liable for what may be due from said trustee or his estate. The question is whether the trustee, who was the principal in the bond, and the parties to the agreement the performance of which was secured by the bond, entered into any agreement which so changed the duties and obligations of the trustee, or the terms of the trust imposed upon him, as to release the sureties from their liability upon the bond.

The bond which was executed on May 15, 1871, recites that the obligees therein, to wit, the widow and son and three daughters of Orval Pool, and the husbands of said daughters, did, on November 2, 1871, execute a certain instrument in writing, providing for a division of the estate of said Orval and the appointment of a trustee to execute and carry into effect certain duties and trusts therein created and defined, and that George H. Potter had been duly appointed trustee under the provisions of said instrument in writing. The condition of the bond is that Potter shall discharge the trust imposed by the agreement of November 2, 1871, and perform such duties "as may be now or hereafter imposed upon him by, or otherwise arise" under, said last named agreement, and pay over and account for all moneys and property coming to his hands as such trustee, "at such times and in such manner as is provided for" in said agreement of 1871. After the execution of the bond of May 15, 1871, to wit, on November 19, 1872, the same parties who signed the agreement of November 2, 1871, to wit, the widow and son and daughters of Orval Pool, and the husbands of the latter, together with Potter, the trustee, executed a new agreement. Thereafter Potter performed his duties as trustee, and managed the interests of the trust, under and in accordance wtih the provisions of the new agreement of November, 1872, or, if not wholly under the latter agreement, certainly under the latter agreement in connection with the agreement of November, 1871.

Inasmuch as the obligations of the bond were based upon the agreement of 1871, it becomes important to inquire whether the new agreement of 1872 produced such changes in the duties and obligations of the trustee, or in the terms and conditions of the trust as fixed by the agreement of 1871, that the sureties can be said to have been released from their liability on the bond. Whether or not such a change was wrought can only be determined by a comparison of the terms and conditions of the one agreement with those of the other. A preliminary question, however, arises as to the nature of the interests of the remaindermen mentioned in the agreement of 1871 thereunder, and whether the parties executing the agreement of 1872 had any power to change the agreement of 1871 so far as the latter agreement had reference to the children of Mary Pool Docker and Ellen Pool Peeples. The shares of said Mary and Ellen were to be limited to them during their lifetime, and at their decease to descend to their children, etc. The children or remaindermen did not sign either contract. It is not denied that the widow and son and daughters and sons-in-law of Orval Pool, who signed the agreement of 1871, had the power to change it by a subsequent agreement so far as it affected themselves or their own interests; but it is claimed on the part of the appellants that the parties so signing the agreement of 1871 could not change it so as to affect the interests of the remaindermen, and that, this being so, there was no change wrought by the agreement of 1872, which could release the liability of the sureties to the remaindermen As a reason for the contention that the later contract did not change the earlier one so far as the interests of the remaindermen are concerned, it is urged that, by the contract of 1871, the children of Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples were equitable owners of one half of the estate, subject to the life estates of their mothers, and had the right to have the trust created exactly as proposed in the contract of 1871, and to have the trustee's liability to them measured by that contract.

On the part of the appellees it is claimed that the agreement of 1871 created an incomplete voluntary trust, and that, therefore, it was within the power of the signers of the agreement to change it by a subsequent one. A court of equity will not aid a mere volunteer to carry into effect an imperfect gift or an executory trust; but where a voluntary trust, upon a meritorious consideration, has been perfectly created, it is irrevocable, and may be enforced in equity. Whether a trust has been perfectly created is largely a question of fact in each case. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 11, 12; Perry, Tr. § 99. Hence it may be well to examine the terms of the agreement of 1871 with reference to the question whether it provides for an executed or an executory trust.

The will of Orval Pool, having devised certain lands worth about $9,041.33, to his daughters Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples, for life, with remainder over to their children, vested the title to these lands in remainder in said children; and of course their interests in remainder therein could not be, and were not, affected by the agreements of 1871 and 1872, to which they were not parties. All the rest of the property having been devised to M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend, the title thereto was held by them when the agreement of 1871 was made. That agreement makes no declaration that M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend hold such title for the benefit of their sisters, or of the children of their sisters, nor does it transfer or convey any of the property of the estate to a trustee for their benefit. It is executory in its character. Pool v. Docker, 92 Ill. 501. It names no trustee, but provides for the selection of one by the parties, and in case of their failure to select for the appointment of a trustee by a judge of the circuit court of Gallatin county. It further provides that the interest of Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples "in moneys, personal property, and proceeds of real estate that may be converted into money," as therein directed, "shall within a reasonable time, by a proper and suitable conveyance or conveyances, be conveyed and transferred to" the trustee so to be appointed. Nothing is presently conveyed to the trustee, but thereafter, in the future, moneys, personal property, and not real estate, but the proceeds of real estate, to be converted into money, are to be conveyed to the trustee. While it is true that there is a good and valuable consideration for the agreement of 1871, as between the parties who signed it, so that it could be enforced in equity as between them, yet no consideration for that agreement moved from the children of Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples. The provision therein made for them was consequently a gift, and not a present gift, but a gift which the parties agreed among themthemselves should be made thereafter. So far as the land was concerned, the trust was indefinite and uncertain; and not only so, but it was incomplete, because it was impossible to tell, when the agreement of 1871 was made, what lands would go into the trust estate. The agreement shows that the estate of Orval Pool owned 1,710 shares of bank stock, shown by the evidence to be worth $189,810, or $111 per share; that M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend were to retain 1,310 shares, or $145,410, and 400 shares, or $44,400, were to be conveyed to the trustee for the use of Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples, the income to be paid to them, and the principal to be kept for their children; and that the trustee was to sell and convert into money so much of the lands as might be necessary to equalize the interest of Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples with the interest of M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend in the shares of said bank stock. M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend were to join the trustee in executing the deeds to the purchasers of the lands. When sales enough should be made to raise the amount necessary to equalize the interests in the bank stock, M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend were to convey the residue of such lands to the trustee whenever requested by Mrs Docker and Mrs Peeples; and the trustee was to hold them, or to sell them and invest the proceeds as provided in the agreement. The agreement provides for no conveyance to the trustee of the lands to be sold. The title remained in M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend until sales enough were effected to accomplish the equalization; and the trustee was a mere agent to make the sales. Pool v. Potter, 63 Ill. 533.

It is manifest that, by the terms of the agreement of 1871, the children or remaindermen were mere volunteers. The principle is well settled that a court of equity will not lend its aid to establish a trust at the instance of mere volunteers. If the transaction on which the voluntary trust is attempted to be established is still executory or incomplete, the court will decline all interference in the matter. Where there is only a voluntary agreement for the creation of a trust, a court of equity will not regard the agreement as binding so long as it remains executory. An executory trust is one which is not fully and finally declared, but requires some other act or acts in order to perfect it and carry out the intention of the settlor; while an executed trust is one fully and finally declared by the person creating it, so that nothing further remains to be done in order to make it effective. Clarke v. Lott, 11 Ill. 105; Badgley v. Votrain, 68 Ill. 25, 18 Am. Rep. 541; Padfield v. Padfield, 68 Ill. 210; Barnum v. Reed, 136 Ill. 388; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 11.

Before an executed and fully-created trust could arise, under the agreement of 1871, in favor of the children of Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples, it was necessary that there should be transferred or conveyed to a trustee, to be thereafter appointed, money and personal property, and the proceeds of sales of land thereafter to be made. To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, possession and title must pass to and vest in the donee, or in a trustee for the donee. If anything remains to be done to complete the gift, what so remains to be done cannot be enforced, as it is based upon no consideration; and, when the gift is thus incomplete, there is a locus penitentiæ, and the gift may be revoked. Where the alleged gift is of a legal estate capable of legal conveyance and no conveyance is made, the gift is revocable. Barnum v. Reed, supra; Wadhams v. Gay, 73 Ill. 415; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 1313–1318; Telford v. Patton, 144 Ill. 611. A gift inter vivos cannot be made to take effect in possession in futuro; nor will equity interpose to perfect a defective gift or voluntary settlement made without consideration; nor can equity convert an imperfect gift into a declaration of trust merely on account of that imperfection. Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 422. In order to render a voluntary settlement valid and effectual, the settlor must have done everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, it was necessary to do in order to transfer the property and make the settlement binding upon him; and such a settlement may be effectual by transferring the property to the persons for whom he intends to provide, or by transferring it to a trustee for the purpose of the settlement, or by declaring that he himself holds it in trust for those purposes. If it is intended to effectuate the settlement by one of these modes, the court will not give effect to it by applying another of them. If it is intended that the settlement shall take effect by transfer, the court will not hold the intended transfer to operate as a declaration of trust, because it would thereby convert an imperfect instrument into a perfect trust. Where the instrument contemplates that there shall be a transfer of the property to the trustee, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust does not arise until such transfer is made. Until then the person for whose benefit the voluntary settlement is made takes no estate in the property, and cannot enforce the agreement to make the gift, or compel the alienation to the trustee. Before the alienation to the trustee the gift is an imperfect one, and a court of equity will not interfere to complete it. Milroy v. Lord, 4 De G. F. &. J. 264; Bridge v. Bridge, 16 Beav. 315; Beech v. Keep, 18 Beav. 285; Colyear v. Countess Mulgrave, 2 Keen, 82; 1 Vaizey, Settlements of Property, pp. 93, 140, 143, 145; Jefferys v. Jefferys, Craig & Ph. 138; Re D'Angibau, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 228.

Now, the evident purpose of the agreement of 1871 was that the interest which was to go to the children should be settled upon them by a transfer of the property to a trustee, who was to hold it upon trust. A transfer to a trustee was that particular one of the three modes above specified by which, under the agreement of 1871, the settlement upon the children was to be made effectual. It cannot be held, therefore, that it can be made effectual by construing the agreement as amounting to a declaration of trust by the signers of it. A complete voluntary trust is clearly distinguishable from a voluntary contract to create a trust. We do not think that it was the intention of M. M. Pool and Mrs. Townshend to constitute themselves trustees of the fund to be settled upon the remaindermen. Their intention was that the trust should be vested in the trustee to be thereafter selected, either by the parties or by a judge. Until the property was transferred to such trustee, the instrument, so far as the children were concerned, was an imperfect gift or voluntary settlement, without consideration, which the beneficiaries themselves, being mere volunteers, could not enforce against the settlors or signers of the agreement, and which the latter were at libery to revoke or change. "When two persons, for valuable consideration, between themselves, covenant to do some act for the benefit of a mere stranger, that stranger has not a right to enforce the covenant against the two, although each one might as against the other." 1 Vaizey, Settlements of Property, p. 143. "Where the obligation to do what ought to be done is not an absolute duty, but only an obligation arising from contract, that which ought to be done is only treated as done in favor of some person entitled to enforce the contract against the person liable to perform it." Id. p. 145. Here any one of the signers of the agreement of 1871 could insist on the proposed transfer of the property to the trustee in order to make the proposed gift, but no right vested in the proposed remaindermen until such transfer was made. Whenever any part of the property was conveyed to the trustee an equitable estate in remainder therein vested in the children, and as to that the power of the settlors to make a change by contract was gone. As to property not conveyed to the trustee the parties were at liberty to make a new contract.

There is some proof tending to show that the 400 shares of bank stock above mentioned were delivered to the trustees before the execution of the agreement of November 19, 1872. It does not appear, however, that there was an actual transfer of the stock upon the books of the bank prior to that time. In Milroy v. Lord, supra, it was held that where bank shares were transferable only by entry in the books of the bank, and no such transfer was made to the trustee in a voluntary settlement like that here under consideration, the gift remained uncompleted and imperfect. But, even if it be conceded that 400 shares came to the hands of the trustee by a proper transfer before the second agreement was made, we understand that no loss was sustained as to this stock, and that no default in relation thereto is embraced in the amount found against the sureties by the decree below.

We cannot subscribe to the theory that the agreement of 1871 is to be regarded as creating the relation of vendor and vendee between the signers of that agreement, or some of them, and the proposed remaindermen, and that a relation of trust was thereby created, upon the theory that, in equity, the vendors are trustees of the land for the purchasers, and the vendees are trustees of the purchase money for the sellers. The doctrine thus invoked has no application here, for the reason, among other reasons, that a sale implies a consideration, whereas here there was no consideration as between either or any of the signers and the children.

It being established that the parties to the agreement of 1871 had the power to change it by a new agreement, both as to their own interest and as to the interests therein proposed to be vested, through a trustee, in the children of Mrs. Docker and Mrs. Peeples, the question again recurs whether the agreement of 1872 made such changes in that of 1871 as had the effect of releasing the sureties on the bond.

The undertaking of a surety is to receive a strict interpretation. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Higgins, 58 Ill. 128. He is not to be held beyond the precise terms of his contract. His liability is strictissimi juris, and cannot be extended by construction. Where the term of an officer is for a definite and fixed period, the surety is only liable for the faithful performance of his duties during that period. People v. Toomey, 122 Ill. 308. The extent of his liability must be embraced in the obligation or contract. Phillips v. Singer Mfg. Co. 88 Ill. 305. If a creditor, by a valid and binding agreement, without the assent of the surety, gives further time for payment to the principal, the surety is discharged both in law and equity, whether the surety is thereby actually damnified or not. Dodgson v. Henderson, 113 Ill. 360. Where a party gives a bond with sureties conditioned for his faithful performance of a written contract, the sureties will not be liable for the default of their principal to perform any duty or obligation arising out of a contract not fairly within the provisions of the written contract which the bond was given to secure. Burlington Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 120 Ill. 622. Sureties have a right to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which they will assume a responsibility, and no person has a right to change those terms. Ryan v. Shawneetown, 14 Ill. 22. It is a general rule that any agreement between the principal and the party secured, essentially varying the terms of the contract by which the surety is bound, without the consent of the surety, will release him from responsibility. 2 Brandt, Suretyship, § 378; Gardiner v. Harback, 21 Ill. 129; Trotter v. Strong, 63 Ill. 272; United States v. Corwine, 1 Bond, C. C. 339, Fed. Cas. No. 14,871. If the duties which the principal is to perform are varied by agreement between the principal and obligee after the surety for the conduct of the principal has become bound, such surety will generally be thereby discharged. Any dealings between the principal and obligee amounting to a departure from the contract by which the surety is bound, and materially varying or enlarging his liabilities without his consent, will generally operate to discharge him. The same result will follow, as a general thing, where the principal acts in another office or capacity from that designated in the contract of suretyship, or where his reponsibilities in the same office are increased. 2 Brandt, Suretyship, §§ 393, 397; People v. Seelye, 146 Ill. 189; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 759.

It is difficult to see how an application of these well settled principles to the facts of this case can lead to any other result than a discharge of the sureties upon Potter's bond.

By the agreement of 1871 it was made the duty of the trustee "to sell and convert into money, as soon as the same can be conveniently done without sacrifice, so much of said lands and real estate" as may be necessary to equalize the interests already mentioned, and to invest the money raised by such sales, and pay over the interest thereon, as therein directed, and subject to the conditions therein specified. He is thereby authorized to make such sales, either at public or private sale, or for cash or on credit, "as he may deem best," subject to certain provisions as to giving notice. In case of sales on time, no credit is to be given for a longer time than one year, except with the consent of the parties. Purchasers are to secure the purchase money by mortgages and notes drawing 10 per cent interest, and, where the cash payment is less than one third, the note is to have a surety. The trustee can make no private sale without the consent of M. M. Pool, Mrs. Townsend, Mrs. Docker, and Mrs. Peeples. From these provisions it is manifest that, by the agreement of 1871, the trustee could exercise a reasonable degree of discretion in the matter of making sales, both as to the time and mode of making them, and that the intention of the agreement was to make such sales as would equalize the interests, as rapidly as could be done without sacrifice. The agreement of 1872 provided that the trustee should make no public sale of any of the lands for a period of one year from November 19, 1872, without the written consent of the parties to the agreement of 1872; and that he should make no private sale at any time without the written consent of such parties; and that he should only perform such services in procuring and completing such sales as the parties thereto might deem necessary. By the second agreement, the time within which the trustee was required to make public sales was necessarily extended, and he was robbed substantially of all right to exercise any judgment or discretion about any of the sales. By the first agreement, he could make private sales, with the consent of the son and three daughters of the testator; by the second, he could not make private sales without the consent of the son and three daughters and widow and three sons-in-law of the testator. By the first agreement, he could make public sales as soon as could be conveniently done without sacrifice; by the second, he could not make public sales for a year from November, 1872, without the consent of the seven persons last named; and, in fact, he could procure no sales, either public or private, except so far as said seven persons should deem necessary. The sureties contracted that they would be liable for the judgment and skill of a trustee. They are sought to be held liable for transactions controlled entirely by the judgment and skill of seven persons, acting independently of the trustee. By their bond, they contracted that the trustee would account for and pay over all moneys and property which might come into his hands as such trustee, "at such times and in such manner as is provided for in said instrument;" that is to say, in the agreement of 1871. But the "times" and "manner" specified in the agreement of 1871 were materially altered by the agreement of 1872. By the latter agreement, the duties of the trustee were changed, and his responsibilities were increased. These changes not only affected the character and duration of his duties, but the amount and kind of property of which he was to have the care, and the times when said property should come to his hands. We cannot stop to point out all these changes. They can be easily ascertained by a study and comparison of the terms of the two agreements, as they are set out in the statement which precedes this opinion. The agreement of 1872 put it in the power of the seven persons above named to postpone the completion of the trust, to delay the transfer of the trust property to the possession and control of the trustee, and to hinder the trustee in his management of the trust. As a necessary result, sales and investments, which under the first agreement were to be accomplished within a conveniently reasonable time, were not effected for many years. The evidence shows that it was not until 1886, 14 years after the second agreement was made, that enough land had been sold to equalize the interests in the bank stock.

Many other points are ably discussed by counsel in their arguments, but we deem it unnecessary to comment upon them, as the views already expressed are deemed sufficient to dispose of the case.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

a judgment of the Circuit Court for McLean County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's refusal to sell plaintiff soda water. Affirmed.

Statement by Phillips, J.:

The original declaration in this case contained two counts, the first of which alleges that the defendant, in a building occupied by him, was engaged in the drug business, and in connection therewith kept for sale certain refreshments, to wit, soda water, ice cream soda water, ginger ale, phosphate, cherry phosphate, root beer, etc.; that the plaintiff tendered the price of cherry phosphate, and was refused, and was informed that it was on account of his color. The second count alleges that the defendant was engaged in the public business, and kept for sale to the public certain refreshments, to wit, the same articles mentioned above, and that the plaintiff, on the 6th day of August, 1894, entered said place of business and tendered the price of certain articles kept for sale by the defendant (without mentioning the name of the article), and was informed by the defendant that he could not purchase such article of him. This count does not allege any reason for the refusal. A demurrer was interposed to these counts. Subsequently, by leave of the court, three other special counts were filed, the first two of which were withdrawn, and the third allowed to stand. This count was also demurred to. It alleges in substance that on the 6th day of August, 1894, the defendant was engaged in running a soda fountain for public accommodation, and that said soda fountain was a place of public accommodation, and the defendant kept certain articles for sale at said place of business, to wit, the same articles mentioned in the first count, and that the plaintiff, being a colored citizen, on the 6th day of August, 1894, entered said place of the defendant, and tendered the "ordinary price for which said articles kept by said Hamer H. Green for public accommodation were sold to the public in general," and that the defendant refused to sell said articles to plaintiff on account of his color. The court sustained demurrer to each of these counts, and the judgment was affirmed by the appellate court for the third district, and this appeal is prosecuted.

Mr. Charles M. Peirce, for appellant:

Case is the proper remedy.

Baylies v. Curry, 30 Ill. App. 105, 128 Ill. 287.

If the rights and privileges of the colored citizen are to be restricted by the whims and at the pleasure of those who engage in public business and who solicit public patronage, as has been done by the defendant in this case, then the rights of the colored citizen and the great freedom to him of which we boast will soon be relegated to the tomb of oblivion, and the shackles of slavery will again be welded on this unfortunate race of human beings.

Messrs. Rowell, Neville, & Lindley, for appellee:

The civil rights statute is highly penal, and is therefore to be strictly construed, and cannot be extended so as to include any kind of business not mentioned.

It is a part of every man's civil rights that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rest upon reason or is the result of a whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice.

Theaters and other places of public amusement exist wholly under the authority and protection of state laws, their managers are commonly licensed by the state, and in conferring the license it is no doubt competent for the state to impose the condition that the proprietor shall admit and accommodate all persons impartially; and the power of the state to regulate the business of an innkeeper would be at least equally plain.

Cooley, Torts, 285.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents for construction the provisions of an act entitled "An Act to Protect All Citizens in Their Civil and Legal Rights, and Fixing a Penalty for Violation of the Same," approved June 10, 1885 (Laws of 1885, p. 64). Section 1 of that act reads as follows: "That all persons within the jurisdiction of said state shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, restaurants, eating houses, barber shops, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and all other places of public accommodation and amusement, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to all citizens." Under this provision of the statute, full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of certain places of public resort is required to be extended to all persons within the jurisdiction of this state.

It is a clearly established rule of construction that if, after enumerating certain places of business on which a duty is imposed or a license required, the same statute then employs some general term to embrace other cases, no other cases will be included in the general term except those of the same general character or kind so specifically enumerated. Potters' Dwarr. Stat. 247, 248; Re Swigert, 119 Ill. 83; Shirk v. People, 121 Ill. 61; Brooks v. Cook, 44 Mich. 617, 38 Am. Rep. 282. Public conveyances on land or water, and inns, and theaters have, from the earliest history of this state, been to a greater or less extent subjected to police regulations, and statutes have been enacted with reference to their government. Restaurants, eating houses, and barber shops are of such character they are resorted to necessarily by all classes of persons, from time to time. All these places of public resort were by the legislature declared to be places at which all persons within the jurisdiction of this state should be entitled to full and equal enjoyment of their accommodations and advantages, under all conditions. The term "and all other places of public accommodation and amusement," under the principle of construction first stated, can only be held to include cases of the same general character, sort, or kind.

Under the averments of this declaration, the defendant, as proprietor of a drug store, kept a soda fountain, from which he dispensed the character of liquids usually sold therefrom. Such places can be considered places of accommodation or amusement to no greater extent than a place where dry goods or clothing, boots and shoes, hats and caps, or groceries are dispensed. The personal liberty of an individual in his business transactions, and his freedom from restrictions, is a question of the utmost moment; and no construction can be adopted by which an individual right of action will be included as controlled within a legislative enactment, unless clearly expressed in such enactment, and certainly included within the constitutional limitation on the power of the legislature. Nothing in this provision requires a physician to attend a patient, a lawyer to accept a retainer, a merchant to sell goods, or a farmer to employ labor, unless of his own volition, regardless of any reason, whether expressed or not. The general provision does not include the business of the defendant, nor is it included within the terms specially named. It was not error in the circuit court to sustain the demurrer, nor in the appellate court to affirm its judgment.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

MT. STERLING NATIONAL BANK, Appt.,
v.
James GREENE.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Damages are recoverable against a bank for refusal to pay the check of a customer who has sufficient funds in the bank applicable to the check.
2. A bank holding an overdue note of a depositor of greater amount than his deposit may properly refuse to pay his check without any formal appropriation of the deposit upon the note.

(May 14, 1896.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Montgomery County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for defendant's refusal to pay a check. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Tyler & Apperson, for appellant:

The bank has a general lien on the money and funds of the depositor in its vault for the payment of a general account of the depositor.

Masonic Sav. Bank v. Bangs, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 168; Herndon v. Louisville Bkg. Co. 10 Ky. L. Rep. 584. Morse, Banks & Banking, 2d ed. 31, 34, 42, 46, 47; Jordan v. National Shoe & L. Bank, 74 N. Y. 467, 30 Am. Rep. 321; Falkland v. St. Nicholas Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 145; Bank of Marysville v. Windisch Muhlhauser Brewing Co. 50 Ohio St. 151; Bolles, Banks & Depositors, 360, §§ 374, 375.

The petition does not state a cause of action in that it failed to state that plaintiff had money to his credit in defendant bank subject to check and upon which the bank had no lien at the time the check was presented, sufficient to pay the check drawn by plaintiff payable to Bratton.

Morse, Banks & Banking, 35.

Messrs. A. T. Wood, B. T. Day, and Z. T. Young, for appellee:

Appellee had over $4,700 on deposit in the bank, and he had no intimation that they were going to refuse to pay his checks; yet when he gives his check for $1,000 it is protested. They did not place this $4,700 as a credit on the $5,600 note and charge it up to his account, but kept the money to his credit and were having the use of it, and his note was running at interest, and they never did appropriate $1 of it on this debt.

If the bank, as it contends, had a lien on this fund for the payment of its debt it should have applied it on the $5,600 note and charged it up to appellee's account and stopped the interest. It could not refuse to pay appellee's check unless it appropriated the money to the payment of the note held on him.

The appellee was entitled to substantial damages if no special damages had been shown, but special damages were shown in this case.

Mr. C. P. Chenault also for appellee.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

James Greene brought this action to recover of the Mt. Sterling National Bank $5,000 damages, his cause thereof being stated substantially as follows: That October 17, 1892, he drew his check on defendant for $1,000, payable to the order of Sally A. Bratton, which was, October 27, 1892, duly presented for payment, but that although when said check was drawn and delivered, as also when it was presented by Sally A. Bratton for payment, plaintiff had ample money on deposit and to his credit in the bank to pay said check, defendant refused to pay, and caused the check to be protested, and thereby injured plaintiff's credit and standing in the community as an honorable business man, to his great damage, etc. As a ground of defense, defendant stated in its answer, substantially, that December 2, 1891, plaintiff executed and delivered to it his promissory note agreeing to pay, six months thereafter, $5,671.31, which became due June 2, 1892; that October 27, 1892, said note was still due and unpaid, and was for largely more than plaintiff then had on deposit and to his credit in defendant bank; that because it had a lien upon, and right of set-off against, the amount of plaintiff's credit on that day as depositor, defendant refused to pay said check, and retained the amount of his deposit until October 31, 1892, when payment was actually made by him of the note, and then defendant released its lien, and plaintiff drew checks in favor of other parties for the entire amount of his deposit, which were paid as presented. To that answer a general demurrer was filed and sustained, a demurrer to the petition having been previously overruled; and, verdict and judgment being subsequently rendered in favor of plaintiff for $2,000, the defendant appealed.

It seems to be well settled that the obligation of a bank to pay checks, drafts, and orders of a depositor, so long as it has in its possession funds of his sufficient to do so, and which are not encumbered by the attaching of an earlier lien in favor of the bank, and the reciprocal right of the depositor to have them paid, are so far substantial that if the bank refuses without sufficient justification to pay the check of a customer the customer has his action for damages against the bank. Morse, Banks and Banking, § 458. As, therefore, the statements in the petition constitute prima facie a cause of action, the demurrer to it was properly overruled. But, in the language of Masonic Sav. Bank v. Bangs, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 16: "The right of a bank to a general lien on the money and funds of the depositor in its vaults for the payment of the balance of the general account of the depositor is recognized by all the elementary books on banks and banking, and sustained by an unbroken line of American decisions." In Pursifull v. Pineville Bkg. Co.'s Assignee, 97 Ky. 154, it is said by this court that there is no difference of opinion as to the right of a bank, under the doctrine of set-off, to have applied to the payment of a note held by it against a depositor unappropriated funds he may have deposited in the bank to his credit. As aptly and correctly said in Herndon v. Louisville Bkg. Co. (decided by the superior court) 10 Ky. L. Rep. 584: "The relation between the bank and depositor is that of debtor and creditor, and as long as it exists the bank must honor drafts or checks of the depositor in the order in which they are presented, to the extent of the deposit. But when, on account of any legitimate transaction between the parties, the relation is shifted, and the balance of the account is against the depositor, it seems to us that, upon principle, the bank should not be required to respond to the demand of a holder of a check which was drawn before this altered condition of affairs, but of which the bank had no notice until afterwards." In this case, however, the depositor, prior to and at the date of the check, was indebted to the bank, by a promissory note past due, in an amount greater than what he had on deposit, and therefore occupied the relative attitude of debtor. In sustaining the demurrer to the answer, the lower court expressed the opinion that defendant had a lien on the deposit of plaintiff, and the right, at the time of presentation of the check by the holder for payment, to appropriate the entire amount then on deposit, belonging to plaintiff, to the payment of said note then due from plaintiff to defendant. But the demurrer to the answer was nevertheless sustained, because, in the language of the court, the defendant failed, on presentation of the check, to appropriate said deposit and apply the same as a credit on the said note, and thereby released its lien. It seems to us that the reason for that decision is not sufficient. The question is whether, at the time the check was presented, the bank had the right to refuse payment. If it had, then its simple refusal to honor the check was a proper exercise of that right, and all the appropriation needed for that purpose. In our opinion the facts stated in the answer constitute a sufficient justification of the bank's refusing to pay the check in question, and, prima facie, sufficient ground of defense to the action. And, as this record stands, defendant was, on the pleadings, entitled to judgment. We need not refer to the instructions, further than to say that, having been given upon an incorrect hypothesis, they are necessarily erroneous.

For the primary error in sustaining the demurrer to the answer, the judgment is reversed and the case remanded for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

Hazelrigg, J., did not sit.

Somerfield v. State Ins. Co. 8 Lea, 547, 41 Am. Rep. 662; Gauthier v. Waterloo Ins. Co. supra.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Mutual Fire Insurance Company in Harford County issued a policy of insurance against loss by fire to Mr. J. Thomas C. Hopkins in March, 1893. The insured premises were subsequently purchased by the appellant Sweeting, and Mr. Hopkins assigned the policy to him. In October, 1894, additional insurance was granted by the same underwriter to the appellant, upon the same premises. Among the terms and conditions annexed to, and forming a part of, the policy, was the following: "If any property insured by this company shall be already insured, or shall be hereafter insured, by any other company or companies or individual, or otherwise, such insurance or insurances must be made known to this company, and indorsed on the policy, or otherwise acknowledged in writing, or otherwise the policy of this company shall be void." In November, 1894, the appellant without giving notice to, or obtaining the consent of, the Harford Insurance Company, and without disclosing to the second insurer the existence of the first policy, procured a policy, for the same amount of insurance, on the same property, from the Farmers' Fire Insurance Company of York, Pa. In the policy issued by this last-named company, it is provided and declared "that this company shall not be liable . . . for loss if there is other prior or subsequent insurance, whether valid or otherwise, without the written consent of this company." It is further stipulated that "said company shall in no case be deemed to have waived a full, literal, and strict compliance with, and performance of, each and every of the terms, provisions, conditions, and stipulations in this policy contained, and hereto annexed, to be performed and preserved by and on the part of the insured, . . . unless such waiver be expressed and manifested in writing under the signatures of the president and secretary of said company." On March 11, 1895, the dwelling house described in and covered by both the policies was destroyed by fire, and both of the underwriters refused to pay the loss,—the Harford Company, because its policy was avoided, according to its contention, by the subsequent insurance procured without its consent, and the York Company because the omission of the assured to disclose the fact that he held a policy on the same property in the Harford Company invalidated the policy of the York Company, issued in ignorance of the antecedent outstanding insurance in the Harford Company. Subsequently this suit was brought against the Harford Company to recover on the policy issued by it, that policy being the first in date and delivery. Upon the trial of the cause one exception was reserved which brings up for review the rulings of the trial court upon the prayers for instructions to the jury. The verdict and judgment were entered for the defendant, the Harford Company, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

All of the plaintiffs' prayers were rejected, and all of the defendant's were granted. Together they present but a single question; and that question, though one of much interest and importance, has not heretofore been raised in this court for decision. It is this: Does the fact that a subsequent policy was procured without the consent of the first underwriter avoid the first policy, under the above-quoted conditions contained therein, against other insurance, when the second policy explicitly declares that the company which issued it shall not be liable for loss if there is other prior insurance, whether valid or not, held on the same property, without the written consent of the second insurer? There is a wide diversity of opinion on this question in the various courts of this country. The doctrine laid down by the highest tribunals of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and other states is that the subsequent insurance being invalid at the time of loss, by reason of the breach of condition therein, the prior insurance is good, and the first underwriter is liable on the policy issued by it. Thomas v. *Builders' Mut. On the other hand, it has been held elsewhere that a subsequent policy, whether legally enforceable or not, or whether voidable on its face, or voidable for extrinsic matter, works a forfeiture of the prior policy. Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044; Allen v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 30 La. Ann. 1386, 31 Am. Rep. 243; Somerfield v. State Ins. Co. 8 Lea, 547; Funke v. Minnesota Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 29 Minn. 347, 43 Am. Rep. 216; Lackey v. Georgia Home Ins. Co. 42 Ga. 456; Bigler v. New York C. Ins. Co. 22 N. Y. 402; May, Ins. § 364.

There is still an intermediate view, taken by the supreme court of Iowa in the case of Hubbard v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 33 Iowa, 325, to the effect that the question of the validity of the prior policy turns upon whether the subsequent policy has in fact been avoided. If the second policy is recognized by the insurer issuing it to be a valid policy, any breach of conditions being waived, this makes it a valid insurance, and avoids the first policy; but, if the subsequent policy has been rescinded for condition broken, there is no other insurance, so as to invalidate the prior policy. The obvious and insuperable objection to this latter view lies in the fact that it makes the validity of the contract between the parties under the first policy depend, not upon their own agreement, nor the effect of that agreement, nor upon their own acts, nor the acts of either of them, but upon what another person (the second underwriter), a stranger to the first contract, may voluntarily do with respect to affirming or repudiating a totally different and distinct contract of insurance, without the slightest reference to any judicial inquiry as to the validity or invalidity of the second policy, or its resultant legal effect upon the first. Now, as the parties to the first policy of insurance have, by the unequivocal terms employed in their contract, declared that, if the property insured should be thereafter insured by any other company, the first policy should be void, unless the second insurance were made known to the first insurer, and were indorsed on the policy written by it, or were otherwise acknowledged and assented to by it in writing, and as the manifest object and design of such a provision were to guard against the dangers supposed to be incident to a double or an over insurance, the natural and reasonable interpretation of this forfeiting condition would, aside from adjudged cases, seem to prohibit a second valid insurance, and not a mere ineffectual attempt to procure additional insurance. The two things are not identical. "Other insurance" does not mean a void policy, which obviously affords no insurance at all. Nor does it mean a policy which may, at the option of the underwriter, be canceled; for that is, at best, but conditional insurance. But it means a binding, available insurance,—one upon which the insured can rely for protection in case of loss, and which he can enforce by law, and which cannot be repudiated with impunity at the arbitrary election of the insurer. If the underwriter contemplated something else than a valid insurance under a second policy, it should have been expressed in plain and unambiguous language, as was done by the York Company. Upon the face of the latter's policy, it was expressly declared that the policy would be void if other insurance existed or were procured, even though the other insurance were itself invalid. And such a provision has been recognized as effectual. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Verdier, 35 Mich. 395; Bigler v. New York C. Ins. Co. supra. A second policy which, by its own terms, is void for any cause, is not an insurance at all; and this is equally true whether the invalidity is apparent on the face of the policy itself, or is made to appear by evidence aliunde the policy. It is not the method by which the invalidity of the second policy may be shown that determines whether it does or does not create a liability on the part of the underwriter who issues it, and therefore does or does not constitute a breach of the condition in the first policy against further insurance; but it is the fact that the second policy is valid and binding that alone fixes upon its underwriter a liability, and accordingly determines whether, in this respect, the condition against other insurance set forth in the first policy has been violated or not. Hence the inquiry is not as to how the invalidity of the second policy may be shown, but as to whether it is invalid. The parties to it themselves stipulate in it that it shall be void if there exists, at the time of its issue, undisclosed insurance in some other company, whether that prior insurance be valid or not. If such insurance, valid or invalid, does exist, then by the explicit terms of the contract, the second policy is void, and not merely voidable. Such is the distinct agreement of the parties themselves, and such is the character or status which they themselves have given to the second policy. To ascribe to the second policy, which the parties in direct terms declare shall be void if prior undisclosed insurance exists, the effect of annulling an antecedent policy not only ignores the agreement that stamps it as invalid, but involves the incongruity of treating the second policy as at one and the same time a subsisting, binding contract, for the purpose of avoiding the first policy, and a nugatory policy in respect to indemnifying the assured. It cannot be both valid and invalid, nor can it be valid for one purpose and invalid for another. If valid at all, it annuls the prior policy, precisely because it is valid; but, to be valid for any purpose, its explicit terms, declaring it invalid, must be deliberately disregarded. If, then, its provisions be given the effect which the parties to it intended they should have, it is void, and not merely voidable, the moment the condition arises upon the occurrence of which the parties have declared it shall be invalid. And, if thus invalid, it obviously does not create other insurance, within the prohibition contained in the first policy. It would then be nothing more than an attempt to secure other insurance. An ineffectual attempt to secure insurance is confessedly no insurance; and a policy which, in terms, declares its own invalidity in the event of their being prior undisclosed insurance on the same property, is a policy which, by the agreement of the parties to it, has never become binding, if the prior insurance did exist, and consequently it grants no additional or other insurance whatever. And if it grants no additional or other insurance, and is, for the reason stated, and by the stipulation of the parties, a mere nullity, its issue by the insurer, and its acceptance by the insured, cannot invalidate antecedent insurance, which, by express provisions contained in the prior policy, is only to be avoided when subsequent undisclosed insurance is obtained. Giving to the words of the contract of insurance set forth in the first policy their obvious meaning, and bearing in mind that they do not, as those used in the second policy, relate to, or specifically designate, invalid insurance, the only tenable conclusion is that the intention of both the contracting parties was to strike down the first policy only on the condition that the second was valid and binding. And this is the conclusion reached by the best-considered cases. If the "other insurance" does not mean such a contract of insurance as is legally enforceable, then no certain test can be applied, and we abandon all legal guides. "The sound conclusion would seem to be that in cases like that at bar the 'other insurance' must be legal insurance, and that the true issue is whether the policy, not on its face, but on all the facts legally in evidence, was binding upon the insurer." Dahlberg v. St. Louis Mut. F. & M. Ins. Co. 6 Mo. App. 126.

The leading case relied on to support the opposite doctrine is Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044. In commenting on this case, Judge Dillon, in Allison v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 3 Dill. 484, Fed. Cas. No. 252, remarks: "The general, but not uniform, opinion of the court, is that, to avoid the first policy the second policy must be valid, that it must constitute an effectual insurance; and we are inclined to so hold, if this can be done consistently with Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. supra. The case last cited has been subjected to much criticism. (See Clark v. New England Mut. F. Ins. Co. 6 Cush. 342, 53 Am. Dec. 44; Hubbard v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 33 Iowa, 325; May, Ins. § 365, and the authorities there collected.) And it may be conceded that, though not unsupported it does not, at least in its reasoning, accord with the prevailing view. . . . That case holds that the company which issued the second policy (the Providence Company) was entitled to notice of the prior insurance in the American Company, though the policy in that company had been 'procured by misrepresentation of material facts, and the reason given (which has been criticised, and its soundness denied) is that such a policy is not 'to be treated, in the sense of the law, as utterly void ab initio, but merely voidable, and as one that may be avoided by the underwriters upon the proof of the facts, but until so avoided, to be treated for all practical purposes as a subsisting policy.'" Carpenter's Case was decided by the supreme court in 1842, and the opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Story. Carpenter was denied a recovery on the Providence policy—the second in order of time—because when it was issued the insured held a prior policy in the American Company, which fact was not communicated to the second underwriter; and it was insisted that, under the condition in the Providence policy against prior insurance, the policy sued on was avoided. But it was replied that the American policy had been procured by misrepresentation of material facts, and was therefore void, and, if void, that it did not constitute a prior insurance which would invalidate the second policy. This position the supreme court repudiated, upon the distinct ground that the American policy was not void, but only voidable, and until it was avoided it was to be treated as a subsisting policy. Now, singularly enough, in 1839 the same plaintiff, Carpenter, brought suit on the American policy, and the case was decided by Mr. Justice Story. Carpenter v. American Ins. Co. 1 Story, C. C. 57, Fed. Cas. No. 2,428. In course of the opinion delivered by him, he said: "We are clearly of opinion that the policy in this case, having been obtained upon a misrepresentation of material facts, is utterly void." Thus in a suit on the American policy Mr. Justice Story pronounced that policy "utterly void," while, in a subsequent suit on the Providence policy, he declared the latter invalid because the American policy was not void, but voidable. Carpenter was not allowed to recover on the first policy because it was held to be utterly void by reason of misrepresentations. He was not permitted to recover on the second because that one was held to be void by reason of the first one being only voidable, which made it, though antecedently annulled, a subsisting, outstanding prior insurance. Clark v. New England Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra. Obviously, one or the other of these conflicting decisions must be wrong. If the second policy was void, as held in Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044, because procured while there was an earlier outstanding insurance in existence when it was obtained, then, manifestly, the earlier outstanding policy was not void when written, because, if void then, it would have been void always, and would have granted no insurance at all, and therefore would have been no breach of the second policy's condition against prior undisclosed insurance, and would, consequently, not have invalidated the second policy. That the first policy was declared in the suit on the second policy not to be void is perfectly apparent, because the court explicitly determined that it was only voidable, and, being only voidable, was binding until repudiated by its underwriter. But it could not be merely voidable in 1842. If in fact it had been not only therefore repudiated by its underwriter, but, besides this, had been previously adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction to be utterly void on account of material misrepresentations made by the assured at the time it was issued. In 1839 this first policy had actually been declared utterly void, and not merely voidable. That decision has never been reversed, and was in effect when, in 1842, the second policy was held invalid because the first, which had been previously declared utterly void, was then treated as only voidable. If the first was void in 1839, it was equally void in 1842; and, if void at all, a subsequent decision founded on the assumption that the first policy was simply voidable and not void,—though it had been solemnly pronounced not voidable, but utterly void,—was incontestably based upon a mistaken and indefensible premise, and is, of necessity, untenable. This is inevitable; for, if the second policy was void simply because the first was but voidable, then if the first was really void the second must have been valid. As the first had been pronounced void in 1839, it could no longer be treated as only voidable, and it ought therefore, in 1842, to have been held as furnishing no ground for questioning the validity of the second. Either this is so, or the prior decision striking down the first policy, was wholly wrong, and that policy was not void. Apart, then, from the criticism upon the reasoning of the Carpenter Case alluded to by Judge Dillon, the decision itself is open to the serious objection that it rests upon a palpable error as to the status of the first policy.

But it is insisted that by a second policy on the same property, effected without notice to, or the assent of, the first underwriter, the insurer may believe he has obtained an overinsurance, whereby the temptation to carelessness, if not to incendiarism, on his part, will be greatly increased, to the prejudice and probable loss of the insurer; and, to use the language employed in Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Lamar, 106 Ind. 515, if a recovery be allowed on the first policy, it "affords the opportunity for the anomalous spectacle of an insured avoiding the effect of apparent overinsurance, and compelling payment of one policy by exhibiting his own turpitude in obtaining another." But the obvious vice of this position consists in its assumption, without proof, that the assured has acted in bad faith, and necessarily has been guilty of fraud, in securing the second insurance. There is no warrant in the law for making such an assumption in the absence of evidence (Fireman's Ins. Co. v. Holt, 35 Ohio St. 192), or for its acceptation as a universal and unvarying rule. It is entirely possible,—first, that two policies on the same property, in the hands of the same individual, will not in fact create an overinsurance; secondly, that the assured may not believe that the two policies create an overinsurance, even if in fact they do; thirdly, that the second may have been procured with a view of discontinuing the first, while the loss intervenes before the actual cancelation of the earlier one; and fourthly, that, though legally chargeable with notice of the prohibition against other insurance, the assured may be in reality ignorant of its terms, and may with a view to secure additional indemnity, while in absolute good faith, procure the subsequent policy. In any one of these contingencies it would be going beyond a legitimate presumption to hold inexorably that fraud or turpitude tainted the conduct of the assured.

Nor is there any substance in the objection that an inquiry into the validity of the second policy, in a suit on the first one, opens up an investigation of a contract between other parties which is wholly collateral to the issue on trial. The first policy is valid unless the defendant establishes its invalidity by reason of some breach of a material condition, and the burden is on the defendant to show that there is a second insurance which invalidates the first; that is, that there is a second valid insurance. Hence the validity of such second policy is, in the very nature of the case, essentially and directly put in issue. That a policy of later date was issued is, of itself, not sufficient. It must be a policy which grants further insurance, and it can only grant further or other insurance in the event that it is valid. Similar inquiries are frequently involved. Thus, where a first policy prohibited any increase of risk, and the insured increased the risk by erecting a building connecting his house and barn, it was held that the first policy, being at an end, and of no effect, by reason of this breach of one of its conditions, did not avoid the second policy. The inquiry to ascertain whether the first policy was legally at an end was gone into in a suit on the second policy, and a recovery on the latter was sustained because the former was shown to be no longer in force. Jackson v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 5 Gray, 52. Precisely the same principle would permit the insured to show the invalidity of a second policy in his suit on the first. In each instance he would merely prove a fact upon the existence of which the validity of the contract which he seeks to enforce depends. By the terms of the York Company's policy, no waiver of any of its conditions can be shown unless such waiver was indorsed in writing on the policy. Confessedly there was no waiver of any kind written thereon. Upon its face, then, it contained an unwaived and effective condition avoiding it for prior undisclosed insurance in some other company. The prior insurance was shown,—the policy securing it was the cause of action in the suit on trial,—and the second policy was consequently void. Being void, it created no other insurance at all, and therefore did not impair the validity of the first policy. It results from the views we have expressed that there was error in the ruling which granted the defendant's prayers and rejected those of the plaintiffs. Because of this error the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial must be awarded.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Royal M. BASSETT et al., Appts.,
v.
William C. ATWATER et al.

(65 Conn. 353.)

1. Mandamus may properly issue to compel the officers of a corporation to call a special meeting of the stockholders when requested in accordance with the provisions of the by-laws if a statute prescribes the mode for calling such meetings, since the statute thereby makes it the imperative duty to give the prescribed notice when properly requested.
2. That refusal to call a meeting of the stockholders of a corporation does not work a public wrong is not sufficient to defeat the issuance of a mandamus to compel the officers to do so.
3. The obligation imposed by the by-laws of a corporation upon its officers are not such as rest wholly upon contract for breach of which there is an adequate legal remedy which will prevent the issuance of a writ of mandamus to compel compliance with them.

(January 8, 1895.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of defendant in a mandamus proceeding to compel the calling of a meeting of the stockholders of the Derby Rubber Company. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edwin B. Gager and William S. Downs, for appellants:

When by-laws are made in pursuance of the legislative authority, expressly or impliedly granted, the by-laws themselves have the force and the effect of a public statute; for they are binding upon the corporation, binding upon the officers and stockholders, binding upon those dealing with the corporation.

NOTE.—Mandamus to enforce provision of by-laws of corporation.

The cases in which mandamus has actually issued to enforce by-laws of a corporation are very few, but there does not appear to be any decision denying the power of the court to use mandamus for such a purpose if it becomes necessary to do so.

There are several classes of cases involving the internal management of corporations, which more or less directly affect the enforcement of by-laws, in which mandamus has been used, but in none of them did the decision turn squarely upon the right to use the writ to enforce the by-law.

There are decisions concerning the right to issue the writ to compel the issuing or transfer of corporate stock, but some of these cases involve principles other than the enforcement of by-laws, and are therefore reserved for an independent note, although some of them are collected in a note to Burnsville Turnp. Co. v. State, McCalla (Ind.) 3 L. R. A. 265.

Decisions as to the use of the writ have also been made in regard to the reinstatement of members who have been expelled from a corporation. These cases do not alone involve the question of the enforcement of by-laws and are therefore also omitted. Some of them may be found collected in a note to Com., Burt, v. Union League (Pa.) 8 L. R. A. 195.

It may be stated, however, that it has been decided that when the action of the corporation in expelling a member is violative of its rules in disregard of the rights of the member, courts will interfere to compel a restoration of the franchise to him of which he has been improperly deprived. Nelson v. Board of Trade, 58 Ill. App. 399.

Other cases analogous to the subject but not directly involving the point are those in which the question of the right to mandamus to compel the inspection of books and papers of the corporation has been discussed; these cases will also form a note by themselves.

The remaining cases seem to be confined to the question of the right to mandamus to compel the calling of corporate meetings, but there are very few of these directly in point.

In Reg. v. Aldham & U. Parishes Ins. Soc. 15 Jur. 1035, 6 Eng. L. & Eq. 365, in which a mandamus was granted to compel the calling of a meeting, the act was required by statute.

So, in State, Flagg. v. Lady Bryan Min. Co. 4 Nev. 400, where a mandamus was issued to compel the calling of a meeting of the stockholders, the time of meeting was prescribed by statute and not by by-law, and the same was true in State, Sears, v. Wright, 10 Nev. 167.

So, in People, Miller, v. Cummings, 72 N. Y. 433, where a mandamus was granted to compel the calling of a meeting for an election, the duty was imposed by statute.

So, if the corporation neglects to fill up the board of directors as required by the charter the court may order an election for the purpose of doing so. Re Union Ins. Co. 22 Wend. 591.

Under the New York statute if the officers of a corporation neglect to hold an election as required by the by-laws, the court will by mandamus require them to do so. People, Walker, v. Albany Hospital Governors, 61 Barb. 397.

If the laws of the state require the holding of election by a religious society as provided by the by-laws, courts will compel the giving of notice for the election. People, Maclaury, v. Hart, 11 N. Y. Supp. 67.

Mandamus may compel the calling of a meeting at the time and place provided by the by-laws. Com., McCalmont, v. Keim, 15 Phila. 1, 33 Legal Int. 32.

Mandamus will lie to compel the holding of an election at the time prescribed by the by-laws. Mottu v. Primrose, 23 Md. 482. H. P. F.

If the by-law gave room for discretion it would be quite another case, but the duty of the president and secretary under this by law comes within the most approved rule of imperative ministerial duty.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs are the owners and holders of more than 200 shares—indeed, of a majority of all the shares—of the capital stock of the Derby Rubber Company, a joint-stock corporation formed under the laws of this state, and located at Derby. The defendant William C. Atwater is the president, and William F. Askam is the secretary, of said corporation. One of the by-laws (the sixth) of said corporation provides, in respect to annual meetings, that "a written or printed notice of such annual meeting, and also of each special meeting of said corporation, specifying the place, day, and hour of such meeting, shall be given by the president or secretary to each stockholder by leaving it with him or at his residence or usual place of business, or by depositing it in some post office for transmission by mail, postage paid, addressed to him at his last known place of residence, at least five days before said meeting." Another by-law (the seventh) enacts that "special meetings of the stockholders of said corporation may be held at any time upon the notice hereinbefore specified, and the secretary or president shall give such notice upon the request in writing of stockholders holding 200 shares of the capital stock of said corporation calling for such special meeting, and shall specify therein the object and purpose of such meeting." On the 4th day of April, 1894, the plaintiffs united in a written request to the defendants, asking them to call a special meeting of the stockholders of said corporation specifying therein the object and purpose of such meeting, and also naming a place, a day, and an hour for the holding of the same, which request was on said day placed in the hands of each of said defendants. But the defendants refused to call any such meeting. Thereupon the plaintiffs made application to the superior court for a writ of peremptory mandamus requiring and commanding the defendants to call such a special meeting. An alternative writ was issued, and duly served; and on the return day the defendants appeared in court, and moved to quash the said alternative writ, alleging various reasons for such motion. The court found the application and alternative writ to be insufficient in the law, granted the motion, and quashed the alternative writ. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mandamus, although it is an extraordinary legal remedy, is in the nature of an equitable interference supplementing the deficiencies of the common law. It will ordinarily be issued where a legal duty is established, and no other sufficient means exist for enforcing it. When the object sought can be equally well obtained by other means, as by an action, or by some other form of proceeding, then mandamus will not lie. Thus, the enforcement of merely private obligations, such as those arising from contracts, are not within its scope. The essential conditions without which the writ will not be issued to enforce the performance of a ministerial duty are: (1) That the party against whom the writ is sought must be under an obligation, imposed by law, to perform some such duty,—that is, a duty in respect to the performance of which he may not exercise any discretion; (2) that the party applying for the writ has a clear, legal right to have the duty performed; and (3) that there is no other sufficient remedy. In the present case the alternative writ, in point of form, contains allegations which show that all these conditions exist in favor of the plaintiffs; and as these are admitted by the motion to quash to be true, we are to inquire whether any of the allegations are insufficient in the law. The superior court found the insufficiency in the fact that the duty sought to be enforced was one imposed by the by-laws of the corporation. In its memorandum of decision that court said: "The by-laws in question do not have the force or dignity of public law. Their office is a private one, and the duties they impose are private, not public, in their nature. The individuals concerned, and not the public at large, are interested in their obedience. Disobedience of them works a private injury, not a public wrong. Breach of the duties they impose is a breach of private duty, and not of a public trust. . . . The writ of mandamus, therefore, is not a remedy appropriate to the circumstances the complaint discloses." This memorandum seems to indicate that the superior court was of opinion that a writ of mandamus was a remedy to be used only in cases where the duty sought to be enforced was one imposed by public law, and one the nonperformance of which worked a public wrong; and that the alternative writ in this case was defective in both these particulars. But is this true? To speak first of the defect last mentioned, is it true that a mandamus is to issue only to enforce a duty in the performance of which the public at large has such an interest that its nonperformance is in the nature of a public wrong? Perhaps the earlier cases —some of them—mentioned this as a necessary requirement. But even then it was not strictly insisted upon. The writ was often issued in cases where the question in controversy was rather upon some matter of private right than upon a public one. The courts then followed the rule given by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Barker, 3 Burr. 1267, that "the value of the matter, or the degree of its importance to the public police, is not scrupulously weighed. If there be a right, and no other specific remedy, this should not be denied." Rex v. Turkey Co. 2 Burr. 943; Rex v. Wildman, 2 Strange, 879; White's Case, 2 Ld. Raym. 1004; Case of Schrixen and Turner, 2 Strange, 832; Dacosta v. Russia Co. Id. 783; Anonymous, 1 Strange, 696. In this jurisdiction this feature is substantially disregarded, and a mandamus is issued in cases where the duty is one imposed by public authority, and its nonperformance operates only as a private wrong. Thus, a justice of the peace may be required to correct his record at the application of one who has only a private interest in it. Smith v. Moore, 38 Conn. 105. A judge of probate may be required to amend his record so as to enable a party to take an appeal, though no person in the world is interested in the suit but the appellant. Taylor v. Gillette, 52 Conn. 216; Elderkin's Appeal, 49 Conn. 69. See also Daly v. Dimock, 55 Conn. 579; Gilman v. Bassett, 33 Conn. 298; American Casualty Ins. & S. Co. v. Fyler, 60 Conn. 448; Brainard v. Staub, 61 Conn. 570. We understand this to be the general doctrine in America and England at the present day. Mr. High, in the very first section of his valuable work on Mandamus, says: "The object of a mandamus is to prevent disorder from a failure of justice and a defect of police, and it should be granted in all cases where the law has established no specific remedy, and where in justice there should be one. And the value of the matter in issue, or the degree of its importance to the public, should not be too scrupulously weighed." And in the 10th section: "The test to be applied, therefore, in determining upon the right to relief by mandamus, is to inquire whether the party aggrieved has a clear legal right, and whether he has any other adequate remedy, since the writ only belongs to those who have legal rights to enforce, who find themselves without an appropriate remedy. And whenever the conditions above noticed coexist, the right to the extraordinary aid of a mandamus may be regarded as to that extent ex debito justitiæ." We think the alternative writ was not insufficient for such reason. It is not to be tolerated that where the law in precise terms directs the performance of an act it is incapable or unwilling to enforce obedience to its mandate because only one person, or a few persons, are interested in securing such obedience. King v. Justices of Kent, 14 East, 395; Rex v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 15 East, 117; Rex v. Bishop of Chester, 1 T. R. 396; Rex v. Severn & W. R. Co. 2 Barn. & Ald. 646; People v. Albany Supers. 12 Johns. 415; Bright v. Chenango Supers. 18 Johns. 242; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 350; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 102.

The other defect indicated by the superior court, and the one doubtless which had the greatest weight, seems to have been that the duty imposed on the defendants by the corporate by-laws to call special meetings was a duty imposed by a mere contract obligation, and not by law. The memorandum of decision from which we have quoted uses the expression "public law." We do not understand the court by that expression to intend anything more than to distinguish between the law—i. e., the law of the land—and a mere contract obligation. If these by-laws impose no duty on the defendants other than one growing out of a contract, then it is certain that a writ of mandamus is not the proper remedy for a neglect or refusal to obey them; and for the reason, if for no other, that for the nonperformance of such a duty there is always another adequate legal remedy. State, Ross County Comrs., v. Zanesville & M. Turnp. Road Co. 16 Ohio St. 308. We are brought, then, to the inquiry: Do these by-laws impose no obligation except such as rests wholly upon contract, and which involves no question of trust or official duty? Two or three observations may tend to elucidate this inquiry. In the first place, all corporations are the creatures of public law. Then, the duty which these by-laws command is a ministerial one. It is a precise act, accurately marked out, enjoined upon particular officers for a particular purpose. American Casualty Ins. & S. Co. v. Fyler, 60 Conn. 448; Brainard v. Staub, 61 Conn. 570. And there is no adequate remedy to enforce this duty other than this writ; at least no other one has been suggested. An action on the case for damages, if that would lie, which is by no means certain, would not be an adequate remedy, for that would bring only pecuniary compensation, and the plaintiffs are entitled to have the very duty performed. Fremont v. Crip- pen, 10 Cal. 211, 70 Am. Dec. 711; Re Williamsburgh Trustees, 1 Barb. 34; Etheridge v. Hall, 7 Port. (Ala.) 47; People, Moulton, v. New York, 10 Wend. 395; Hull v. Oneida County Supers. 19 Johns. 259, 10 Am. Dec. 223; McCullough v. Brooklyn, 23 Wend. 458; People, Livingston, v. Taylor, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. 200; Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 1375.

The equitable proceeding for specific performance obviously could not be brought, for that lies only where there is a contract obligation. It may be that an action in the nature of a bill in equity could be also maintained by one of the stockholders in behalf of the corporation, to compel the president and secretary to perform the duties of their trust. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 273 But the existence of an equitable remedy is never a bar to the issuing of a mandamus. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 593. The by-laws of a corporation doubtless express – as does its charter—contract relations, but it is a contract between the corporation and each of the stockholders, and not one of the stockholders with one another. The officers and directors of a corporation hold a position of trust. Especially is this so as to officers who are chosen by the command of the statute. Section 1950 of the General Statutes requires all joint-stock corporations to elect one of its directors to be the president, and also to elect a secretary; and, although these officers are chosen by the corporation, their duties may be, and often are, prescribed by the general laws of the state. Duties so prescribed, when of a ministerial character, may always be enforced by mandamus. Gen. Stat. § 1945, after providing for the calling of the first meeting of a joint-stock corporation by any two of the corporators, proceeds to declare that "a written or printed notice of each subsequent meeting of such corporation, specifying the place, day, and hour of such meeting, shall be given by the president or secretary to each stockholder, by leaving it with him, or at his residence or usual place of business, or by depositing it in some postoffice for transmission by mail, postage paid, addressed to him at his last known place of residence at least five days before said meeting." The by-laws of the Derby Rubber Company provide that the president or secretary shall give such notice of a special meeting at any time upon the written request of the holders of 200 shares of the stock of the company. The statute, by establishing the only mode in which special meetings may be called, makes it the imperative duty of the president or secretary to give the prescribed notice whenever it is properly required. It is left to each corporation to determine for itself under what circumstances a special meeting is to be held. The by-law which is relied on in this case gives the right to demand one to the holders of 200 shares of stock. Upon such a demand the duty imposed by the statute upon the president or secretary becomes an active one. It is a duty created by the laws of the state, and therefore properly enforceable by the courts of the state, although only called into exercise through the by-laws of the corporation. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 273, 491; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 593; People, Walker, v. Albany Hospital Governors, 61 Barb. 397; Cummings v. Webster, 43 Me. 192, 197; Potter, Corp. §§ 72, 75; McDermott v. Metropolitan Police Dist. Bd. 25 Barb. 635; People, Miller, v. Cummings, 72 N. Y. 433; Mottu v. Primrose, 23 Md. 482; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 155; Reg. v. Aldham & U. Parishes Ins. Soc. 15 Jur. 1035, 6 Eng. We think the superior court erred in its judgment. Various other reasons were presented in the motion to quash. As these were not passed upon by the trial court, we have not considered them. Leave to amend the alternative writ having been granted to the plaintiffs if they should see fit to do so, we suppose all ground for these reasons will be removed. There is error.

The judgment is set aside, and the cause is remanded to the superior court to be proceeded with according to law.

In this opinion the other Judges concurred, except Hammersley, J., who dissented.

1. An injunction against proceeding to an election under an alleged unconstitutional statute will not be granted where that is the only law that has not been repealed or adjudged unconstitutional under which an election of members of the legislature can be had.
2. A constitutional amendment repeals existing legislative enactments which are inconsistent with it.
3. A probability that more wrong will be done than prevented by an injunction prayed for will prevent granting it.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to enjoin defendants from holding an election under the provisions of the apportionment act of 1885. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hawkins & Smith for appellants.

Messrs. Miller, Winter, & Elam, M. E. Forkner, and A. C. Harris for appellee.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee sued the appellants in the superior court to enjoin them from proceeding to hold the election in November for members of the next general assembly under the provisions of the apportionment act approved March 6, 1885. It was alleged that the appellants, being the clerk of the circuit court, the auditor, and the sheriff of Marion county, Indiana were threatening to give notice and proceed to an election under said act, which act, it was alleged, is unconstitutional, for the same reasons that the apportionment acts of 1879, 1891, 1893, and 1895 were adjudged by this court to be unconstitutional, in Parker v. State, Powell, 133 Ind. 178, and 212, 18 L. R. A. 567 and 579, and in Denny v. State, Basler (Ind.) 31 L. R. A. 726. The superior court overruled a demurrer to the complaint for want of sufficient facts, and the defendants declining to plead over, and standing upon their demurrer, the court rendered judgment perpetually enjoining said officers from proceeding to hold said election under and pursuant to said act. The ruling upon the demurrer is the only error assigned.

NOTE.—As to injunction against proceeding under an unconstitutional statute respecting elections, see also Fletcher v. Tuttle (Ill.) 25 L. R. A. 143, and note; Green v. Mills (C. C. App. 4th C.) 30 L. R. A. 90.

A motion to dismiss the appeal is made by Alonzo G. Smith, Charles A. Korbly, and John W. Kern, as amici curiæ, and on behalf of certain other parties who are not parties to the action, and who, it is alleged, would be injuriously affected by the litigation. In support of this motion is filed an affidavit of Sterling R. Holt, to prove the charge made in the motion that "the controversy is not real; that all the parties thereto are agreed in principle and purpose concerning the same; and that said action, from its inception, has been, and is, collusive, and the result of collusion between the parties thereto, all of whom are desirous of obtaining from this court an affirmance of the judgment appealed from, there being no adverse interest represented." If these facts were conceded or clearly shown by the affidavits and record, we should feel compelled to sustain the motion, as the law is well settled that such a litigation may and ought to be regarded as a contempt of court. Hoover v. Hanna, 3 Blackf. 48; Brewington v. Lowe, 1 Ind. 21, 48 Am. Dec. 349; Hotchkiss v. Jones, 4 Ind. 260; Smith v. Junction R. Co. 29 Ind. 546; Osborn v. Bank of United States, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204; Lord v. Veazie, 49 U. S. 8 How. 251, 12 L. ed. 1067; State, Begeman, v. Napton, 10 Mont. 369; Haley v. Eureka County Bank, 21 Nev. 127, 12 L. R. A. 815. Counter affidavits have been filed by the parties and counsel in opposition to the charge of collusion. Other circumstances have occurred in this court tending to overcome the charge. But we deem the merits of the controversy of so much importance to the people that we do not pass upon the conflict raised by the affidavits, and will pass the question of dismissal without decision. The brief on behalf of the appellants makes a point for reversal which is entitled to much consideration, namely, it is therein contended with much apparent earnestness that "the act of 1885 was accepted by the people, and acted upon without question, and three successive general assemblies were elected under it, before any further legislation upon the subject was attempted, and before any question of its constitutionality was raised, and . . . no attempt was ever made or suggested to test its validity or constitutionality in the courts. The law having been accepted and acted upon, as it has been without question by the people . . . we insist that it is now too late to raise the question as to its validity, upon the grounds stated in the complaint." This contention is not without weight or merit, especially as this is an attempt to invoke the equity powers of the court by injunction. "Equity aids the vigilant, not those who slumber on their rights. . . . The principle thus used as a practical rule controlling and restricting the award of reliefs is designated to promote diligence on the part of suitors, to discourage laches by making it a bar to relief, and to prevent the enforcement of stale demands of all kinds, wholly independent of any statutory periods of limitation. It is invoked for this purpose in suits for injunction, suits to obtain remedy against fraud, and in all classes of cases, except perhaps those brought to enforce a trust against an express trustee. . . . 'A court of equity, which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party has slept upon his rights, and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence.'" 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 1st ed. §§ 418, 419; Brashear v. Madison, 142 Ind. 685; Jones v. Cullen, Id. 335; Rumsey v. People, 19 N. Y. 41.

In addition to the fact that the appellee does not point out any other apportionment act than that of 1885, or claim that any such exists under which an election may be held, we may observe that he agrees with the contention of the amici curiæ that all legislative apportionment acts previous to that of 1879, under the present Constitution, including the apportionment act under which that Constitution required the first and second legislative elections to be held, were required to be, and were, based on an enumeration exclusively of the white male inhabitants of the state. Const. 1816, art. 3, § 2; Rev. Stat. 1843, p. 44; Const. 1851, art. 4, §§ 3–5; Rev. Stat. 1852, pp. 48, 49; Enumeration Act 1865, Acts 1865, p. 41 (Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 4780, 4798; Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 6351, 6369); Supp. Enumeration Act 1877, Acts 1877, p. 59 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4799; Rev. Stat. 1894, § 6370). By the amendment to the Constitution of March 14, 1881, the sections of the Constitution above referred to were so amended as to require such enumerations and apportionments to be based on the number of male inhabitants of the state over the age of twenty-one years, both white and colored. Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 99–101 (Rev. Stat. 1881, §§ 99–101). All the apportionment acts, therefore, which preceded that of 1879, being based exclusively on the white male inhabitants of the state above the age of twenty-one years, and leaving out all colored males of that age, are wholly inconsistent with the requirements of the Constitution since its amendment above mentioned, requiring all colored as well as white males, over twenty-one years of age, to be represented in the apportionment for legislative purposes. It is settled law in this and other states that a constitutional amendment inconsistent with previous constitutional provisions and legislative enactments operates to repeal such constitutional provisions and legislative enactments. Griebel v. State, Nieger, 111 Ind. 369, and authorities there cited; Pierce v. Delamater, 1 N. Y. 17; Potter's Dwarr. Stat. 113; Sedgw. Stat. Const. L. 107.

The learned counsel for appellee not only frankly concede, but earnestly insist, that all apportionment acts prior to that of 1879 have been repealed by the above-mentioned constitutional amendment, and that the only act not so repealed or declared by this court to be unconstitutional is that of 1885; so that it is undeniable that all legislative apportionment acts previous to that of 1879 have been effectively repealed. All apportionment acts subsequent to that of 1885,as well as the act of 1879, have been adjudged unconstitutional by this court. Parker v. State, Powell, 133 Ind. 178, and 212, 18 L. R. A. 567 and 579; Denny v. State, Basler (Ind.) 31 L. R. A. 726. There are several reasons why the act of 1885 has not been repealed: First. There has been no constitutional amendment, either state or Federal, adopted since its enactment, inconsistent with its provisions. Second. The several apportionment acts of 1891, 1893, and 1895, assuming to supersede it, have proved unconstitutional, the repeal in each one of these acts falls to the ground, by the settled adjudication of this court, because it appears from the several repealing clauses that it was only intended to repeal the former apportionment acts, upon the supposition that the new act was to take the place of the former acts upon the subject. Denny v. State, Basler, supra; State, Law, v. Blend, 121 Ind. 514, and cases there cited. And a third reason is that it is justly held in Denny v. State, Basler, supra, that the legislature may not wantonly sweep away all means of electing another legislature.

Thus, we are confronted with the preliminary question to be determined before we enter upon the investigation of the alleged unconstitutionality of the apportionment act of 1885; and that question is: Can the appellee have any right to invoke the power of this court to dissolve the state government? Can any citizen of this state have the right to invoke the power of the judiciary by injunction to put an end to the government that protects his life, his liberty, and his property? The proposition the appellee presents, stripped of all subterfuges, is that, unless the governor shall convene the legislature in extra session, there shall be no more elections of legislatures in this state, under our Constitution. But suppose we respond to the demand of the appellee, and, having entered the field of investigation, find the act of 1885 defective, and strike it down, and start the people of this state on a voyage that may lead them into the troubled sea of anarchy; and suppose, even, that the governor shall forego his resolution not to call an extra session of the legislature, and should actually convene it, and it should refuse to act, or, consenting, should pass another act as bad as the one passed in 1885, and which this court should be compelled to declare unconstitutional. The government of the state would be at an end. As was said in Denny v. State, Basler, supra, the people in the Constitution have provided that all officers except members of the legislature shall hold their respective offices during the term for which they were elected, and until their successors are elected and qualified. We may notice, in passing, that such provision points unerringly to the design of the framers of the Constitution that the functions of government, executive and administrative, should not come to an end for want of persons authorized to perform them. But as to members of the general assembly, for important and obvious reasons, a different rule was provided. That rule is that each member's official career and authority ends with the end of the term for which he is elected, whether his successor is elected or not. Therefore, if there is no law in force for the election of a legislature, and the existing legislature expires without enacting such a law, the legislative department of the state government is at an end. The other two departments must soon expire if there be no legislative department. A careful study of the whole subject convinces us that it was the intention of the framers of the supreme law to impress on its every feature the principle of perpetuity in the government. If the scheme of the appellee may be effectuated, that noble aspiration of the founders of our state government may be defeated at the suit of a single individual, by the invocation of the power they vested in the judiciary. As before observed, if the legislative department may be thus annihilated, the other two departments must soon perish, for want of sustenance by the legislative department. And, all departments being thus extinguished, the Constitution also must die, because in that event society must be reorganized, and the Constitution would have no force unless adopted by the new organization. As well ask this court to overthrow, not one provision of the Constitution, but every provision of the whole Constitution. The case before us, though undoubtedly not so intended, is, in reality, an attack upon the integrity of the state government. This court, while free to consider and decide causes at such times and in such manner as to it shall seem right and proper, under the Constitution and the law, yet can never be authorized so to act as to put an end to its own existence, or to the existence of any co-ordinate branch of the state government. Any law, however defective, must stand so long as such law is necessary for the continued movement of the political organization formed by the people. It was in this spirit that the framers of the Constitution provided in article 4, § 5, "that the first and second elections of members of the general assembly, under this Constitution, shall be according to the apportionment last made by the general assembly before the adoption of this Constitution." A reference to the apportionment so confirmed will show that it was not constructed in accordance with the provisions of the supreme law itself; and yet it is confirmed and adopted for the simple and all-sufficient reason that some law was necessary under which a legislature might be chosen. Even a defective law would be upheld, rather than that there should be no law for the election of a general assembly. The Constitution of the United States itself would compel the recognition of such a law for the election of a legislature as valid, at least until another could be enacted to take its place. In article 4, § 4, of the Federal Constitution, it is provided that "the United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government;" and it is impossible for us to conceive of a republican form of government without the election by the people of representatives in the general assembly.

The principle which required that the last apportionment law under our old Constitution should be held valid, and which requires also that the law of 1885 should be held valid, notwithstanding any constitutional defect which might exist in either, is not essentially different from the principle in accordance with which invalid proceedings in the government of municipalities are legalized by acts of the legislature, namely, that the life of the municipality, in the one case, and of the state, in the other, should be preserved. The state cannot die; and neither this court nor any other tribunal is authorized to do aught that may endanger its existence. In like manner, in a constitutional monarchy, it is not admitted that any interval of time exists between the death of one ruler and the accession of another. The cry of the herald is the voice of the law: "The king is dead! Long live the king!" So here, also, when a great president was stricken down by the hand of an assassin, there was heard, in the voice of one destined to be his successor, that sublime and inspiring declaration, "The government at Washington still lives!" It will not be admitted, either in the nation or in the state, that the government or any of its co-ordinate branches shall ever cease to exist. The machinery set in motion by the people for the creation of the legislature, the executive, and the courts, is, so to say, a living organism, and can never cease to act. Least of all should the judiciary, the guardian of the Constitution, aid in destroying the government which has its very being in the Constitution.

The learned counsel for the appellee do not deny that these consequences would follow the overthrow of the act of 1885 in case of failure of the governor to convene the legislature in time to pass a new apportionment act previous to the approaching November election, or, in case of his convening that body, it should fail to pass a valid apportionment act; but some of them insist that the idea that the executive or legislature either will fail to do their duty is "unthinkable." We presume counsel mean by this word that it is impossible to grasp the idea with our thoughts that the governor will or might fail to convene the legislature in time, or that the legislature might fail to pass a valid apportionment law in time for the election in November next. We find no difficulty whatever in grasping the idea. The like has happened before. Both the governor and the legislature have heretofore failed in duty as to apportionment laws in a marked and startling manner, as we shall see further on. But if we are bound to presume that the governor and the legislature will perform the duty resting on each in case the act of 1885 is void and out of date, then there is no cause for interference by a court of equity by the strong arm of injunction. The court being bound not to think the unthinkable idea that those departments will fail in their duty, there is no necessity for interference by a court of equity. There must be such a necessity, or no right to such relief can be demanded. See the authorities cited further on as to this point. See also 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 779–782, and authorities there cited in notes, and especially note 1, beginning on page 779. Others of appellee's learned counsel urge that we must enter the field of investigation of the unconstitutionality of the act regardless of consequences; that is, as we interpret their contention, we are bound to go forward, even though we dash the people over the precipice into the bottomless pit of anarchy, and let the consequences take care of themselves. Such a doctrine is utterly inadmissible. It is an established principle of equity jurisprudence that, if there is "a probability that more wrong will be done than prevented by the injunction prayed for, it will not be granted." 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 783, and authorities cited.

It is a matter of current history and common notoriety, as also appears by the record, that the persons who have finally consented to lend this suit their sanction and support saw clearly the perilous sea into which it was likely to lead the ship of state, and entered their solemn and patriotic protests, and yielded only such consent on a formal refusal of the executive of the state to a visiting committee requesting him to call an extra session of the legislature to pass an apportionment act. What right can the appellee have to invoke the power of this court by injunction to do what he cannot do directly, namely, to coerce the governor to exercise a discretionary power vested in him? One department of the government cannot coerce another to exercise a mere discretionary power. Hovey v. State, Schuck, 127 Ind. 588, 11 L. R. A. 763. He has already refused to act. This suit, therefore, means to end the state government or to coerce the governor.

The preliminary question confronting us is very different, indeed, from that presented in either of the cases of Parker v. State, Powell, supra, or Denny v. State, Basler, supra. In each of those cases the plaintiff, in his complaint, showed that the officers were threatening to proceed under an invalid law, and refusing to proceed under a valid law. Any citizen has a right to demand that public officers shall desist from proceeding under an invalid law, and proceed under a valid law, if there is such valid law, to hold elections. But that is a very different thing from a demand that no election shall be held at all, and that the wheels of government shall stop. Both of the apportionment cases above referred to proceeded upon the idea, and in fact left standing an apportionment act under which elections might be held in case the other departments of the government failed to supply a better one. This court, in Denny v. State, Basler, supra, in the principal opinion by Howard, J., said: "This court, in the case of Parker v. State, Powell, . . . expressly held that the constitutionality of the . . . act of 1885 was not before the court for adjudication, and accordingly refrained from making any decision in regard to it. Neither has the constitutionality of the apportionment act of 1885 been questioned in the case at bar. Consequently, that act is the last, and perhaps the only, expression of the legislative will upon the subject of apportionment, and under which senators and representatives may be chosen at the general election of 1896, unless the governor should see fit to call a special session of the legislature to pass a new apportionment law." And in the concurring opinion of Hackney, Ch. J., it was said: "The act of 1885 stands upon the statute book unchallenged. . . . Whether that act shall continue unquestioned; whether the people will follow the custom in such cases, and make their election under that law; or whether that custom will be abandoned, and public officers will refuse to follow it, and thereby defeat the constitutional object to convene an assembly in 1897,—depends upon the wisdom and patriotism of the people." These words in both opinions are no idle words. They are full of meaning and relative significance. They are no mere obiter dicta; but they express the kernel of the principle that gave the plaintiff in that case a standing in court entitling him to invoke the power of the judiciary to declare the act of 1895 unconstitutional, and that gave the defendants the right to invoke the same power to declare the act of 1893 unconstitutional. These words show that this court did not mean to accord a hearing to one who invoked its power to strike down the last barrier between the people and helpless and almost hopeless anarchy, as is attempted to be done in this case. That holding was in accord with the holding in Parker v. State, Powell, supra, which was strictly followed in the Denny Case. In the Parker Case it was said on that point by Elliott, J., in his dissenting opinion, that "if, however, it be conceded that it is necessary to decide such questions and to adjudge either of those acts void, then it is indispensably necessary to designate a valid law, either in the statutes or the Constitution, under which legislators can be chosen, for it is inconceivable that no law exists providing for legislative elections." With this proposition the majority of the court did not disagree. It will be thus seen that the principle that gave the complainant a standing in each of those cases was that the relief demanded by him did not strike down all or the last and only law providing for legislative elections.

We are not legally called upon to decide whether the act of 1885 is constitutional or unconstitutional until the preliminary question first mentioned is decided in favor of the appellee, namely, Has he a right to invoke that power vested in the judiciary? It was further said upon this point by Elliott, J., in his concurring opinion in Parker v. State, Powell, that "constitutional questions will not be decided unless the party demanding their decision makes it evident that he has a right to require the court to decide them." To the same effect is Henderson v. State, Stout, 137 Ind. 552, 24 L. R. A. 469. In Laughlin v. Lamasco, City, 6 Ind. at page 228, it is said: "Nor ought the process of injunction to be applied but with the utmost caution. It is the strong arm of the court, and to render its operation benign and useful, it should be exercised with great discretion, and only upon necessity." In no case can injunctive relief be awarded except to protect some right of the complainant. Edwards v. Haverstick, 47 Ind. 138; Alexander v. Mullen, 42 Ind. 398; Sutherland v. Lagro & M. Pl. Road Co. 19 Ind. 192; McCowan v. Whitesides, 31 Ind. 235. The appellee's complaint, instead of showing that he has a right to invoke the power of this court to strike down the last existing apportionment law, shows the direct contrary. That he has the right to invoke the power of this court, if, indeed, it possesses that power, to knock out the keystone of the arch that upholds the fair fabric of the state government, is self-evidently untrue. As already observed, the Constitution, as originally adopted, provided that the previous apportionment law should continue for the first and second legislative elections thereafter. This discloses the intention clearly enough that there should never be a time when there should be no apportionment law under which legislative elections might be held. Both the first and second legislatures elected thereafter failed to obey the mandate of the new Constitution to pass the apportionment law. But the third legislature was elected by the people without question under the old apportionment law, which was, by the literal words of the Constitution, only to last for the first and second legislative elections under the new Constitution, the old law having been framed before the new Constitution, and was not framed on the lines prescribed therein for apportionment acts. That third legislature was that of 1857, and it passed the first apportionment act under the new Constitution; and, though that instrument commanded that body to pass one every six years, yet it failed to pass another for ten years thereafter, the next one being that of 1867. And we note that the governor also failed to convene the legislature in extra session, if that was his duty, for the purpose of passing an apportionment law, on the occasion of each one of the legislatve failures above mentioned. And the legislature has failed on four other occasions to perform this duty, namely, in 1879, 1891, 1893, and in 1895, by passing unconstitutional and void acts. In view of these historical facts, it does not look as if the ideas of such failures of duty on the part of the executive and legislative departments of the government were altogether unthinkable.

It is again urged that if we may not respond to the demand of the appellee, to investigate the unconstitutionality of the act of 1885, because it is the only one in existence, there is no remedy against unconstitutional apportionment acts. Not by any means. We do not mean to depart in the least degree from the rigid rule laid down in Parker v. State, Powell, and Denny v. State, Basler, supra, but, on the contrary, we reaffirm them in their broadest terms. When the next apportionment act is passed, we will be free to inquire into its constitutionality, because the act of 1885 will stand until a valid law takes its place. This is the theory upon which the Constitution is built. While the framers of that sacred instrument, and the voters who adopted it, were all still living, they construed it to mean that the existing apportionment law, whether good or bad, in or out of date, must continue in force until a new one is enacted to take its place, and that the government shall not be brought to an untimely end because of the failure of the legislature to perform the duty enjoined upon it by the Constitution. Suppose the third legislative election under the new Constitution was about to take place, and that some one, fonder of curiosities and of tinkering with a loaded gun than of the safety of himself and others, had brought suit to enjoin the holding of that election, on the ground that there was no apportionment law, the legislature having failed to enact one, and the one provided in the Constitution having expired by the express terms of the Constitution; the courts, and especially this court wherein then sat those who had helped to make the new Constitution, would have answered such demand by saying that it was no more intended by its makers that there should ever come a time under that instrument when there should be no law in existence authorizing legislative elections than that the Creator designed that in Him man should live, move, and have his being without breath. The just fame of its authors would be greatly marred if it was contemplated by them that by the failure of any officer or body of officers under that Constitution to discharge the trust reposed in them by the people, and perform the duty enjoined by its provisions, a time might come when we would have no law in existence, authorizing legislative elections, and the people have no other security against approaching anarchy, chaos, and revolution, than a mere trust in good luck, or the good will of any man or set of men. If these great men made such a rope of sand out of the Constitution their fame has been undeserved. But the contrary is true. They never intended the people should have no other security against anarchy and revolution than good luck.

Our conclusion is that as the act of 1885 is the only law that has not been repealed or adjudged unconstitutional under which an election of members of the legislature can be held in November, 1896, the appellee has no right to invoke the powers of the courts to declare it unconstitutional; and that, therefore, the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and that the superior court erred in overruling the demurrer thereto.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to sustain the demurrer in the complaint.

Jordan, J., concurring:

I concur in the result reached in this appeal, but not in all the reasoning of the opinion of Judge McCabe. It may be conceded that the apportionment act of 1885 is replete with the evils that were condemned by this court under the decisions in the cases of Parker v. State, Powell, 133 Ind. 178 and 212, 18 L. R. A. 567 and 579, and Denny v. State, Basler (at this term) (Ind.) 31 L. R. A. 726. I am of the opinion, however, that the appellee, who seemingly brought this action in the lower court in behalf of himself and other electors of the state, has not timely exercised the right to assail the validity of the statute in controversy, and for that reason, at least, his case is devoid of equity; and, under the circumstances, he is not in a condition to demand that the court shall interpose and award the extraordinary writ of injunction to prevent the appellants, who are public officers, from doing the acts of which he complains. The statute in dispute ran through an entire sexennial period, during which time it was acquiesced in by the people, and its validity was not challenged in any court; and, under its provisions, three successive general assemblies were elected by the voters of this state. It is true that, during the time this statute was in active operation, it was criticised and denounced by the public press, and upon the stump; yet no attempt was made to assail it in court during the running of its sexennial period, and thereby secure a judicial determination of its validity. It is a familiar maxim that equity aids the vigilant, and not those who sleep upon their rights. It promotes diligence in a suitor, and punishes his "laches," by denying his request for the relief which he might have obtained had he applied therefor in due season. I fail to recognize anything, under the circumstances in the case at bar, which will shield the appellee from the force and effect of the salutary rule to which we have referred. As stated heretofore, the great body of the state's electors seems to have accepted this statute, and biennially, for the period of six years, exercised the right to elect representatives and senators thereunder; and now, after the lapse of this period, and at a time when it is conceded by his counsel that there remains no other law under which the next general assembly can be elected, the appellee invokes the judiciary to inquire into the constitutionality of the act in question, and grant the extraordinary relief demanded, regardless of the consequences that may follow.

It is manifest, I think, that, under the status occupied by the appellee and the circumstances of the case in general, this cannot be done without violating the fundamental principles of equity. It is not apparent that any special beneficial results will inure to the appellee if the statute in question should be adjudged to be invalid, while, upon the other hand, injurious ones might result to the public; hence, under such circumstances, it is evident that equitable rules do not require a court to award the relief requested by the appellee. It is true, as contended by the eminent and learned counsel for the latter, as a general proposition, that courts have nothing to do with the consequences that follow from their decisions; yet, under the state of facts in this cause, the question of the probable results that the public may sustain if a decision should be adverse to the statute in dispute becomes a potent factor in deciding whether the relief sought by the action should be granted. Again, it may be said that if, under the existing emergency, the governor declines to convene the present general assembly in extra session, to enact an apportionment law, and thereby the electors are virtually driven to elect, under the act of 1885, members of the house of representatives and successors to the senators who were elected in 1892, it cannot, in reason, be urged that the courts ought to interpose and forbid them to exercise the right of so doing. The judgment should be reversed, and the lower court directed to sustain the demurrer to the complaint, for want of equity.

Monks, J., dissenting:

I dissent from both the reasoning and the conclusion reached in the prevailing opinion. The apportionment act of 1885, tested by the principles established in the cases of Parker v. State, Powell, 133 Ind. 178 and 212, 18 L. R. A.

567 and 579, and Denny v. State, Basler (Ind.) 31 L. R. A. 726, where this court held the apportionment acts of 1879, 1891, 1893, and 1895 unconstitutional, is clearly and without doubt unconstitutional and void. It is not a law, and is inoperative for any purpose. It confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; and is the same as if it had never been passed. Johnson v. Randolph County, 140 Ind., on page 156; Strong v. Daniel, 5 Ind. 348; Sumner v. Beeler, 50 Ind. 341, 19 Am. Rep. 718; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 222; Black, Const. Law, p. 64, § 37. It is not the judgment of a court that renders a statute unconstitutional, but the fact that it is in conflict with some provision of the Constitution. A statute, therefore, that is repugnant to any provision of the Constitution, is void before as well as after it is so adjudged. The fact that no court has ever passed upon the question does not render such statute constitutional and valid. Therefore, the apportionment act of 1885 is no more valid and binding than the apportionment acts of 1891, 1893, and 1895, which have been adjudged unconstitutional by this court. This court has uniformly held that, when it clearly appears that a statute is repugnant to or is in conflict with any provision of the Constitution, it is the plain duty of the courts to declare it null and void. Campbell v. Dwiggins, 83 Ind., 473, 480; Parker v. State, Powell, 133 Ind., on pages 187 and 212, 18 L. R. A. 567 and 579; Denny v. State Basler, supra. Indeed, it is not claimed in the prevailing opinion that the apportionment act of 1885 is constitutional, but it is not held invalid for the sole reason given that it is the only statute on that subject, and that, if held invalid, the governor may not call a special session of the general assembly, or, if it does, the general assembly may not enact a constitutional apportionment law, and anarchy may follow. In response to a suggestion of like character in McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 869, the court, by Chief Justice Fuller, said: "It is argued that the subject-matter of the controversy is not of judicial cognizance, because it is said that all questions connected with the election of a presidential elector are political in their nature; that the court has no power finally to dispose of them; and that its decision would be subject to review by political officers and agencies, as the state board of canvassers, the legislature in joint convention, and the governor, or finally, Congress. . . . The question of the validity of this act, as presented to us by this record, is a judicial question, and we cannot decline the exercise of our jurisdiction upon the inadmissible suggestion that action might be taken by political agencies in disregard of the judgment of the highest tribunal of the state as revised by our own." This doctrine was approved by the supreme court of New Jersey in State, Morris, v. Wrightson, 56 N. J. L. 126, 22 L. R. A. 548.

It is the duty of each department of the state government to act in the discharge of all duties upon the presumption that the other departments will properly perform all duties incumbent upon them. It is only when the action of the several departments of the state government is governed by this rule that its perpetuity and safety are assured. Any other course tends to bring confusion and anarchy. This court, therefore, should decide all questions properly presented upon the presumption that the executive and legislative departments of the state government will not neglect any duty, or fail to perform any function imposed upon them by the Constitution. There is much less danger of anarchy by this course than for this court to declare an unconstitutional law valid, or decline to pass upon the question of its constitutionality, for the reason that the other departments named might fail or refuse to perform the duties imposed by the organic law. The suggestion that either the legislative or executive department of the state government might fail or refuse to perform the duties imposed by the Constitution, as a reason why this court should not adjudge the apportionment act of 1885 unconstitutional, as it clearly is, or as a reason why this court should decline to pass upon that question, is certainly, in the language of Chief Justice Fuller, "inadmissible," and should not be considered by the court. To do so is an unwarranted reflection on the co-ordinate branches of the state government. In Parker v. State, Powell (decided in December, 1892), 133 Ind. 178, 18 L. R. A. 567, before the meeting of the general assembly in January, 1893, this court said: "If, at the next ensuing election, the state is without a valid law creating senatorial and representative districts under the enumeration of 1889, the responsibility must rest with the legislature, and not with the judicial department of the state government." This same argument was also considered and answered in the apportionment cases decided by the supreme courts of Michigan and Wisconsin. In Giddings v. Blacker, 93 Mich. 1, 16 L. R. A. 402, Morse, Ch. J., said: "We do not care to go further, since there is a remedy in the hands of the executive and legislature. The consequences of this decision are not for us. It is our duty to declare the law, to point out the invasion of the Constitution, and to forbid it." In State, Atty. Gen., v. Cunningham, 81 Wis. 440, 15 L. R. A. 561, Pinney, J., said: "No difficulty, it is believed, need be apprehended as to the result of the decision the court has felt it to be its imperative duty to make; and our respect for the executive of the state, whose duty it is to 'take care that the laws are faithfully executed,' forbids any apprehension that he will fail in the least in meeting the present emergency, or to take such measures as in his wisdom seem best to give full effect to the Constitution and the laws." In the same case, Lyon, Ch. J., said: "Neither is the jurisdiction of the court affected, or the exercise thereof embarrassed, by the fact that this decision may leave the state without a valid legislative apportion ment law, and hence without any law for the election of another legislature. The governor may convene the present legislature, if he deems it his duty to do so, and when so convened there can be no doubt of its power to enact a valid legislative apportionment law." In the Legal Tender Cases, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 457, 20 L. ed. 287, Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court, referred to the situation of the country when the acts were passed, and the "great business disarrangement, widespread distress, and rankest injustice" that would result if said acts were held invalid, but he added: "The consequences of which we have spoken, serious as they are, must be accepted, if there is a clear incompatibility between the Constitution and the legal tender acts."

The proposition that this court should hold an unconstitutional law valid, or refuse to pass upon the question of its validity, because some other department of the government might fail or refuse to perform the duties imposed upon it by the organic law, is a dangerous and vicious doctrine, and is not, I think, sustained by reason, and is clearly against the great weight of the authorities. Neither can I concur in the proposition that the people, having acted upon the apportionment of 1885, by electing three successive general assemblies under it, it is now too late to raise the question of its validity. The authorities cited in support of this doctrine have reference to actions to enforce private rights concerning property, and can have no application in a case like the one before us. This court, in Denny v. State, Basler (Ind.) 31 L. R. A. 726, said: "Neither do we think there is any estoppel here, as in the case of Vickery v. Hendricks County Comrs. 134 Ind. 554, to which we are referred. There, the party bringing suit to enjoin a levy of taxes to pay for bonds issued on purchase of a toll road, had waited until he received the benefit of the bonds before asking the court to declare unconstitutional the law under which they were issued. Here, while there may be some question of private or personal benefit, yet the issue before the court is much broader. The action concerns all the people of the state, in their most enlarged and sacred relations of citizenship and government, and the case cannot be tied up with the purely private rights of anyone. It is true that an action to test the constitutionality of the law, if brought at all, should have been pressed to a final determination in the first place. . . . Yet the people of the state, in their sovereign capacity, cannot for such reasons be estopped from asking for a determination of the validity of a law under which it is now proposed that they shall elect their next legislature. When the people of the state appear at this bar with such an issue, there can be no question of estoppel. The inquiry is one reaching the foundations of government." In Parker v. State, Powell, supra, this court held that the apportionment act of 1879 was unconstitutional, notwithstanding three successive general assemblies had been elected thereunder, and more than thirteen years had elapsed since its enactment. Yet it has only been eleven years since the apportionment act of 1885 was passed. Lapse of time, however, cannot, in a case like the one at bar, render an unconstitutional statute valid or secure from attack, or deprive the people of their right to question its validity. We think the correct doctrine was declared in State, Morris, v. Wrightson, 56 N. J. L., on page 208, 22 L. R. A. 548, quoting the language of Judge Cooley: "Acquiescence for no length of time can legalize a clear usurpation of power, when the people have plainly expressed their will in the Constitution and appointed judicial tribunals to enforce it." The subject of acquiescence in unconstitutional apportionment statutes, as affecting the right of an elector to have the validity of the act determined, was considered by the supreme court of New Jersey, in State, Morris, v. Wrightson, supra, where it was claimed that a particular method of apportionment had been acquiesced in ever since the adoption of the Constitution by all parts of the state government, and by the people, and that, therefore, it was no longer subject to question. But it was held by the court that this doctrine had no application whatever in a case where it appeared that the mandates of the Constitution had not been obeyed. The court said: "The Constitution contains the permanent will of the people. It is paramount to the power of the legislature, and can be revoked or altered only by the power which created it. Popular government can be maintained only by upholding the Constitution at all times and on all occasions as it was when it came from the hands of the people, by whose fiat it was established as the fundamental articles of government, to abide until altered by the authority which created it. To adopt the language of Chief Justice Bronson, in Oakley v. Aspinwall, 3 N. Y. 568: 'There is always some plausible reason for the latitudinarian constructions which are resorted to for the purpose of acquiring power,—some evil to be avoided, or some good to be attained by pushing the powers of the government beyond their legitimate boundary. It is by yielding to such influences that Constitutions are gradually undermined, and finally overthrown. . . . One step taken by the legislature or the judiciary in enlarging the powers of the government opens the door for another, which will be sure to follow; and so the process goes on, until all respect for the fundamental law is lost, and the powers of the government are just what those in authority please to call them.' Within the domain of construction there is room for argument and discussion,—nay, even for a diversity of opinion; but when the meaning of the Constitution, interpreted by its letter and in its spirit is ascertained, extraneous considerations are of no avail. In the process of construction, long use and practical interpretation are entitled to great weight if the language be obscure or doubtful; but such extraneous considerations cannot be allowed 'to abrogate the text' or 'fritter away its obvious sense.' I have already said that on a construction of the words of the constitutional provision regulating this subject, fortified by the policy and institutions which prevailed in this state prior to the framing of the Constitution, and a comparison of other of its provisions, the constitutional mandate requires the election of members of the general assembly by the legal voters of the counties respectively, and that the division of counties into assembly districts, and the distribution of the members among these districts for the purpose of electing such members is in conflict with the constitutional mandate. No one can examine the legislation on this subject from 1871 to the present time and contemplate the results without realizing the evils which have been fostered under this system. Relief from these wrongs through the ballot box cannot be assured, the majority in the legislature being elected under this system by a minority of the legal voters of the state. Precedent has been followed by retaliation, to be repeated from time to time as supremacy in the legislature has passed from one political party to the other. For this condition of affairs the only remedy is by a return to constitutional methods." State, Morris, v. Wrightson, 56 N. J. L. 214, 22 L. R. A. 548. It is said in Cooley, Const. Lim. 87, note, in criticising the action of certain courts in declaring a statute to be constitutional which was not: "But it would have been interesting and useful if either of these learned courts had enumerated the evils that must be placed in the opposite scale when the question is whether a constitutional rule shall be disregarded, not the least of which is, the encouragement of a disposition on the part of legislative bodies to set aside constitutional restrictions, in the belief that, if the unconstitutional law can once be put in force, and large interests enlisted under it, the courts will not venture to declare it void, but will submit to the usurpation, no matter how gross and daring. We agree with the supreme court of Indiana, that, in construing constitutions, courts have nothing to do with the argument ab inconvenienti, and should not "bend the Constitution to suit the law of the hour.' Greencastle Twp. v. Black, 5 Ind. 557, 565, and with Bronson, Ch. J., in what he says in Oakley v. Aspinwall, 3 N. Y. 547, 568."

It is now more than five months to the next general election, and ample time remains for the proper authorities to take such steps as may be deemed necessary to protect the rights of the people, and see "that the laws are faithfully executed." If, however, the election were so near at hand that such steps could not reasonably be taken, the court might properly withhold its decision until after the election was held; but in no event would the court be justified in adjudging that an unconstitutional apportionment act was valid, or in refusing to pass upon the question of its validity. To do so is to disregard the provisions of the Constitution, which every officer is sworn to support. It is proper to say that the quotation made in the prevailing opinion from the separate opinion of Elliott, J., in Parker v. State, Powell, supra, is from that part of the opinion in which he expresses his dissent from the action of the majority in declaring the apportionment act of 1891 unconstitutional, and that the language quoted gives one of the reasons he urged why the court should not pass upon the question. The majority of the court, however, passed upon the question, and held said act unconstitutional. The judgment should be affirmed.

(.....Ind.....)

1. The grant of the right of appeal in annexation proceedings to resident freeholders only does not deny to nonresident holders equal privileges or immunities.

2. The annexation of territory to a city is not a taking of the property therein situated nor does it deprive any person of property within the constitutional provision as to due process.

3. A statute treating all owners of land in territory to be annexed to a city alike under like circumstances and conditions does not deprive anyone of the equal protection of the laws, although it permits an appeal only by residents of the territory to be annexed.

4. The elimination of a provision giving a right of appeal to resident owners only from a statute providing for annexation may be made, if that provision is unconstitutional, without destroying the whole statute.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action to enjoin defendants from placing certain property on the tax duplicate of the city of Indianapolis as city property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. E. Scott and James B. Curtis for appellants.

Mr. A. J. Beveridge for appellee.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee and another, whose death was suggested of record in the court below, before judgment, sued the appellant Taggart, as auditor, and the appellant the city of Indianapolis, to enjoin each of them from extending certain described lands upon the tax duplicate of the county and city as city property. It is shown that the threatened extension was about to be made by virtue of the annexation of certain contiguous territory to said city, which included 75 acres of unplatted farm land belonging to the plaintiffs; that such annexation was claimed by the defendants to have been effected by virtue of an ordinance adopted and passed by the common council of said city November 8, 1893, under and pursuant to the provisions of §§ 37 and 38 of the charter of said city approved March 6, 1891 (Acts 1891, p. 137; Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 3808, 3809). The circuit court overruled separate demurrers by each of the defendants to the complaint, assigning insufficiency of the facts stated therein to constitute a cause of action against each; and said defendants declining to plead over, and standing on their demurrers, the court entered a decree perpetually enjoining both defendants from entering said lands upon said duplicates for the purposes of city taxation, as prayed for in the complaint. The right to tax the property for city purposes is not questioned on account of any formal or substantial defect in the ordinance of annexation, or for want of the observance of any legal requirements in the passage of the ordinance either formal or substantial, but it is claimed that the defect is in the sections of the statute above referred to, constituting a part of the city charter. The NOTE.—As to proceedings to annex territory to a city, see also Forsyth v. Hammond (Ind.) 30 L. R. A. 576.

As to the legislative power to annex territory to municipal corporations, see note to State, Richards, v. Cincinnati (Ohio) 27 L. R. A. 737.

contention is that said sections are void because they violate the Constitution of the state and the United States. The 1st section above mentioned provides that "the common council shall have power, by ordinance, to declare and define the entire corporate boundaries of such city. . . . Such ordinance . . . may include contiguous territory, whether platted or not, not previously annexed. . . . Said common council may also, by separate ordinance, not purporting to define the entire boundaries of such city, annex contiguous territory, whether platted or not, to such city, and . . . shall be conclusive evidence . . . that the territory therein described was properly annexed, and constitutes a part of such city except as provided in the next section." The next section provides, among other things, that "whenever such . . . territory . . . is unplatted ground, an appeal may be taken from such annexation, by one or more resident freeholders in the territory sought to be annexed, filing their remonstrance in writing against such annexation, together with a copy of such ordinance, in the circuit or superior courts of the county where such territory is situated. . . . Such written remonstrance or complaint shall state the reason why such annexation ought not in justice to take place. . . . The court shall thereupon proceed to hear and determine such appeal without the intervention of a jury, and shall give judgment upon the question of such annexation according to the evidence which either party may introduce, relevant to the issue. If the court shall be satisfied upon the hearing that less than 75 per cent of the resident freeholders of the territory sought to be annexed have remonstrated, and that the adding of such territory to the city will be for its interest, and will cause no manifest injustice to the persons owning real estate in the territory sought to be annexed, he shall so find, and said annexation shall take place. If the court shall be satisfied that 75 per cent or more of the resident freeholders of the territory sought to be annexed have remonstrated, such annexation shall not take place, unless the court shall find from the evidence that the prosperity of such city and territory will be materially retarded, and the safety of the inhabitants and property thereof endangered without such annexation."

The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs, though owners of the unplatted ground in question, included in the territory annexed, were and are not residents within said territory, but were and are residents within the city of Indianapolis. It is contended, therefore, that as the right of appeal is given only to resident freeholders in the territory sought to be annexed, and the same right impliedly denied to owners of land in the territory who do not reside therein, they are denied the equal protection of the law, their property taken without due process of law, and that privileges and immunities are granted to such resident owners which are denied to the plaintiffs on the same terms. It is urged at great length and with much ability that the sections are void, because they violate section 23 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which provides that "the general assembly shall not grant to any citizen, or any class of citizens, privileges or immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens." If we were to concede that the statute in question, giving the right of appeal to residents, and in denying the same right to land owners not residing within the territory in question, is a violation of the constitutional provision quoted, it does not follow that the appellee's contention can be upheld, that the whole of both sections of the charter are void. A statute may be unconstitutional in part and valid as to the residue. Clark v. Ellis, 2 Blackf. 8; Madison & I. R. Co. v. Whiteneck, 8 Ind. 217; State v. Newton, 59 Ind. 173; Wallace v. Marion County Comrs. 37 Ind. 383; Campbell v. Dwiggins, 83 Ind. 473; Ingerman v. Noblesville Twp. 90 Ind. 393; Indianapolis v. Bieler, 138 Ind. 30. If the unconstitutional portions of a statute can be stricken out, and still leave a complete statute, the unconstitutional portions must be regarded eliminated, and the remainder of the statute must be enforced. State, Law, v. Blend, 121 Ind. 514; State, Collett, v. Gorby, 122 Ind. 17. The only part of the statute here in question that can at all be regarded as in conflict with the constitutional provision quoted is that part giving a right of appeal only to the resident freeholders. That part of the statute may be eliminated without in any way impairing the force of the provisions authorizing the common council to annex the territory. That part of the statute being eliminated, there is no discrimination between resident and nonresident owners of unplatted land within the territory to be annexed. They are all treated as the owners of platted ground within the territory to be annexed, are, namely, given no right of appeal whatever. It is established law that territory may be annexed to a city with or without the consent of the inhabitants of the territory affected. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 1007–1009, and authorities there cited; Stilz v. Indianapolis, 55 Ind. 515, and authorities there cited. Appellee's learned counsel concede this to be the law, but contend that, the right of appeal being given to one class of owners, such right must be given to all, or the statute will be unconstitutional and void. But we are of opinion that the provision as to appeal is not in conflict with the section of the Bill of Rights quoted above. The ultimate right of annexation is made to depend practically upon the voice of 75 per cent of the resident freeholders of the territory to be affected. It is the convenience, safety, and well-being of the inhabitants of the territory to be affected on the one hand, and that of the city on the other, that the statute makes the criterion for determining the question of annexation. And, in order to insure permanency of interest in the inhabitants that are given a voice on the question, they are required to be freeholders. The convenience, safety, and protection of a resident land owner in the territory may be, and very likely is, different from that of a nonresident land owner in the territory. The one may be interested in, and need, police and fire protection, water, light, and gas, which the city might afford to him on slight cost; whereas the nonresident might not desire or have any use for such things, and hence ought no more, in justice, to have a voice in preventing the residents from securing these advantages than he should be allowed a vote on the levy of a local school tax in that territory, simply because he owned property therein. Therefore the grant of the right of appeal to the resident freeholders only is not a grant to any citizens or class of citizens of privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, do not equally belong to all citizens. The terms upon which they are to have a voice in the annexation are such an interest therein as a resident has.

But it is insisted that the nonresident has an interest as a taxpayer. His relation to the public or to the state as a taxpayer is not changed by being transferred from one political subdivision of the state to another. Stilz v. Indianapolis, supra. It is true, such transfer makes him liable to taxation in the city, but it only changes his liability as to local taxation. His liability to state and county taxation remains unchanged. While annexation makes him liable to city taxation for local purposes, he is freed from local taxation in the township or political subdivision wherein he was taxed before annexation. But it is earnestly urged that city taxation must be so much higher in the city than outside of it that his rights as to the burdens of taxation are seriously and materially affected by annexation. That, however, is a matter that the courts can take no judicial cognizance of, unless they also take cognizance of the fact that the benefits to be derived from the expenditure of public money raised by taxation in the city would be correspondingly increased; so that in either event the rights of such taxpayer are not affected by such transfer. Stilz v. Indianapolis, supra; Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. ed. 658.

What we have already said almost disposes of the alleged conflict of the statute with the clause in the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides: "Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Due process of law and equal protection of the laws are distinct and independent rights, secured to each individual by this constitutional provision, as appellee's learned counsel contends. But it results almost inevitably from what we have before said, that annexation of territory to a city is not a taking of the property, nor does it deprive any person of his property. Such is now the settled law in this state, and by the Supreme Court of the United States. Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 26 L. ed. 658, supra; Stilz v. Indianapolis, supra; 1 Beach, Pub. Corp. § 398, and authorities there cited. Therefore there is no question of due process of law involved in the case. The Constitution of Missouri gives the right of appeal from the circuit to the supreme court of the state except in certain counties, including St. Louis and some others adjacent thereto, named, and the city of St. Louis. In those counties and in that city an appeal lies to the St. Louis court of appeals instead of the supreme court of the state. The Supreme Court of the United States held this no denial of the equal protection of the law. Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 29, 25 L. ed. 991. In Hayes v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68, 30 L. ed. 578, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said: "The 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not prohibit legislation which is limited either in the objects to which it is directed, or by the territory within which it is to operate. It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and the liabilities imposed." To the same effect are McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 39, 36 L. ed. 879; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 709, 28 L. ed. 1147. We have already seen that all owners of land in the territory to be annexed are by the statute in question treated alike under like circumstances and conditions, and hence it does not deprive anyone of the equal protection of the laws. Therefore the statute does not violate the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

It follows from what we have said that the complaint of the appellee did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and therefore the circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer thereto.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Almeda J. WADSWORTH
v.
Fred P. MARSHALL.

(88 Me. 263.)

1. The frightening of horses by the noise of an explosion in blasting rock is one of the dangers which it is intended to guard against by Rev. Stat. chap. 17, § 23, requiring reasonable notice of the explosion, and § 24 declaring liability, in case the provision is violated, for all damages caused by the explosion.

2. Persons "approaching," to whom notice is required by Rev. Stat. chap. 17, § 23, by persons blasting rock, include those who have passed the point nearest the blasting and are receding from it, if they are in near proximity and not a safe distance from the place of explosion.

3. Driving a vicious horse not properly broken, and unsafe for the purpose, may contribute to the injury when the horse is frightened by blasting rock, so as to constitute a defense to the statutory liability for failure to give notice of the explosion.

(January 10, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Knox County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Sustained.

Plaintiff was riding along a public highway near which defendant was operating a quarry. He exploded a blast without giving notice thereof as required by statute. Plaintiff's horse took fright and injury to plaintiff resulted. The testimony showed that at the time the blast was fired the horse was 465 feet distant from the point where the blast was fired; that the point of the blast was 77 feet below the street level and 290 feet from the line of the street. At the time the blast was fired plaintiff was going away from and not toward the place of the blast.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. C. E. Littlefield and A. S. Littlefield, for plaintiff:

The court is to bear in mind the circumstances under which the act was passed, as "the object which the lawmakers had in view, the mischief sought to be remedied, together with the remedy itself, are to be considered." Donnell v. Joy, 85 Me. 119.

It is impossible to use the term "explosion" without having in mind the fact that its principal characteristic is as defined, "a sudden and loud discharge, as the explosion of powder." What legal distinction is there as to cause and effect between frightening the plaintiff's horse by striking him with a piece of rock from a blast and frightening him by "a sudden and loud discharge, as the explosion of powder?"

Herrington v. Lansingburgh, 110 N. Y. 145.

Mr. W. H. Fogler for defendant.

Strout, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The exceptions in this case required a construction of chapter 17, § 23, of the Revised Statutes, which provides that "persons engaged in blasting lime rock or other rock shall, before each explosion, give seasonable notice thereof, so that all persons or teams approaching shall have time to retire to a safe distance from the place of said explosion; and no such explosion shall be made after sunset."

Section 24 provides a penalty against any one violating the provision, and makes such person "liable for all damages caused by any explosion."

Statutes are to receive the construction intended by the legislature. "To ascertain this, we may look to the object in view, to the remedy intended to be afforded, and to the mischief intended to be remedied." Winslow v. Kimball, 25 Me. 495. "The duty of the court, being satisfied of the intention of the legislature, clearly expressed in a constitutional enactment, is to give effect to that intention, and not to defeat it by adhering too rigidly to the mere letter of the statute, or to technical rules of construction." Oates v. First Nat. Bank, 100 U. S. 244, 25 L. ed. 582. "And we should discard any construction that would lead to absurd consequences." Gray v. County Comrs. 83 Me. 435. "The meaning of the legislature may be extended beyond the precise words used in the law, from the reason or motive upon which the legislature proceeded, from the end in view, or the purpose which was designed." United States v. Freeman, 44 U. S. 3 How. 565, 11 L. ed. 728. So, in Murray v. Baker, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 541, 4 L. ed. 454, the words "beyond seas," in a state statute of limitations, were held to mean "out of the state."

To apply these principles: When the law was enacted, it was well known that extensive quarrying of lime and other rocks, in close proximity to much traveled highways, was done, and that persons traveling on such highways were thereby greatly endangered, not only from flying rocks, but from the frightening of horses by the noise of the explosion. The intention of the legislature, in passing the act, was to insure safety from these dangers. Hence, notice of the "explosion" was required to be given to travelers in time for them to "retire to a safe distance." It is argued that the mischief intended to be remedied was that of flying rocks or other débris, and that the frightening of horses by the noise of the explosion is not covered by the statute. We cannot concur in this view. The safety of the traveler was intended to be secured. Many of the quarries are so far below the surface of the ground that there is little danger of flying rocks reaching the highway. The traveler's danger from missiles is much less than that from the frightening of horses from the noise of the explosion. Both these dangers were present in the minds of the legislature, when a remedy was proposed, and they evidently intended by this statute to guard against both. One of Webster's definitions of the word "explosion" is "a bursting with violence and loud noise, because of internal pressure." The remedy given by § 24 is for "all damages caused by any explosion." Whether the damage is caused by the noise of the explosion or by flying substances is immaterial. Whatever damage may be caused by the explosion, whether by noise and its effect on horses, or otherwise, is within the statute protection, and the basis of liability.

It is claimed that the statute protection applies only to those "approaching" the point of explosion, and does not include those who have passed the point nearest the blast, and are receding from it, though they may be in near proximity, and not "a safe distance from the place." Such construction leads to absurd results, and cannot be accepted as the meaning of the legislature. The word "approaching" in the statute, when considered with reference to the danger guarded against, and the remedy provided must be regarded as equivalent to "in proximity to the place of explosion," "within the limit of danger."

The requested instructions were rightfully refused.

Exceptions are taken to the exclusion of testimony, offered by the defendant, to prove that the horse with which plaintiff was riding at the time of the injury was vicious, but properly broken, and unsafe for the purpose for which it was then being used.

While the statute affixes a penalty to its violation, and is so far penal in character, the damages to be recovered by an injured party are only the actual damages suffered, and in this the provision is remedial, and to be construed as such.

The statute requires seasonable notice of an explosion. Failure to give it is negligence, which subjects the delinquent to the payment of damages caused by his negligence. But it does not follow that the injured party is thereby relieved of all obligation to exercise due care on his part. It is possible that the explosion, of which no notice was given, may have frightened plaintiff's horse, and the vicious character or untrained habit or negligent driving of the horse after the fright, which might have been slight, contributed to the injury, or might have been the proximate cause. The instruction proceeded upon the ground that, if no notice of the explosion, such as the statute required, was given, the defendant would be liable, regardless of the character of the horse or any other negligence of the plaintiff. In Hussey v. King, 83 Me. 571, which was an action under Rev. Stat. chap. 30, § 1, to recover for injuries caused by the bite of a dog, it was held that the owner or keeper of a dog was prima facie, absolutely liable for injury inflicted by the animal, and that the plaintiff need not allege or prove, in the first instance, either his own care or the defendant's negligence. But the court carefully reserved as undecided, the question whether the acts of the injured person provocative of the dog could be successfully shown in defense.

Under the statute subjecting towns to liability for injuries caused by defective highways, it has uniformly been held, in this state, that the plaintiff cannot recover unless he was in the exercise of due care, and that this must be shown affirmatively by the plaintiff. In Taylor v. Carew Mfg. Co. 143 Mass. 470, which was a case under a statute making corporations owning factories liable for damages to an employee if the openings of elevators were not protected in a manner specified, the court held that, "where a statute does not otherwise provide, . . . the rule requiring the plaintiff, in an action for negligence, to show that, at the time of the injury complained of, he was in the exercise of due care, is the same, whether the action is brought under a statute or at common law. The doctrine of contributory negligence governs both classes of actions." And this court said, in Hussey v. King, 83 Me. 572, the "rule applies not only to actions given by the common law, but also to those given solely by statute, where the gist of the action is the default, omission, or carelessness of the defendant." Whether the same rule should apply to the class of actions to which the present suit belongs, need not be decided, as the defendant did not raise the question, but proceeded upon the ground that, when the plaintiff had shown the absence of sufficient notice of the explosion, and an injury resulting, she had made a prima facie case, and that the burden then rested upon the defense to show plaintiff's contributory negligence.

That the action in this case is based upon the omission and neglect of the defendant does not admit of doubt. If he had given the notice as required, and had not been guilty of any other fault, no liability would have arisen, even if plaintiff had suffered an injury. What would be a "safe distance" does not necessarily or probably mean "absolutely beyond all sound of the explosion." The plaintiff might have driven to a point so far removed as to properly be considered a safe distance, and yet an unbroken or vicious horse might have been frightened by the noise of a distant explosion, which would not have had that effect upon a horse suitable to drive. In such case, the fault of the horse would contribute to the injury, if, indeed, it might not be regarded as the proximate cause. It would be a harsh construction of the statute to hold that the negligence of the quarryman in not giving notice subjected him to liability for damages largely, if not wholly, resulting from the negligence of the traveler in riding with an unsuitable horse. An animal suitable to drive might, notwithstanding a fright, be immediately controlled, and no injury occur, while an untamed or vicious horse might not be amenable to control, and hence an injury. Both law and sound reason concur in the proposition that a negligent party is liable for injuries caused by his own negligence to a person who is not guilty of negligence which contributes to the injury, and not otherwise. The statute, affording this remedy to an injured party is little more than a reiteration of the common law; the only difference being that the failure to give notice of an explosion is made negligence per se, and is not excused by any amount of care in other respects.

This action, under the statute, is remedial. Defendant is liable for the consequences of his negligence, if no negligence of the plaintiff contributed to the injury. If it did, plaintiff cannot recover. The established doctrine of contributory negligence, as a defense, applies to this class of actions.

The evidence in the case is not reported, and we cannot know whether the offered proof as to the character of the horse, in connection with the other evidence in the case, would have shown contributory negligence of the plaintiff. But it was an element in that proposition, and should have been admitted.

Exceptions sustained.

1. An order on a savings bank is not negotiable when upon its face, although below the signature, it says: "The bank book of the depositor must accompany this order," since this constitutes a contingency which may impair its circulation.

2. It is common knowledge that all savings banks in the state have a by-law requiring the production of the depositor's book in order to obtain any money deposited.

NOTE.—Closely similar to the above case is that of Iron City Nat. Bank v. McCord (Pa.) 11 L. R. A. 559.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Piscataquis County made during the trial of an action by the indorsee of an order on a savings bank which resulted in a judgment in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The order is not negotiable.

In 1891 the Pennsylvania supreme court had the matter before it upon an order precisely like the one in the case at bar. The court says: "It is a necessary quality of negotiable paper that it should be simple, certain, unconditional, not subject to any contingency."

To be within the rule that prevents negotiability, the contingency or conditions must be such as will embarrass the paper in its course of circulation; but a memorandum which is merely directory or collateral will not affect it.

Foster, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sues as indorsee of an order, signed by the defendant, of the following tenor:

$120. Dover, Oct. 27, 1893.

Piscataquis Savings Bank.

Pay James Lawler, or order, one hundred and twenty dollars and charge to my account on book No. ———.

N. J. Cushing.

Witness, ———

The bank book of the depositor must accompany this order.

The order was indorsed in blank, on the back by James Lawler and Samuel Lewis, and the plaintiff claimed to recover against the defendant as upon a negotiable instrument. The real question presented is whether the instrument declared on is negotiable, so that an action may be maintained upon it in the name of the indorsee.

To constitute a negotiable draft or order, it must be a written order from one party to another for the payment of a certain sum of money, and that absolutely, and without any contingency that would embarrass its circulation, to a third party or his order, or bearer. It has often been held that a bill or note is not negotiable if made payable out of a particular fund. But there is a distinction between such instruments made payable out of a particular fund, and those that are simply chargeable to a particular account. In the latter case the payment is not made to depend upon the adequacy of that fund, the only purpose being to inform the drawee as to his means of reimbursement, and the negotiability of the instrument is not affected by it.

The objection that is raised to the negotiability of this instrument is, not that it is made payable out of a particular fund, but that it is subject to such a contingency as necessarily embarrasses its circulation, and imposes a restraint upon its negotiability, by means of these words, contained upon the face of the order: "The bank book of the depositor must accompany this order." Although these words are upon the face of the order, below the signature of the drawer, they were there at the time of its inception, became a substantive part of it, and qualified its terms as if they had been inserted in the body of the instrument. Littlefield v. Coombs, 71 Me. 110; Cushing v. Field, 70 Me. 50, 54, 35 Am. Rep. 293; Johnson v. Heagan, 23 Me. 329; Barnard v. Cushing, 4 Met. 230, 38 Am. Dec. 362; Heywood v. Perrin, 10 Pick. 228, 20 Am. Dec. 518; Benedict v. Cowden, 49 N. Y. 396, 10 Am. Rep. 382; Costelo v. Crowell, 127 Mass. 293, 34 Am. Rep. 367, and cases there cited.

Was the order negotiable? The answer to that depends upon the effect of the words: "The bank book of the depositor must accompany this order." If not negotiable, the plaintiff, as indorsee, cannot maintain an action upon it. Noyes v. Gillman, 65 Me. 589. If their effect is such as to constitute a contingency in relation to the payment of the order, dependent upon the production of the drawer's bank book by the holder or indorsee of the order, then they must be regarded as such an embarrassment to the negotiation of the order, and such a restriction upon its circulation for commercial purposes as to render it nonnegotiable. Without these words, the order is payable absolutely, and there is no apparent uncertainty affecting its negotiability. With them the order is payable only upon contingency or condition, and that is upon the production of the drawer's bank book. This is rendered imperative from the language employed, and the bank upon which the order was drawn would have the right to insist upon such production of the book in compliance with the terms of the order; and the case shows that it has refused payment upon presentation of the order, for the reason that it was not accompanied by the bank book. It cannot, therefore, be regarded as payable absolutely, and without any contingency that would embarrass its circulation. The drawer has it in his power to defeat its payment by withholding the bank book. Certainly, the bank book of the depositor is within his own control, rather than that of the indorsee of this order.

It was the necessity of certainty and precision in mercantile affairs, and the inconveniences which would result if commercial paper incumbered with conditions and contingencies, that led to the establishment of an inflexible rule that, to be negotiable, they must be payable absolutely, and without any conditions or contingencies to embarrass their circulation. American Exchange Bank v. Blanchard, 7 Allen, 333. In that case the words "subject to the policy," being included in a promissory note, were held to render the promise conditional, and not absolute, and so the note was held not to be negotiable. Noyes v. Gillman, 65 Me. 589, 591; Hubbard v. Mosley, 11 Gray, 170, 71 Am. Dec. 698.

A case in every essential like the one we are considering was before the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1891. A fac simile of the order is given in the opinion. No two cases could be nearer alike. There, as here, the order was drawn on a savings bank. The suit was by the indorsee against the drawer, as in this case. There, as here, the order contained a statement upon its face, but, below the signature of the drawer, that the "deposit book must be at bank before money can be paid." In discussing the question of its negotiability, cases are cited from the courts of Maine, Vermont, Massachusetts, and New York, as well as from Pennsylvania. In the course of the opinion the court says: "It sufficiently appears from the memoranda on its face that it was drawn on a specially deposited fund held by the bank subject to certain rules and regulations, in force between it and the depositor, requiring certain things to be done before payment could be required, viz., previous notice of depositor's intention to draw upon the fund, return of the notice ticket with the order to pay, and presentation of the deposit book at the bank, so that the payment might be entered therein. . . . It is, in substance, merely an order on the Dollar Savings Bank to pay W. J. Quinn, or order, $900 in nine weeks from date, or February 1, 1888, provided he or his transferee present to the bank, with the order, the notice ticket, and also produce at and before the time of payment the drawer's deposit book. As already remarked, these are undoubtedly prerequisites which restrain or qualify the generality of the order to pay as contained in the body of the instrument. They are also prerequisites with which it may be difficult, if not sometimes impossible, for the payee, transferee, or holder of such an order to comply." Iron City Nat. Bank v. McCord, 139 Pa. 52, 11 L. R. A. 559.

The order in question was drawn upon a savings bank, and it is common knowledge that all such banks in this state have a by-law, which all depositors are required to subscribe to, that "no money shall be paid to any person without the production of the original book, that such payment may be entered therein." This court, in the case of Sullivan v. Lewiston Inst. of Savings, 56 Me. 507, 96 Am. Dec. 500, has considered the purpose and necessity of these salutary regulations. We should be slow to countenance any departure from this rule, needed for the protection of depositors in our savings banks, now numbering more than 160,000, and where deposits aggregate nearly $60,000,000.

Inasmuch as this order is not negotiable, and no suit can be maintained upon it by the plaintiff as indorsee, it becomes unnecessary to consider the other exceptions.

Exceptions sustained.

(January 23, 1896.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Penobscot County for the opinion of the full bench of an action to recover damages for breach of warranty of the safety of a folding bed. Judgment for defendants.

The contract under which the folding bed was delivered by defendants to plaintiff was as follows:

Leased of Oakes & Chandler the following articles: One folding bed, ash, $38, which article is to be used by me at No. 7 Washington street, and for which I agree to pay to the said Oakes & Chandler, or order, as follows: On delivery the sum of $10, and every month thereafter the sum of $8, until the said Oakes & Chandler shall receive the full sum named above. It being expressly agreed that the right of property shall remain in said Oakes & Chandler until the same is wholly paid for; and, in case of failure to pay any one of said instalments after the same have become due, all of said instalments remaining unpaid shall immediately become due and payable; and the said Oakes & Chandler may take, or cause to be taken, the said property, either with or without process of law, from the possession of the said subscriber or other representative to whom he may have delivered the same, without recourse against said Oakes & Chandler or any money paid on account thereof. It being expressly understood that the money so paid on account shall be for the use and wear of said property. The articles leased cannot be sold or removed from the place designated in the lease without the lessors' written consent.

NOTE.—As to the liability for selling a folding bed with knowledge that it is dangerous, see Lewis v. Terry (Cal.) 31 L. R. A. 220.

See also 37 L. R. A. 799.

Selling conveying, concealing, or aiding in concealing, said property, will subject the subscriber to liability under the provisions of the law.

Mr. P. H. Gillin for plaintiff.
Mr. Jasper Hutchings for defendants.

Haskell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants, being dealers in furniture, and not manufacturers, sold a folding bed to the plaintiff, without express warranty of any kind. The bed proved dangerous to the persons using it, not from defective parts, but from faulty design. It proved to be a trap, suited to crush its occupants by shutting up like a jackknife when slept upon. The weight of its occupants, if sufficient to overcome the gravity of the upright headpiece, would trip that forward, and the bed collapse. This bed did so, injuring a man sleeping in it so that he became partially paralyzed. The defendants had no knowledge of this danger. If, therefore, the plaintiff may recover in this case, it must be from an implied warranty against the dangers of its contrivance.

The mechanism of this bed could be observed by the purchaser as well as by the vendor. Neither, unless skilled in mechanics, would be likely to discover the dangers of it, unaided by any object lesson. The hinge or flexible joint upon which the bed hung was a contrivance of folding iron straps that really brought the point of support much further front at the head than they seemed to, thereby overcoming the gravity of the headpiece, and tending to pitch it forward. The bed, when sufficiently loaded, would bring the center of gravity of the upright headpiece so far outside its base, or so nearly so, that any unusual disburbance might work that result, especially when the casters were turned under.

In the sale of chattels by the manufacturer for specific uses, an implied warranty arises that the article is fit for the use intended. Downing v. Dearborn, 77 Me. 457. In the sale of chattels without express warranty and without fraud, caveat emptor applies, and there is no implied warranty. Briggs v. Hunton, 87 Me. 145; Kingsbury v. Taylor, 29 Me. 508, 50 Am. Dec. 607; Winsor v. Lombard, 18 Pick. 57; Mixer v. Coburn, 11 Met. 559, 45 Am. Dec. 230; French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 3 Am. Rep. 440; Howard v. Emerson, 110 Mass. 320, 14 Am. Rep. 608. If the sale be by description, without opportunity for inspection, the description must be met.

The sale of this bed was with full opportunity of inspection. It was shown to the purchaser, and the terms of sale were put in writing. She therefore took no implied warranty, or an equivalent right, unless facts were concealed from her that made the transaction fraudulent. No concealment is shown. It does not appear that the defendants knew of the dangerous contrivance that operated the bed. They deny such knowledge. But it is said that after the sale the bed broke down; that the defendants were called upon to take it back; and that they said they would fix it, and warrant it all right. One of the iron straps had broken, and the defendants put on a new one. The defendants were neither bound to repair the bed nor take it back. They gratuitously repaired it, and any warranty they might have then made would have been without consideration, and not binding. But the conversation testified to does not amount to a warranty of its safety in use. At most, it can only be considered an assurance that its mechanism had been made sound. It does not appear that they were then informed of any inherent danger in its use from faulty contrivance. Had they been aware of this, and concealed the danger, and allowed the plaintiff to further use the bed when they knew of its dangerous character, other considerations would arise, not material here. There is no phase of the case as presented that can cast any liability upon the defendants.

The plaintiff asks to amend by inserting a count for the purchase money paid. The amendment could do the plaintiff no good. The bed was bargained on instalments. The plaintiff says that, after the shocking disaster with the bed, the defendants demanded payment of money overdue, which being refused, they took the bed. The defendants deny the demand, but say that they retook the bed by plaintiff's consent. In either case, under the terms of sale, they might do so. They have both part payment and the bed. That was their legal right, and a more generous course cannot be demanded by law.

Judgment for defendant

BROWN & HAYWOOD COMPANY, Respt.,
v.
John WUNDER, Appt.

1. A verbal contract for the manufacture of articles of special and peculiar design, not suitable for the general trade, and for the price of more than $50, is not a contract for the sale of goods and chattels within the statute of frauds. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4210.

2. A verbal contract to furnish material, and, after performing labor thereon, attach it to the realty, as a part of a building in the course of construction, is not a sale of goods or chattels, and is not within said statute.

*Headnotes by CANTY, J.

NOTE.—As to the distinction between sales of personalty and agreements for work and labor under the statute of frauds, see Flynn v. Dougherty (Cal.) 14 L. R. A. 230, and note.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County denying motion for new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. C. Garrigues and John B. Atwater, for appellant:

Where the contract is intended to result in the transferring for a price from B to A a chattel in which A had no previous property, it is a contract for the sale of a chattel.

Browne, Stat. Fr. §§ 308–310; 1 Benjamin, Sales, §§ 108, 117; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 704–709; Brown v. Sanborn, 21 Minn. 402; Russell v. Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. 39 Minn. 145; Hanson v. Marsh, 40 Minn. 1.

Where the contract is for articles coming under the general denomination of goods, wares, and merchandise, the vendor being at the same time a manufacturer and a dealer in them, or a merchant, so dealing, has them manufactured for his trade by others, and the vendee being also a merchant dealing in and purchasing the same line of goods for his trade, of which fact the vendor is aware, the quantity required and the price being agreed upon, and the goods contracted for being of the same general line which the vendor manufactures or has manufactured for his general trade as a merchant, requiring the bestowal of no peculiar care or personal skill, or the use of material or a plan of construction different from that obtaining in the ordinary production of such manufactured goods for the vendor' general stock in trade,—the contract is one of sale, and within the general statute of frauds, although the goods are not in solido at the time of the contract, but are thereafter to be made and delivered.

Pratt v. Miller, 109 Mo. 78; Meincke v. Falk, 55 Wis. 427, 42 Am. Rep. 722; Cooke v. Millard, 65 N. Y. 352, 22 Am. Rep. 619; Wolfenden v. Wilson, 33 U. C. Q. B. 442; Mead v. Case, 33 Barb. 202.

Messrs. J. H. Cook and F. B. Hart, for respondent:

The test that the article is to be manufactured without any special shape or model furnished, and that without the particular contract the article would in all probability have been made any way, or that if the same was made by virtue of the contract that it would be such an article that the vendor could readily sell to his trade, would have no force or effect in this case, as the offer shows that this glass was to be furnished and made by plan and specification, and when put in form and shape was then to be set and fitted in the apertures and frames provided for it in the syndicate block.

Phipps v. McFarlane, 3 Minn. 109, 74 Am. Dec. 743.

If the article is to be manufactured upon a certain plan or model furnished, and without the particular contract the article would never have been manufactured in the particular manner, shape, or condition required by the contract, the statute of frauds would not apply.

Hight v. Ripley, 19 Me. 137; Meincke v. Falk, 55 Wis. 427, 42 Am. Rep. 722; Mixer v. Howarth, 21 Pick. 205, 32 Am. Dec. 256; Goddard v. Binney, 115 Mass. 450, 15 Am. Rep. 112; Sawyer v. Ware, 36 Ala. 675; Atwater v. Hough, 29 Conn. 508, 79 Am. Dec. 229.

This is not a contract for the sale and purchase of movable chattels. It is a contract to make up materials and to affix them, and until they are affixed, by the nature of the contract the property will not pass, and the contract is not complete with reference to the glass until it is affixed to the building and made a part of the freehold.

Wood, Stat. Fr. § 284; Benjamin, Sales, 4 Am. § 108; Tripp v. Armitage, 4 Mees. & W. 687; Clark v. Bulmer, 11 Mees. & W. 243.

Canty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages for loss of plaintiff's anticipated profits, caused by the breach by defendant of an executory agreement between the parties. Defendant was about to bid for a contract to rebuild a burnt portion of a building in Minneapolis, and received from plaintiff the following proposition to furnish the glass for the same:

Minneapolis, Minn., Feb. 6th, 1894.

John Wunder, Esq., City—

Dear Sir: We will furnish all plate glass, double strength glass, beveled plate, set in metallic sash, and crystalline glass, as per plans and specifications, for the burnt portion of the Syndicate Block, set complete in place, for thirty-one hundred dollars. This includes glass for water closets and crystalline glass in skylights; also, mirrors around show-window posts. Yours faithfully,

Brown & Haywood Co.

The evidence tends to prove that defendant then and there orally promised plaintiff that, if he should be awarded the contract to reconstruct such portion of the building, and plaintiff's bid for the glass work was the lowest received by him, he would award the glass work to plaintiff; that the contract for reconstruction was so awarded him, and the plaintiff's bid for the glass work was the lowest, but that he refused to permit plaintiff so to furnish the glass work, and let the furnishing of the same to others. On the trial the jury found for plaintiff in the sum of $325, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

The only question raised on this appeal is that defendant's verbal promise to award the contract for the glass work to plaintiff is void under the statute of frauds. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4210, provides: "Every contract for the sale of any goods, chattels, or things in action for the price of $50 or more shall be void unless—First, a note or memorandum of such contract is made in writing, and subscribed by the parties to be charged therewith," or unless there has been a part performance. It is contended by appellant that this contract is one for the sale of goods and chattels, and therefore within the statute. We cannot so hold. In our opinion it appears from the evidence to be a contract for the manufacture of articles of special and peculiar design, not suitable for the general trade. Such a case is not within the statute. Browne, Stat. Fr. §§ 304, 305, 307, 308; 1 Reed, Stat. Fr. § 247; Phipps v. McFarlane, 3 Minn. 109 (Gil. 61), 74 Am. Dec. 743. The testimony tends to prove that, in the usual course of business, the glass is carried in stock in sheets of standard sizes, and is cut up to fit the particular sash frames. The witness

Brown testified: "Q. Now explain these bevel-plate transoms, Mr. Brown,—what they are and what you do to them. A. In those, in the case of metallic sash and bevel-plate, we cut the plate to the smaller shapes; that is, I think, in this case, a triangular, or, possibly, a square. We cut them with a diamond, and send them upstairs to the beveling department, and they grind these edges over a succession of wheels resembling grindstones. Some are coarser and some are finer. They pass over two or three wheels, and after they have been ground on those wheels, they are polished off on the ruble wheel, which gives them a final smoothing and polishing. After they are prepared in that way, then we get this metallic sash bar in, and we now have a machine which cuts it off into suitable lengths to put this glass together with, and then those joints are all soldered, cemented, and cleaned. Q. Well, the result of that work, when it is done, is to give you a window of a certain size, made up of small pieces of glass, with the necessary rims of metal, or something of that sort? A. The metal and beveling. The beveling is the important item. . . . In regard to the item of $431 for the beveled plate, the labor in that particular item would, perhaps, be $300. In regard to the item of chipped glass of $450, the labor would, perhaps, cost from $100 to $150. We estimated the work of setting all the glass in the building to be $200. . . . The performance of the contract required us to come there and put these plates of glass in the apertures or frames that were prepared by the contractors. . . . As regards the plate glass, the sash are usually in place in the building, so that, when the glass is put in, the building is inclosed. . . . In my estimate I figured the plate glass at $671, and that included 10 per cent for cutting and waste."

Not only was this a contract to manufacture articles of a special and peculiar design, not suitable for the general trade, but it appears from the contract that the glass was to be "set complete in place." Then it was a contract to make improvements on the land, to erect portions of a building attached to the realty, not to sell chattels. Such a contract is not within the statute. Benjamin, Sales, 6th ed. § 108.

This disposes of the case, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

APPEAL OF MERRITT.

(104 Cal. 570.)

1. Error in dismissing a petition upon the setting up of a compromise agreement, the genuineness of which is admitted by failure to file an affidavit denying it, without giving an opportunity to show lack of consideration, fraud, rescission, or waiver, cannot be set up for the first time on appeal where no such ground of attack was made on the trial.

The question of the validity of the sale of an expectancy by a prospective heir to a stranger will form the subject of a note to the cases of McBall v. Hampton (Ky.) and Clendening v. Wyatt (Kan.) post, —.

Upon the subject of what expectant and contingent interests in real property are subject to attachment or levy on execution, see note to Young v. Young (Va.) 23 L. R. A. 642.

I. General rule.

The interest which a child has in his orphanage part is a mere contingency and no present right, and therefore a release of it is not valid in point of law, but if founded on a valuable consideration it will operate as an agreement and be binding in equity. Power's Appeal, 63 Pa. 443.

A father can make a contract with his son which will entirely bar the latter's claim as heir to any part of his parent's estate. Ibid.

Therefore where the assignment is supported by a sufficient consideration, it will be enforced as an executory agreement to convey. Fritz's Estate, 160 Pa. 156, in which case a son conveyed his expectant estate to his father, in consideration of the sum of $625, the value of the interest being $771.

And the assignment of an expectancy from a father to a son has been upheld, where both the grantor and grantee testified that such conveyance was made upon valuable consideration, there being no other evidence impeaching the credibility of the witnesses. Fritz's Estate, supra.

A relinquishment by an heir to his ancestor of the former's expected inheritance is in its nature a relinquishment in favor of the other heirs, whether they are mentioned in the instrument by which the relinquishment is made or not, and after the death of the ancestor such relinquishment will be enforced in their favor. Crum v. Sawyer, 132 Ill. 443, 460.

Equity will give effect to an agreement made between a parent and a child, whereby in consideration of moneys then advanced by the parent to such child the latter contracts not to make any claim to share of the parent's estate in case the former should die intestate, and so carry out the intention of the parties. Havens v. Thompson, 26 N. J. Eq. 383.

So, equity will enforce an agreement entered into between a father and a child, whereby the father conveys a portion of his real estate to such child, who accepts the same and enters into possession thereof under the express parol understanding that he takes the same in lieu of all share and further claim to his father's estate, and agrees to release property of a relative is not invalid under Civ. Code, § 700, providing that "a mere possibility, such as the expectancy of the heir apparent, is not to be deemed an interest of any kind," and § 1045 declaring that "a mere possibility not coupled with an interest cannot be transferred;" which provisions are merely declaratory of the common law.

3. A covenant not to contest the will of a relative may be given effect as a release of the contingent right to make such contest, and enforced, when fairly obtained and for an adequate consideration.

APPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alameda County, dismissing a petition filed to procure a revocation of the probate of an instrument purporting to be the last will and testament of Catherine M. Garcelon, deceased. Affirmed

Statement by De Haven, J.:

The appellant is a nephew of Catherine M. Garcelon, deceased, and this appeal is taken from an order of the superior court of Alameda county dismissing his petition contesting the validity of a document theretofore admitted to probate in that court as the last will and testament of said decedent, and praying that the probate thereof be revoked. The petition avers that the document so admitted to probate is not the will of said decedent, by reason of the fact that she was of unsound mind and incompetent to make a will at the time she signed it, and upon the further ground that the execution of the same was procured by undue influence exerted upon the decedent by Stephen W. Purrington, one of the residuary legatees named therein, and by other persons unknown to the petitioner; and, in its statement of the facts constituting the alleged undue influence, the petition avers, in substance, that at the date of the said will, and long prior thereto, Catherine M. Garcelon was "a very aged woman, feeble and weak in body and mind, and mentally incompetent to manage, care for, or dispose of her property, and was unaware of the extent, amount, or nature of her property, or of its value, and was obliged to rely entirely upon other persons for the management of her property and affairs;" and that during all that time the said Purrington and other persons unknown to petitioner were in constant intercourse with her, and exercised an actual authority and dominion over her mind, and said persons, for the purpose of preventing the petitioner, as heir and next of kin, from coming into any portion of her estate by succession, or under her will, "had, prior to the making of said will, poisoned the mind of said Catherine M. Garcelon against the petitioner, and so induced her to dispose of almost all her property in trust, and to appoint the said Stephen W. Purrington and others as trustees thereof." Immediately following this statement the petition alleges: "The said Catherine M. Garcelon obtained all of her said property from the estate of her brother, Dr. Samuel Merritt, who died on or about the 14th day of August, 1890, and prior to that date she had not been, and was not, possessed of any property, real or per-all further claim to such residue; and such a contract is not within the statute of frauds. Galbraith v. McLain, 84 Ill. 379, 382.

And such a contract, if made upon valuable consideration and without fraud, will be enforced in equity upon proceedings for a partition of such ancestor's estate. Kershaw v. Kershaw, 102 Ill. 307, 312.

The receipt of a share of a parent's estate in advance, being advantageous to the child, may be held a valid bar to any legal claim to any share of real as well as personal estate. Nesmith v. Dinsmore, 17 N. H. 515, 518.

If a minor entering into a contract with his ancestor or parent with respect to his share in the estate fails to disaffirm the same within a reasonable time after he comes of age, he will be held bound thereby. Jones v. Jones, 46 Iowa, 466.

In the above case of Jones v. Jones, the heir, who neglected to disaffirm such contract for six months after his ancestor's decease, was held bound thereby.

Where there is no fraud or imposition, a child of full age will be permitted to judge what shall be a full advancement, and such contracts, made in relation to real estate, will be held binding. Nesmith v. Dinsmore, supra.

The question as to whether or not an advancement by an ancestor to his son is to be taken as a discharge or renouncement of his son's share or right in the distribution of such ancestor's estate has been held to be within the jurisdiction of the court of probate, the decree of such court, affirmed by the supreme court, being conclusive both at law and in equity. Robinson v. Swift, 3 Vt. 283.

II. The question of intention.

A satisfactory intention must be shown coincident with the transaction in order to treat it as between the heir and ancestor as a portion or settlement in life or, as an anticipation of the child's share of the donor's estate if he died intestate. Booth v. Foster (Ala.) 20 So. 356.

Where there is no well-defined intention on the part of the ancestor to treat the transaction as a portion or settlement in life upon such child, the transaction will not be considered as an advancement or as a release by such heir of his expectant interest. Ibid.

What a parent says at the time he gives property to a child is competent evidence of the intention with which the gift is made. Fennell v. Henry, 70 Ala. 484, 487, 45 Am. Rep. 88; Lawson's Appeal, 23 Pa. 85; Phillips v. Chappell, 16 Ga. 16; Mitchell v. Mitchell, 8 Ala. 414; Butler v. Merchants' Ins. Co. 14 Ala. 777; Merrill v. Rhodes, 37 Ala. 449; Autrey v. Autrey, Id. 614.

In Robinson v. Robinson, 1 Brayton (Vt.) 59, it was held that the receipt of a son for a certain sum in full of his share as heir to his father's estate was only evidence of an advancement, and would not be taken as a bar to the son's share of the estate.

So, in Long v. Long, 118 Ill. 638, the mere fact that a grandson executed and delivered a quitclaim deed to his grandfather was held not of itself sufficient to show a release of his expected inheritance from his grandfather.

The words "hereditary portion," used in a conveyance by the father to a son, have been held to possess neither the force nor the form to cut off all future participation in the father's estate, there being neither a will of the father nor a contract of the son to bar such participation. Miller's Appeal, 31 Pa. 337, 340. See also infra, IX.

III. Inadequacy of price.

Mere inadequacy of price without fraud will not sonal, but was dependent upon the said Samuel Merritt for her support and subsistence." The petition then proceeds to state certain alleged false representations which were made to the decedent for the purpose of injuring the petitioner in her estimation, and to cause her to make the will in question, and alleges "that the said Catherine M. Garcelon, being thereby influenced and not otherwise, and not of her own voluntary act or will, made the said purported will." The petition further states that the said Purrington and others, for the purpose of securing a great benefit to themselves, "coerced and caused" the said decedent to subscribe her name to said will, and finally avers that she, at the time the "said purported last will and testament was made, was mentally unable to resist the said dominion and controlling influence of said persons, and was unable to understand the contents of said document, and never did understand or know the same." The petition also alleges that the petitioner and his brother, Frederick A. Merritt, are the nephews and the only next of kin of said Catherine M. Garcelon, and this averment is not denied.

The executor and the administrator with the will annexed answer separately, but both answers are in all respects the same, and deny that the said Catherine M. Garcelon was of unsound mind, or incompetent to make a will, or that the will probated as her last will and testament was executed under undue influence; and, in addition to these denials, state the following facts as a separate defense to the matters alleged in the petition: On or about August 17, 1890, one Samuel Merritt, a brother of Catherine M. Garcelon, died, leaving a large estate and a will by the terms of which the greater part of his estate was given to his said sister, and only a small portion thereof to his nephews, the petitioner here, and his brother, Frederick A. Merritt. This will was duly admitted to probate on September 15, 1890. The petitioner and his brother were dissatisfied with its terms, and threatened to contest the probate thereof, and employed a lawyer for that purpose; but a compromise was effected, and said Catherine M. Garcelon and the petitioner and his brother entered into a written contract, by the terms of which the former was to pay to her said two nephews the sum of $125,000, and also to convey certain real property to a trustee upon a certain condition subsequent, the trustee to collect and pay over the income to the nephews, and in consideration of which the latter were to release to their said aunt their claims as heirs of her brother, Samuel Merritt, and for that purpose were to execute to her a proper deed of conveyance of their interest in said estate; and it was further agreed that this deed should "contain such apt words of warranty and covenant as may be prescribed and approved by the counsel of the parties of the first and second parts respectively, to the end of securing to the party of the first party full right and ample power to dispose of all the property derived by her from the said Samuel Merritt, or by the deed of conveyance and transfer herein provided for; also of all the income to be derived therefrom, and of all the property, real and personal, which the party of the first part now affect a contract entered into between parent and child. Haines v. Haines, 6 Md. 435.

Where the husband had procured a mortgage from his wife, apparently for the purpose of securing the purchase money on land, but really for the purpose of protecting his interest therein, and after the wife's death he and his attorney informed his son that such an instrument was a lien upon the lands, and so induced the son to convey his interest to his father, the transaction was set aside as false and fraudulent, the consideration being inadequate, although, had the consideration been of full value, or all that such property was reasonably worth, it would have been otherwise. Grindrod v. Wolf, 38 Kan. 292.

IV. The statute of frauds.

In Galbraith v. McLain, 84 Ill. 379, 382, it was stated that neither the statute of frauds nor the statute of wills could be invoked against the transaction which had been made between the father and son, for the reason that the expectancy of an inheritance could not be said to be an interest in land which might not be surrendered by parol.

As to the statute of wills, see also infra, VII.

And in Kershaw v. Kershaw, 102 Ill. 307, 312, the court followed its prior decision in the case of Galbraith v. McClain, supra, to the effect that such agreements are not within the provisions of the statute of frauds.

In both the above cases the parol agreement by the heir to release his expectant interest was made in consideration of a present conveyance.

See also Stokesberry v. Reynolds, infra, IX.

V. Parol evidence to vary such contracts.

When, by his acceptance of the property conveyed to him by a deed in release of his expectant interest, the heir enters into the enjoyment of the property, he cannot subsequently, where no fraud or mistake is shown, contradict or explain such contract or deed by parol evidence. Kershaw v. Kershaw, 102 Ill. 307, 312. And see further hereon Jones v. Jones, 46 Iowa, 466, infra, VIII.

VI. The doctrine of estoppel.

A deed executed by a son providing that "said land is deeded as an advancement to said [son] out of the estate of said [father], and the deed is accepted by said [son] as his full and entire share of his father's estate," which deed is recorded, will operate as an estoppel upon such heir and his grantees as against any further claim upon his ancestor's estate, when the property has been enjoyed by him. Kershaw v. Kershaw, supra. See also Barham v. McKneely, 89 Ga. 812, and Miller's Appeal, 31 Pa. 337, infra, VIII.

VII. State statutes.

The provisions contained in §§ 63 and 164 of the Illinois Revised Statutes relating to wills do not apply to the case of a release in writing given by a son to his father, made upon valuable consideration without fraud. Bishop v. Davenport, 58 Ill. 105, 110.

See also, as to this statute of wills, the decision in Galbraith v. McLain, supra, IV.

VIII. Such agreements enforced.

In Barham v. McKneely, 89 Ga. 812, it was held that a receipt under seal, given by a daughter to her father, acknowledging that she had received a specific sum as an advancement in full of her prospective share in his estate at or after his death, and relinquishing both real and personal estate, and all her right, title, and interest to the same, was a valid and binding contract and would bar and estop owns or hereafter may acquire, either by deed or last will and testament, without any right, power, or authority of the parties of the second part hereto, or either of them, or their respective heirs or assigns, to question, dispute, or contest the same in any manner or to any extent whatever." And it was further provided that said nephews should also execute any other separate agreements and covenants which might be deemed necessary to secure to the said Catherine M. Garcelon the right to dispose of the property mentioned in the deed, either by deed or will, free from any possibility of contest by them. On the same day the petitioner and his brother executed to the said Catherine M. Garcelon an agreement which, after referring to the death of Samuel Merritt, and the fact that he had left a large estate and a will by which the great bulk of it was devised and bequeathed to their aunt, and that they were dissatisfied with said will, and had threatened to contest the same, proceeded as follows: "And whereas, the undersigned and said Catherine M. Garcelon have mutually agreed upon a settlement and adjustment of their respective property rights and interests in the property and estate of which the said Samuel Merritt was seised or possessed, and in such settlement and adjustment the said Catherine M. Garcelon has made satisfactory provision for the undersigned; and, whereas, the said Catherine M. Garcelon has been induced to make such settlement and adjustment and such provision for the undersigned in reliance upon their respective promises and agreements that they, nor either of them, would never, at any time hereafter, in any manner, or to any extent, question, dispute, or contest, as her heirs at law or otherwise, any disposition which she may have made, or may hereafter make, by deed or will, of any or all of the property derived by her from the estate of the said Samuel Merritt: Now, therefore, for and in consideration of the premises, the undersigned do hereby promise, covenant, and agree to and with the said Catherine M. Garcelon, her devisees, legatees, and assigns, that they, nor either of them, nor their respective heirs, shall or will, at any time hereafter, assert any right, title, or interest, as the heirs or heirs at law of the said Catherine M. Garcelon, to the property, real and personal, derived by her under the said last will and testament of the said Samuel Merritt." In addition to the foregoing agreement, the petitioner and his brother also executed to their aunt a deed purporting to convey and assign to her all their interest in the property of the estate of Samuel Merritt, real, personal, or mixed, or in which they could have an interest as heirs at law of said Merritt. This deed also contained a covenant on their part whereby they agreed "with the said Catherine M. Garcelon, her heirs, devisees, legatees, executors, administrators, and assigns," not to question or contest any disposition of any of the property belonging to said estate which the said Catherine M. Garcelon "may have made, or may hereafter make, either by deed or by her last will and testament," and that neither of them would ever make any claim to any portion of the property derived by her under the will of Samuel Mer-such daughter from claiming or taking any part of his estate after his death, intestate, leaving other heirs and distributees, in a contest with the administrator.

Where the sums received by the heir were not charged to him by the intestate, and were not properly made by way of advancement, but were received in full payment and satisfaction of his share and portion of the estate by express agreement in writing, it was held that the release thus executed by the son of his expectant interest would be upheld against him. Bishop v. Davenport, 58 Ill. 105, 110.

Again, where a son took a conveyance of real estate from his father in satisfaction of his share as prospective heir, it was held that his right to share in the distribution of his father's estate was barred by such conveyance, as was also the right of his children or heirs in case he predeceased his father. Simpson v. Simpson, 114 Ill. 603.

And in Crum v. Sawyer, 132 Ill. 443, 460, the court held that the contingent interest or expectancy of the husband as heir of his wife in her real and personal estate was a proper subject of contract, and such contract, having been made upon a valuable consideration by parties capable of contracting with each other with entire fairness, was enforceable according to its terms.

In Gray v. Bailey, 42 Ind. 349, one of several residuary legatees of personal estate died, and some of the others gave receipts to their father for a sum of money in full of all their interest in the estate. It was held that another daughter was entitled to the residue of the personal estate, one legacy having lapsed and the other been adeemed in the lifetime of the testator.

Where the instrument showed that, in consideration of the conveyance of specified property, the grantee agreed to release by deed his interest in his father's estate in case the latter died intestate, and not to claim anything further from the estate, it was held that such an agreement did not amount to a release, but a contract, to contradict or vary which parol evidence could not be admitted. Jones v. Jones, 46 Iowa, 466.

In Cushing v. Cushing, 7 Bush, 259, a son gave the following receipt to his father: "Received . . . of my father . . . $2,000, which I freely accept as my full proportion of his estate, and I hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, never to set up any claim against him or his estate." It was held that the son was barred from making any claim against his father's estate, inasmuch as he thereby acknowledged that he had received his full proportion.

In Smith v. Smith, 59 Me. 214, a father conveyed by warranty deed real estate to his son, taking from the latter an acknowledgment and receipt for the value of such land as his full share of his father's estate, and relinquishing all his right, title, and interest in and under his father's estate at the time of the father's decease. The son dying shortly after the father, intestate, it was held in an action by the heirs of the son to recover their share of the grandfather's estate that the transaction amounted to an advancement to the son in full, and therefore barred the claims of the grandchildren.

The same point was decided in the case of Quarles v. Quarles, 4 Mass. 680, which was followed by the court in Kenney v. Tucker, 8 Mass. 142; Parker v. McCluer, 3 Keyes, 318; and Summerville's Estate, 129 Pa. 631.

Where a son gave a receipt to his father as follows: "Received of [the father] the sum of $600 in full in lieu of dowery,"—it was held that such receipt amounted to an agreement by which the son excluded himself from claiming any share to his father's estate in case of the latter's dying inritt, except such as he might be able to assert as a devisee or legatee under her last will and testament. The answers further aver that the said Catherine M. Garcelon fully complied with all the terms of the compromise agreement on her part to be kept and performed, and that all of the estate of which she died posssessed was derived from her deceased brother, the said Samuel Merritt, and under the terms of his will. The genuineness and due execution of the several contracts and writings set out in the answer were not denied by the petitioner; but he moved to strike from the answers all the averments relating to the same as irrelevant and immaterial, and also demurred to the separate defense based upon the said alleged contracts. The motion to strike out was denied, and the demurrer overruled. The petitioner also filed in due time a written request that the issues of fact relating to the competency of the decedent and her freedom from undue influence be tried by a jury. This request was denied; and thereafter the case came on for trial before the court without a jury, and upon the hearing the defendants "offered in evidence" the original contracts and deeds referred to in their answers, and also offered to prove the truth of the recitals therein contained, and that said terms were fully performed by the said Catherine M. Garcelon. The court ruled that none of said evidence was necessary or proper, the genuineness and due execution of said contracts and deeds being admitted; and thereupon the defendants moved to dismiss the petition of the appellant upon the ground that he was estopped by said contracts and deeds from questioning the validity of the will of said Catherine M. Garcelon, and upon the further ground that it appeared that he had no interest in the estate of said decedent. This motion was opposed by the petitioner upon certain specific grounds, which will be hereafter stated. The objections of petitioner were overruled, and the court made an order dismissing the petition upon the grounds stated in the motion of defendants.

De Haven, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Notwitstanding the genuineness and due execution of the compromise agreement as contained in the several instruments set out in the answers were admitted by the failure of petitioner to file an affidavit denying the same (Code Civ. Proc. § 448), he still insists that the court erred in dismissing the petition without giving him an opportunity to show that such agreement was in fact without consideration, or that his consent thereto was obtained by fraud, or that it had been extinguished by rescission, or that performance thereof had been waived by the deceased. It is true that by the terms of § 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure testate, the consideration therefor being sufficient. Havens v. Thompson, 26 N. J. Eq. 383.

So, in Fisher v. Bolton (N. J.) 5 Cent. Rep. 116, the son had in the father's lifetime received his share, and had by quitclaim to the father and his heirs so parted with all his interest in the land as to be barred from claiming a right therein as heir at law.

Where a son released all claims that he would have upon his father's estate as part of the consideration for a conveyance made to him by his father prior to the latter's second marriage, and the agreement was executed by an abandonment by the son of all claim on his father's death, it was held that the conveyance was supported by a sufficient consideration and barred the son's right to any share in the distribution of the estate. Firestone v. Firestone, 2 Ohio St. 415.

So, where the father sold his son a farm at a certain consideration, and a certain amount was paid down and bonds given for the residue under the following stipulation: "And the remainder to be divided into three equal shares, the one share shall be [the son's] his hereditary portion from his father . . . the other two shares shall be divided into eight equal yearly payments to be paid in equal proportions to a son and daughter, his remaining children,"—the court held that the agreement showed a clear intention upon the part of the intestate, the father, to divide his estate equally among his three children, and that the conveyance to the son operated as an advancement to the extent of one third, and that the deed did not estop the son from taking his proportion of the estate after accounting for such advancement. Miller's Appeal, 31 Pa. 337.

Again, where the sealed instrument executed by the son was clear and explicit, and acknowledged the receipt from the father of a specified sum for land, for which the father executed to the son, his heirs and assigns, a conveyance in full satisfaction and payment "of all such sum or sums of money, share or shares, purparts and dividends, which may or might hereafter become due, owing, payable, or belong to me by any means whatever, for or on account of my full share, part, or dividend of the real and personal estate of my said father," the deed containing a release by the son to the father of such shares or dividends on his estate and all claims in respect thereof, it was held that the son's claim upon the father's estate after his death was barred. Power's Appeal, 63 Pa. 443.

And in Summerville's Estate, 129 Pa. 631, upon partition by the children and grandchildren of a decedent, it was sought to put in evidence a paper signed by four of the children of the decedent, whereby they acknowledged they had received from the deceased all the portion of his estate, real, personal, or mixed, which might be due or coming to them as heirs, unless otherwise arranged by his will. It was held that such paper was a valid release and as such had a binding effect upon the distribution of his estate.

In Price v. Winston, 4 Munf. 63, property was devised to a sister "during her life, and after her decease, . . . to the children . . . which she shall leave at her death, to be equally divided among them, to them and their heirs forever," and an agreement under seal was entered into by all the children then living, in the sister's lifetime, "to stand to a fair and equal division of said estate, between the children . . . who shall be living at her death, and the issue of such as have or may die before her." It was held that such contract was upon good consideration and binding as between the parties.

Where the heir by a receipt acknowledged "payment in full up to date for all services rendered, new matter in an answer is deemed to be controverted without any special replication, and under that section a plaintiff has the right, while not denying the genuineness and due execution of an instrument set out in an answer, to show other matters in confession or avoidance thereof. But, unless he brings to the attention of the trial court his purpose to offer such evidence, that court cannot assume that he desires to make any such defense; and in this case the motion of defendants for a dismissal of the petition was not opposed upon the ground that the petitioner desired to offer any proof tending to show that the contracts and deeds set out in the answers were not freely entered into by the parties thereto, and for an adequate consideration, or that the same were superseded by any subsequent agreement, or that Mrs. Catherine M. Garcelon had ever waived performance of the agreements therein contained. On the contrary, the motion was opposed upon the grounds—First, that the instruments set out in the answer contained no matter sufficient to estop the petitioner from maintaining this proceeding, or from showing that he has an interest in the estate of Catherine M. Garcelon; and, second, that no trial of the issues of fact tendered by the petition had been had, and that petitioner had been denied a trial of such issues by a jury. The court below, therefore, properly assumed that these were the only grounds upon which the petitioner opposed the motion, and it is too late to suggest here for the first time that he was entitled to make proof of other facts showing his right to contest the will of deceased, and which would have been sufficient to avoid the estoppel which the trial court held resulted from the compromise agreement.

2. The main question arising upon this appeal relates to the construction and effect of the compromise agreement set out in the answers. That agreement seems to have been prepared with great care, and there is no ambiguity in any of its provisions. By its terms the appellant and his brother waived their right as heirs of Dr. Merritt to contest the will left by him, or to claim any portion of the estate bequeathed and devised by him to their aunt, other than the portion thereof which she gave and relinquished to them by that agreement; and in consideration of the property thus secured to them they further agree "that they, nor either of them, nor their respective heirs, shall or will at any time hereafter assert any right, title, or interest, as heirs or heirs at law of the said Catherine M. Garcelon to the property, real and personal, derived by her under the said last will and testament of the said Samuel Merritt;" and, doubtless for the purpose of making the foregoing agreement upon their part more effectual, the appellant and his brother, in the deed executed by them for the purpose of carrying out the compromise agreement, and which is to be construed as a part of such agreement, covenanted "to and with the said Catherine M. Garcelon, her heirs, devisees, legatees, executors, administrators, and assigns," that they would not "in any manner, or to any extent, question, dispute, or contest any disposition of the property above mentioned or referred to, or any part thereof, and all claims, now and in the future against [his ancestor] and his estate, living or dead, and that he has no further claim, in any shape, manner, or form, against [his ancestor] or heirs or any one else bearing the name," it was held that the words of the receipt referred to the heir's interest in the ancestor's estate, and bound him and creditors claiming through or under him from making any claim upon the estate after the ancestor's decease. Liginger v. Field, 78 Wis. 367.

IX. Not enforced.

In Stokesberry v. Reynolds, 57 Ind. 425, a father advanced money to his son upon a verbal understanding that it should be in full of his interest in his father's estate, and it was held in an action by such son for partition of the real estate of his father, that such advancement made by his father should be treated simply as an advancement, and not as a release of his expectant interest in such real estate.

In the above case there was a clear intention shown to reduce the agreement into writing, but whether the court refused relief upon the ground that the agreement should have been reduced into writing pursuant to statute is not shown by the opinion.

So, in Needles v. Needles, 7 Ohio St. 432, 70 Am. Dec. 85, the interest in expectation or hoped-for inheritance of four daughters from their father's estate was released by their several husbands by virtue of instruments in writing executed by them respectively to the father, whereby each acknowledged the receipt of the advancement and agreed not to set up any further claim against the father's estate as one of his heirs after his decease; and the case presented the question of the power of the husband to release the wife's bare possibility or expectation of inheritance from her ancestor. The court held that such an assignment or release only transferred the husband's right, and passed nothing to the assignee in case the husband did not survive the wife, or unless the reversionary chose in action was reduced to possession during the coverture.

In the above case it was contended that, although the release executed by the husband was wholly valid at law, yet a court of equity would regard it and give effect to it as a contract to release when the interest became vested, but the court stated that the contract in question could not be enforced, as the deceased in his lifetime made the advance to his daughters, and took the receipt of the husband of each, whereby the husband acknowledged the same "'to be in full of all claims he could have against the estate of said [deceased] after his death, as one of his heirs,' and stipulating for himself and his heirs, 'not to set up any further claim,'" the advancement being a voluntary act done without mutuality either of consideration or of obligation, and for the reason that the contract, being an executory one made for the purpose of controlling the estate of a decedent after his decease, had no binding effect.

Where, in the proceedings for the distribution of the estate of an intestate, there was some evidence of an agreement in writing under seal, which was afterwards lost, entered into between the deceased and one of his sons, by which the latter was to have a farm at a certain valuation, and was to keep the father as long as he lived for a named consideration, the balance to be divided among the other heirs, and after the father's death such son was to pay to the other heirs certain amounts, retaining a certain sum as his own share, when a deed was to be made by the father's personal representatives to him, it was held that the question of release or or of any property which may be acquired therefrom or thereby which the said Catherine M. Garcelon may have made or may hereafter make by either deed or by her last will and testament." There is not the slightest contention that the parties to this agreement were not fully competent to contract in relation to their property rights, and the agreement itself recites that it was entered into "after full examination into the facts, and full and deliberate consideration of the premises;" and there is nothing upon its face to suggest that the differences thereby compromised were not settled upon fair and equitable terms, nor was there any offer to prove extrinsic facts for the purpose of impeaching the agreement in this or any other respect. The questions for decision, therefore, are whether such an agreement, based upon a full and adequate consideration, and entered into with deliberation by parties in every way competent to contract, is valid, and, if valid, is the petitioner thereby estopped from maintaining this proceeding to revoke the probate of the alleged will of his aunt? The agreement, as we have seen, in addition to his promise not to contest the will of his uncle, Dr. Merritt, contains two distinct covenants upon the part of the petitioner: First, that he would not thereafter, as an heir at law of his aunt, Mrs. Garcelon, assert any right to the property derived by her under the will of his said uncle; and, second, that he would never in any manner question or dispute any disposition which she might make of that property, by deed or will. The first of these covenants is in substance and effect an agreement upon the part of the petitioner to relinquish, as heir presumptive, his expectancy in that portion of the estate of his aunt to which the agreement related. It is claimed by the petitioner that such an agreement is void under §§ 700 and 1045 of the Civil Code of this state, the first of which provides that "a mere possibility, such as the expectancy of an heir apparent, is not to be deemed an interest of any kind," and the latter section declaring that "a mere possibility, not coupled with an interest, cannot be transferred."

These sections simply state the well-settled and well-understood rule of the common law upon the subject to which they relate. At common law, a mere possibility, such as the expectancy of an heir, was not regarded as such an existing interest as to be the subject of a sale or capable of passing by assignment; but in equity the rule was different and agreements for the sale or release of expectancies, if fairly made, and for an adequate consideration, were enforced upon the death of the ancestor; and in our opinion it was not the intention of the legislature, in enacting the sections of the Code just referred to, to make any change in the rule by which courts of equity were theretofore governed in dealing with this class of contracts. This construction of these sections is in harmony with § 5 of the same Code, which declares that the provisions of that Code, "so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes of the common law, must be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments;" and also follows the presumption that the legislature, in the enactment of advancement could be raised on distribution of the fund raised by the sale under partition proceedings. Summerville's Estate, 129 Pa. 631.

In Buck v. Kittle, 49 Vt. 288, the plaintiffs claimed as children and heirs at law of a deceased daughter of the intestate, and the facts showed that while the intestate and the deceased daughter were both alive, the daughter and her husband executed to the intestate an instrument not under seal purporting, in consideration of a deed then executed to her and her husband by the intestate, to release the claim of herself and her heirs to her share of the intestate's estate. It was held that, the plaintiffs taking directly from the intestate as the representatives of their mother, the writing had no effect as an accord and satisfaction, for the reason that the mother at the time of its execution had a mere expectancy, and that such an instrument not being under seal would have no effect as a covenant which would bind the daughter and her children; and, further, that such instrument was inoperative as an agreement under Vt. Gen. Stat. chap. 56, §§ 16, 17, and that it was therefore not an advancement in full of the expectancy, and the plaintiffs were therefore allowed their distributive share in the estate.

X. English authorities.

a. General rule.

Agreements between father and children are not to receive encouragement, especially where founded on the father's mistake; and it is a rule in equity to relieve against such agreements as are founded on mistakes. Morris v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 398.

Transactions between a father and child are to be viewed with a reasonable degree of jealousy, and not in the light of reversionary bargains. Tweddell v. Tweddell, 1 Turn. & R. 1.

By the custom of London the orphanage part must go in equal shares, and if the father turns the money into any other shape which he thinks may take it out of the custom, the court will relieve the children. Heron v. Heron, 2 Atk. 160.

If a father merely for the sake of maintenance, and not for advancement in marriage or trade, obliges his son to release his right to the orphanage share, such release is absolutely void. Ibid.

The custom of London admits of no bar to relief against agreements between expectant heirs and their ancestors, on the ground of mistake, for nothing but an actual advancement of a child as such will bar his claim. But in equity, if a daughter who has a portion given by her father on marriage agrees to take it in satisfaction of any demand she may afterwards have on his estate, such agreement amounts to a bar. Morris v. Burroughs, supra.

A father's preferring a child in marriage, or advancing money to set his son up in trade, may amount to a bar of his customary share; but in all these instances there must be a valuable consideration moving from him and an actual benefit accruing to the child. Morris v. Burroughs, supra.

b. Agreements enforced.

A daughter, by agreeing to take a portion given to her by her father upon marriage, in satisfaction of any future demand upon his estate, bars her rights therein upon her father's decease. Morris v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 399.

So, in Ives v. Medcalfe, 1 Atk. 63, husband and wife covenanted in articles executed prior to marriage, in consideration of a given sum (the wife's portion) to release all the right that might accrue to them out of her father's personal estate by the custom of London, and the husband was held bound by his covenant; the court stating that though the wife was under age yet he might release statutes, does not intend to overturn long-established principles of law unless such intention is made to clearly appear, either by express declaration or by necessary implication. Mr. Story, in § 1040c (vol. 2) of his work on Equity Jurisprudence, states the equitable rule upon the subject of such agreements as the one before us as follows: "So, even the naked possibility or expectancy of an heir to his ancestor's estate may become the subject of a contract of sale or settlement; and in such a case, if made bona fide for a valuable consideration, it will be enforced in equity after the death of the ancestor, not indeed as a trust attaching to the estate, but as a right of contract." And see also, as sustaining the same proposition, Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. §§ 168, 953; Bacon v. Bonham, 33 N. J. Eq. 614. In accordance with this principle, it has been held in many cases in which the question has arisen that an heir may release to the ancestor his expected share in the ancestor's estate. Thus in Havens v. Thompson, 26 N. J. Eq. 383, it was held that a son, by such release to his father, estopped himself from claiming as heir any portion of the father's estate. In that case it appeared that the father gave to the son the sum of $600, upon the condition that it should be accepted in full satisfaction of his interest in the father's estate, the son executing a receipt stating that the money was received "in full in lieu of dowry." The chancellor construed the receipt in view of the facts surrounding its execution as a release, and said: "I regard this instrument as an agreement, by which Benjamin, in consideration of the money paid to him by his father, agreed with the latter that he would make no claim to a share of his father's estate, should the latter die intestate, but therefrom would be debarred by that instrument, made upon what was a satisfactory compensating consideration. Such an agreement may be made between a father and his child, in regard to the interest of the latter in the estate of the former, and effect will be given to it in equity, according to the intention of the parties." And the rule thus declared was afterwards approved in Brands v. De Witt, 44 N. J. Eq. 545. In Bishop v. Davenport, 58 Ill. 105, it was shown that the father in his lifetime gave to certain of his children property, and took from them an instrument in writing in which they acknowledged that such property was received by them as their full share of his estate. The father died intestate, and the court, in passing upon the question, held that the transaction was not an advancement, and that the instrument signed by the children operated as a re-it as it was a matter that accrued to him in right of his wife, and his release would bind her.

So, in Lockyer v. Savage, 2 Strange, 947, action was brought by the assignees of a commission in bankruptcy, to have an account of the personal estate which the bankrupt's wife's father died possessed of, he being a freeman of the city of London. It was insisted on behalf of the defendants that by articles between the bankrupt and his daughter previous to her marriage, she had, for valuable consideration advanced by the father in his lifetime, released her right to any further share of the personal estate, the consideration money being settled for the use of the bankrupt for life, but in case of his failure the trustees were to apply it to the separate maintenance of the wife and children. It was held that a child of full age might for the consideration of a present advance bar herself of the customary share, and that it was stronger in the case of a child who had a right than in the case of an intended wife; and, further, that the provision for her maintenance in case the husband failed was good against creditors, it not being a provision out of the bankrupt state, but the settlement of her own portion.

Where the plaintiff was entitled, upon the death of his father, then advanced in years, to a certain sum to be raised by a charge upon an estate which had been purchased by the defendant, and a few weeks before the plaintiff attained his majority his father suggested that the defendant should purchase the plaintiff's reversionary interest, the plaintiff being at the time without funds and desiring an advance to enable him to pursue his medical studies; and it was agreed that the defendant should purchase at a given price payable in annual instalments, with interest on the unpaid amounts, the costs to be paid by the plaintiff; and a deed was prepared by the defendant's attorney and executed by the plaintiff about three weeks after he became of age, he employing no attorney or adviser other than his father, who died three months afterwards, having been in impaired health at the time of the sale, though there was no evidence that the defendant knew such to be the case, but if the state of the father's health at the time had been taken into account the price paid would have been inadequate,—upon a bill filed to declare the deed fraudulent and void, it was held that in the absence of fraud, and having regard to the circumstances, the transaction could not be impeached; although there was a dissenting opinion to the effect that although there was no evidence of fraud the plaintiff ought to have had an independent adviser and was therefore entitled to relief in equity. O'Rorke v. Bolingbroke, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 814, 26 Week. Rep. 239.

c. When not enforced.

In Heron v. Heron, 2 Atk. 160, a father, a freeman of the city of London, took advantage of his son's necessities, and in consideration of a bond for securing the son an annuity of £50 prevailed upon him to release the share he had in the orphanage part, and also prevailed on another of his sons to give him a release of his share of the orphanage part in consideration of an annuity in the same note, but there were not the same proofs of his being forced into the release, and the father had at times advanced him £300 or £400. It was held, the plaintiff being turned out of doors, left destitute and void of maintenance, that such release extorted from him could not be supported, and Lord Hardwicke also inclined to the opinion that the other release was equally void.

And in Morris v. Burroughs, 1 Atk. 399, a father having five children entered into an agreement with them that he would come to the city of London and take up his freedom there, provided they would release any right or demand they might be entitled to in respect of his personal estate by virtue of a custom of that city. An agreement was drawn up and executed by the father and three of the children, who were of age. Upon a bill subsequently brought by the plaintiff and his wife, one of the daughters who was of age at the time of the agreement, for her customary share of her father's estate, he having in the meantime taken his freedom, it was held that equity would not interpose in voluntary agreements in the absence of fraud, and that the agreement could not operate as a release for want of an interest in the children upon which it might operate, they neither having the jus in rem nor the jus ad rem, the whole being in the father during his lifetime. E. W.

lease by them of their expectancies in their father's estate, and should be upheld as such. So, also, in Kershaw v. Kershaw, 102 Ill. 307, a son accepted from his father a deed, the deed reciting that "said land is deeded as an advancement to said John W. Kershaw out of the estate of said Joseph Kershaw, and the deed is accepted by said John as his full and entire share of his father's estate." The court in that case held that the acceptance of the deed bound the son to the same extent as if he had signed it, and that the conveyance did not constitute an advancement, but operated as "an executed contract whereby an heir released his expectancy in his father's estate in consideration of a present grant of real estate." And it was further there decided that the son was estopped from making any further claim as heir at law to any portion of his father's estate. In Crum v. Sawyer, 132 Ill. 443, the court, in a well-considered opinion, held that a husband might for an adequate consideration enter into a valid contract with his wife releasing all his interest as her heir in her lands and personal estate, saying: "There can be no question then that the complainant's contingent interest or expectancy, as the heir of his wife, in her real and personal estate, was a proper subject of contract, and the contract in question having been made upon a valuable consideration, by parties capable of contracting with each other, and, so far as the evidence shows, with entire fairness, it should, as to such contingent interest or expectancy, be enforced according to its terms." And in Power's Appeal, 63 Pa. 443, it was decided that a father might make a contract with his child which would bar the latter as his heir at law, and that when property had been received by the son from the father, the son giving a receipt reciting that the same was received in full of his share as heir at law, he was thereby estopped, upon the death of the father, from claiming any further part of his estate. Without multiplying authorities upon this point,—and many others might be cited to the same effect,—it is sufficient to say that we are entirely satisfied with the rule declared in the foregoing cases, and hold that it is competent for an heir, under the limitations stated in that rule, to relinquish to his ancestor all interest in the estate of the latter which might otherwise in the future vest in him as such heir. In Crum v. Sawyer, 132 Ill. 462, it was held that such a relinquishment would inure to the benefit of the other heirs, whether mentioned or not, and in all the cases we have cited the release so made to the ancestor was enforced in behalf of other heirs. In this case, however, it is claimed by the petitioner that the pleadings admit that he and his brother are the only heirs of Mrs. Garcelon; and it is thence argued—First, that if in fact she died intestate, her property must, under the statutes of this state, be distributed to them, notwithstanding they may by the compromise agreement have relinquished to her their rights as such heirs; and second, that the defendants are strangers, in no way in privity with that agreement, and therefore are not entitled to claim the benefits of its provisions. In the view we take of this case, it is not necessary to determine what force, if any, there might be in the first of these contentions, if Mrs. Garcelon had in fact died intestate, and the question arose upon the distribution of her estate as that of an intestate. It is admitted that Mrs. Garcelon executed, apparently in due form of law, a document which upon its face purports to be her will, and which, if valid, disposed of all her estate consisting of all the property referred to in the compromise agreement of which she died possessed, and this document has been duly admitted to probate as her last will and testament. So long as this judgment stands it cannot be said that the deceased died intestate, and, unless the petitioner shall succeed in annulling the said judgment of probate, the question as to what would have been his rights as her heir at law if she had died intestate can never arise. The real question is, Does the petitioner have the right to maintain this proceeding in the face of his agreement that he would not contest any will of his aunt? The court below held that he could not, and this was one of the grounds upon which the court based its judgment dismissing the present proceeding.

3. This conclusion of the learned judge of that court was doubtless based upon a consideration of that part of the compromise agreement in which the petitioner covenanted with Mrs. Garcelon, "her heirs, devisees, legatees, executors, and administrators," that he would "never in any manner or to any extent question, dispute, or contest any disposition of the property" mentioned in that agreement "which she may have made, or may hereafter make, by either deed or by her last will and testament." If this covenant is valid, and is sufficiently broad to apply to and include a will, the validity of which is challenged, as is this, upon the grounds of incompetency of the maker, or because of its alleged execution under duress or undue influence, it is clear that the defendants, as executors of the disputed will, are in such privity with the alleged testator that they have the right, as against the petitioner, to invoke the benefit of this covenant not to contest (Dakin v. Dakin, 97 Mich. 289), and it would follow that the court below was correct in its ruling upon this point.

This particular covenant was evidently inserted by the parties for the purpose of supplementing the other part of the compromise agreement in which the petitioner relinquished to his aunt his expectancy as her presumptive heir at law, and was intended by him as a complete relinquishment or release of all right to contest, upon such grounds as are set forth in the petition filed in this proceeding, any will apparently executed in due form and, in fact, signed by his aunt, and which right of contest might otherwise, as a matter of possibility, come to him in the future as such heir at law. To place any other construction upon the agreement would deprive it of all practical meaning and effect. The agreement not to contest was made in view of the fact that, under the law, an heir is given the right to contest the validity of the document actually intended by the ancestor as his last will and testament, some of the grounds upon which such a contest is permitted by the statute often involving doubtful questions of law and fact; the latter, perhaps, depending for their decision upon the conflicting evidence of witnesses, and also upon the verdict of a jury which may be more or less influenced by sympathy or caprice, and the covenant of the petitioner was that he would not bring such questions concerning any will made by his aunt into dispute or litigation. Such being its true construction, we are brought to the consideration of the question, Is such an agreement upon the part of an heir binding upon him? The covenant not to sue for a breach, or for the enforcement of an existing obligation, operates as a release of such obligation; and unless void as against public policy (a point to be hereafter noticed), this covenant not to contest the will of Mrs. Garcelon should be given effect as a release by the petitioner of his right to make such contest. It is true that at common law a mere possibility was not the subject of release, and that a release was held to operate only upon a present interest. (Pierce v. Parker, 4 Met. 80; Reed v. Tarbell, Id. 93). A covenant made by one person not to sue another for or in respect to any matter arising out of future contracts between them, or by reason of any future tort, would, of course, be utterly void, as the parties to such contract could not have in view any particular subject-matter, or have any conception of the amount which might be involved in the causes of action upon which the covenant was to operate. But in this case the subject-matter of the covenant was in the mind of the contracting parties, and was in its nature no more fleeting and unsubstantial than the assignment of an expectancy, and the same principle upon which courts of equity uphold such assignments will sustain the proposition that a release by a presumptive heir of his contingent right to contest the will of his ancestor may also be enforced when fairly obtained, and based upon an adequate consideration. The two contracts stand upon the same basis; both relate to possibilities, and both concern the same subject-matter—the expectancy of the heir—the purpose of the latter agreement being to take away from the heir any right to assert any claim to such expectancy, in the face of a will bequeathing or devising it to another, and both are equally entitled to enforcement.

4. It is argued, however, in behalf of petitioner, that such an agreement is void because against public policy, and in support of this contention the case of Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 451, 22 L. ed. 368, is cited. In that case it was held that an agreement by an insurance company in its contract of insurance not to litigate in the Federal courts any claim arising upon the contract was void; and in Nute v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 174, a similar question was decided in the same way, and the reasons for such a conclusion were very fully and carefully stated by Chief Justice Shaw in a clear and comprehensive opinion, but there is no analogy between those cases and the one before us, the reasons upon which the decisions in those cases rest are not at all applicable to a covenant not to contest a will such as we are now considering.

5. The petitioner further contends that it is against the policy of the law that the will of an insane person, or a will executed under the influence of fraud or duress, should be established as a valid will, and that this particular covenant is void, because it attempts to bind the petitioner not to show such facts, and thereby attempts to prevent him from establishing the invalidity of the will in controversy.

In passing upon this question, we start with the proposition laid down by Sir G. Jessell, M. R., in his opinion in the case of Printing & N. Registering Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 465: "It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void as being against public policy, because if there is one thing which more than another public policy requires it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contracting, and that their contracts when entered into freely and voluntarily shall be held sacred and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore, you have this paramount public policy to consider—that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract." The sole object which the parties had in mind in entering into the covenant now under consideration was to secure to Mrs. Garcelon the right to make such disposition of her property as she might desire, free from the contingency that her right so to do, or the fact that in so disposing of it she acted freely or voluntarily, might after her death be disputed by the petitioner or his brother; and, as before stated, the agreement was made in contemplation of the fact that controversies concerning the validity of wills or deeds frequently involve doubtful questions of fact, and that, by reason of false testimony or the weakness of juries, their final decision may not always be in accordance with the actual justice and truth of the case; and we see no reason why persons whose rights of property would be affected by the decision of such questions may not in advance, for an adequate consideration, waive their right to engage in such litigation. Such a contract is one that concerns the parties alone, and does not appear to us to be against public policy. There never has been any doubt that parties actually engaged in contesting a will upon any of the grounds upon which such contests are permitted may compromise all matters in difference arising out of such contest, and allow the disputed will to be established, and such agreements, when fairly made, are always enforced. It is difficult to understand why such a compromise agreement is any less against public policy than an agreement made by an heir apparent or heir presumptive with his ancestors, not to contest a future will of the latter. In addition to this, we think the principle upon which the case of Cooke v. Turner, 14 Sim. 493, was decided, is sufficient to sustain the validity of this covenant, so far as relates to the question of public policy. The question in that case arose upon a condition in a will to the effect that, if a devisee should dispute the will, or the competency of the testator to make it, the devise thereby given to her should be revoked. It was argued in that case that such a condition was void as against public policy because having a tendency to set up the wills of insane persons by restraining heirs named therein as devisees from contesting such wills; but the court in answer to this argument said: "There appears to be no more reason why a person may not be restrained by a condition from disputing sanity, than from disputing any other doubtful question, whether of fact or of law, on which the title to a devise or grant may depend." And the court then, after calling attention to certain conditions which if found in a will would be declared void as against public policy, such as conditions in restraint of marriage or of lawful trade, proceeded to say: "But, in the case of a condition such as that before us, the state has no interest whatever apart from the interest of the parties themselves. There is no duty, either perfect or imperfect, on the part of an heir, to contest his ancestor's sanity. It matters not to the state whether the land is enjoyed by the heir or by the devisee; and we conceive, therefore, that the law leaves parties to make just what contracts and engagements they may think expedient as to raising or not raising questions of law or of fact among themselves, the sole result of which is to give the enjoyment of the property to one claimant rather than to another." This reasoning is applicable to the case at bar, for it must be admitted that that which is valid by way of condition, whether in a will or deed, would also be valid as a covenant contained in a contract. See also, as sustaining the decision in Cooke v. Turner, just cited, Bradford v. Bradford, 19 Ohio St. 546, 2 Am. Rep. 419; 2 Jarman, Wills, *902; 2 Redf. Wills, 679.

We have given to the earnest and able argument of the attorneys of the petitioner careful consideration, and, while we have not noticed in detail all the points urged by them in support of this appeal, the views above set forth are really conclusive of every question discussed by them. Our conclusion upon the whole case is that the compromise agreement is valid, and that the petitioner is thereby estopped from maintaining this proceeding; and it follows therefrom that the superior court did not err in refusing petitioner's demand for the trial of the issues relating to the sanity of the testator, or her freedom from undue influence. If the petitioner was not entitled to litigate these matters, the orderly course of procedure required that the court should dismiss his petition, as it did. The respondents have moved to dismiss the appeal, but, in view of our conclusion upon the merits, it is not necessary to discuss the grounds of such motion. We think the motion should be denied. Motion to dismiss appeal denied, and judgment affirmed.

William E. BROWN
v.
JARVIS ENGINEERING COMPANY.

(.....Mass.....)

A contractor building a brick and mortar foundation for a printing press is not liable to a driver of a van containing rolls of paper, for an injury to him caused by negligence of employees attempting to aid in unloading the van, for which their own work was necessarily suspended, with a suspension of their wages for the time lost, when they attempted to assist without any request of the driver, even if they may have been directed to do so by their foreman.

(May 20, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover damages for personal injuries which were alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servant, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stephen H. Tyng and George F. Piper for defendant.

Messrs. Sherman L. Whipple and George A. Saltmarsh, for plaintiff:

The negligent workman was at the time of the accident under the direction and control of the defendant's foreman and representative and in the performance of the specific orders which he had given.

In doing what he did was the negligent workman acting for himself and his own personal interest, or was he acting for his employer and under his employer's direction?

Bowler v. O'Connell, 162 Mass. 319, 27 L. R. A. 173.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort for personal injuries. The defendant had a contract with the Advertiser Company to construct a brick and mortar foundation for a printing press in the basement of the Advertiser Building. It sent three or four of its workmen there to do the work, in charge of and under the direction of one Healey. While the men were at work, the plaintiff, a driver of a van containing rolls of paper, backed up his van to the rear entrance of the building to deliver the paper to the Advertiser Company. It was necessary that the defendant's work should be suspended while the paper was being unloaded and rolled into the basement. One of the defendant's men, without the knowledge or request of the plaintiff, got upon the dray for the purpose of assisting in unloading it, and carelessly set in motion a roll of paper, which rolled from the dray, and struck and injured the plaintiff. There was evidence tending to show that Healey ordered his men to go out and assist in unloading the van so that the defendant's work might be suspended as short a time as possible. Healey testified that he gave no such order, and had no knowledge that any of his men were assisting in unloading the van. It further appeared that Healey's duties were to superintend the construction of the foundation for the printing press, and that the three or four men with him were under his direction, and in the employ of the defendant, and that these men were tenders or helpers in carrying brick or mortar. They were paid by the hour, and when their work was suspended for a time they received no pay from the defendant. They did not receive any pay for the time the work was suspended during the unloading of the dray, which consumed about one hour's time. The defendant requested two rulings: First, that the action could not be maintained; second, that the foreman of the defendant had no authority to bind the defendant by ordering his men to help unload the rolls of paper from the dray driven by the plaintiff, and, if he did so order any of his men, that the defendant would not be responsible for their acts while engaged in helping unload the van. Both of these instructions the presiding judge refused to give, and instructed the jury that, if the foreman, for the purpose of carrying forward the work which he was sent to do, and for the benefit and advantage of the defendant, ordered his men to assist in unloading the dray, and one of them did so assist, the defendant would be responsible for any injury he may have suffered by the careless act of the workmen who assisted in unloading the van. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the case comes before us on the defendant's exceptions to the refusal of the judge to give the rulings requested and to the ruling given.

The question of law presented by these exceptions is whether the evidence would warrant a verdict for the plaintiff, and this depends upon whether the foreman and workman acted within the scope of their employment. We are of opinion that on the evidence a verdict for the plaintiff would not be warranted. The defendant employed these men to construct a foundation in the basement, and did not employ them to unload vans, or to do any other act, although such act might in some way expedite the business of the master. The act of the defendant's servants was not a necessary or natural or proper result of anything that the servants were employed to do. If they had volunteered, at the request of the plaintiff, to assist him in unloading the van, the defendant would not have been liable. Potter v. Faulkner, 1 Best & S. 800. Here the act of unloading was without the knowledge or request of the plaintiff, and was, therefore, an act for which the defendant is not responsible. Bowler v. O'Connell, 162 Mass. 319, 27 L. R. A. 173; Harding v. Boston, 163 Mass. 14; Driscoll v. Scanlon (Mass.) 43 N. E. 100; Lyons v. Martin, 8 Ad. & El. 512; Mitchell v. Crasweller, 13 C. B. 237; Storey v. Ashton, L. R. 4 Q. B. 476; Lord Bolingbroke v. Swindon New Town Local Bd. of Health, L. R. 9 C. P. 575; Stevens v. Woodward, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 318; Rayner v. Mitchell, L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 357; M'Kenzie v. M'Leod, 10 Bing. 385. Even if the act of Healey in directing the men to unload the van was for the purpose of carrying forward the work, and for the benefit of the defendant, yet, as this act was not within the scope of his employment, the defendant is not responsible. In the construction of a building it frequently happens that one set of workmen has to wait until another set of workmen gets through, but it has never been supposed that this would authorize the foreman of a gang of painters to direct his men to assist carpenters or plasterers, or to attempt to do their work, although the doing of it might, in a sense, be said to facilitate the carrying forward of the work of painting. Men are employed because they are supposed to be skillful in their particular trades, and when they are set to do a work within their trade they carry no implied authority from their master to engage in any other trade. In Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co. 1 Hurlst. & C. 526, it was said by Blackburn, J.: "It is not universally true that every act done for the interest of the master is done in the course of the employment. A footman might think it for the interest of his master to drive the coach, but no one could say that it was within the scope of the footman's employment, and that the master would be liable for damage resulting from the wilful act of the footman in taking charge of the horses." In the opinion of a majority of the court, the entry must be, exceptions sustained.

COMMONWEALTH of Massachusetts
v.
James A. MURPHY, Appt.

1. The constitutional right to keep and bear arms for the common defense is not violated by Stat. 1893, chap. 367, § 124, prohibiting unauthorized bodies of men to associate together as a military organization, or drill and parade with arms in cities and towns.
2. A statute exempting certain independent military bodies or organizations from the operation of a provision against parading with firearms is not unconstitutional class legislation, as it grants a special privilege only which does not interfere with any constitutional rights of others.
3. Ordinary breech-loading Springfield rifles which have been altered so that they cannot discharge a missile by means of gunpowder or any other explosive, which fact is not obvious to the ordinary observer, are "firearms" within the meaning of Stat. 1893, chap. 367, § 124, prohibiting unauthorized bodies of men to parade with firearms.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Suffolk County convicting him of violating the statute against parading with an unauthorized body of men with firearms. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas J. Gargan, P. M. Keating, and S. C. Brackett, for appellant:

The statute is in contravention of the Constitution of Massachusetts.

NOTE.—As to the constitutional right to carry weapons, see State v. Workmen (W. Va.) 14 L. R. A. 600, and note.

The 17th article of the Declaration of Rights, Constitution of Massachusetts, part 1, declares: "The people have a right to keep and bear arms for the common defense."

2 Story, Const. §§ 1895–97; Bliss v. Com. 2 Litt. (Ky.) 90, 13 Am. Dec. 251.

The right to "bear" arms in itself is the right to use them as the weapons of soldiers, and the word has been so defined.

English v. State, 35 Tex. 473, 14 Am. Rep. 375; Bishop, Crim. L. § 124.

A diminution of the liberty to bear arms is an impairment of the right.

Bliss v. Com. supra.

A statute which under the pretense of regulating amounts to a destruction of the right, or which requires arms to be so borne as to render them wholly useless for purposes of defense, would be clearly unconstitutional.

State v. Reid, 1 Ala. 612, 35 Am Dec. 44; State v. Wilforth, 74 Mo. 528, 41 Am. Rep. 330; Wilson v. State, 33 Ark. 557, 34 Am. Rep. 52; Haile v. State, 38 Ark. 566, 42 Am. Rep. 3.

The citizen has at all times the right to keep and bear the arms of modern warfare, and to bear them in such manner as they are capable of being used, without annoyance and hurt to others, in order that he may be trained and efficient in their use.

Andrews v. State, 3 Heisk. 165, 8 Am. Rep. 8.

There has been a general doubt whether the terms of this constitutional provision were not infringed by the regulations of the legislature, as is shown by the limitations placed upon the right where state constitutions have been revised or amended.

Compare Mo. Const. 1867, art. 1, § 8, with Const. 1875, art. 2 § 17. Compare Tenn. Const. 1834, art. 1, § 26, with Const. 1870, art. 1, § 26.

If it should be held that the legislature has a right to limit the bearing of arms to the active militia, it has no power to single out certain organizations and give them peculiar rights which it denies to others.

This would be an infringement of the general principles, the very spirit, of the Constitution, which aims at equality of all men before the law.

Cooley, Const. Lim. chap. 11,485.

Defendant cannot be convicted under this statute, for the reason that the statute only applies to assembling for drill or parade with "firearms," and the weapon carried by the defendant was not a "firearm."

Criminal statutes must be construed strictly.

Com. v. Loring, 8 Pick. 370; Cleaveland v. Norton, 6 Cush. 380.

The weapon was incapable of being fired, and could not by any means explode a charge or expel a missile.

It was not a firearm.

A weapon does not come within the prohibition when it has ceased to be capable of use as a firearm and may not reasonably be used and carried as such a weapon.

Evins v. State, 46 Ala. 88; Atwood v. State, 53 Ala. 508.

Defendant had a right to go to the jury on the question whether or not the arm which he carried was a firearm.

Com. v Betton, 5 Cush. 427; Morton v. Fairbanks, 11 Pick. 368; Porter v. Blood, 5 Pick. 54.

Mr. John D. McLaughlin, for appellee:

It is especially important that the duties of citizens under this statute should be determined by some unvarying standard of conduct.

It will be conceded that this weapon before it was bored and the firing-pin filed was a firearm. The fact that it is temporarily or even permanently disabled, while still retaining the general characteristics and appearance of a rifle, does not render it less a firearm in the ordinary and usual sense of the term.

Williams v. State, 61 Ga. 417, 34 Am. Rep. 102; Atwood v. State, 53 Ala. 508.

Article 2 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States does not prohibit the legislation in question, and is a limitation only upon the power of Congress and the national government, and not upon that of the states.

Presser v. Illinois, 116 U. S. 252, 29 L. ed. 615; United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. ed. 588.

It is not in violation of the Declaration of Rights.

Presser v. Illinois, supra; Dunne v. People, 94 Ill. 120, 34 Am. Rep. 213.

Statutes forbidding the carrying of concealed weapons are constitutional.

Andrews v. State, 3 Heisk. 165, 8 Am. Rep. 8; Aymette v. State, 2 Humph. 158; Wright v. Com. 77 Pa. 470.

There is nothing in the Constitution which forbids the legislature arming and equipping bodies of men, other than the militia, or permitting such bodies to arm and equip themselves.

Opinion of the Justices, 14 Gray, 614.

The right to parade with arms is one that cannot be possessed by all. It is a right which it is important that some bodies or associations other than the militia should possess. The state, therefore, may properly select and point out such associations as seem to it worthy of such privilege.

Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co. 17 W. Va. 396; Tipton County v. Rogers Locomotive & Mach. Works, 103 U. S. 523, 26 L. ed. 340; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 486.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is complained of for belonging to and parading with a certain unauthorized body of men with arms, which said body of men had associated themselves together as a company and organization for drill and parade with firearms, in violation of Stat. 1893, chap. 367, § 124. He contends that this statute is in contravention of the 17th article of the Declaration of Rights, which declares that "the people have a right to keep and bear arms for the common defense." This view cannot be supported. The right to keep and bear arms for the common defense does not include the right to associate together as a military organization, or to drill and parade with arms in cities and towns, unless authorized so to do by law. This is a matter affecting the public security, quiet, and good order, and it is within the police powers of the legislature to regulate the bearing of arms, so as to forbid such unauthorized drills and parades. Presser v. Illinois, 116 U.S. 252, 264, 265, 29 L. ed. 615, 619; Dunne v. People, 94 Ill. 120, 34 Am. Rep. 213. The protection of a similar constitutional provision has often been sought by persons charged with carrying concealed weapons, and it has been almost universally held that the legislature may regulate and limit the mode of carrying arms. Andrews v. State, 3 Heisk, 165, 8 Am. Rep. 8; Aymette v. State, 2 Humph. 154; Wilson v. State, 33 Ark. 557, 34 Am. Rep. 52; Haile v. State, 38 Ark. 564, 42 Am. Rep. 3; English v. State, 35 Tex. 473, 14 Am. Rep. 374; State v. Reid, 1 Ala. 612, 35 Am. Dec. 44; State v. Wilforth, 74 Mo. 528, 41 Am. Rep. 330; State v. Mitchell, 3 Blackf. 229; Bishop, Statutory Crimes, § 793. The early decision to the contrary, of Bliss v. Com. 2 Litt. (Ky.) 90, 13 Am. Dec. 251, has not been generally approved.

The defendant further contends that this statute, which mentions certain military bodies as exempt from its operation, is class legislation, which grants exclusive privileges to certain classes of citizens which are denied to the body of the people. It is not contended that the troops of the United States or the regularly organized militia of the commonwealth should be forbidden to drill and parade; but the argument is that the legislature has no power to single out other independent organizations, and give to them peculiar rights which it denies to others. But, in regulating drills and public parades, it is for the legislature to determine how far to go. No independent military company has a constitutional right to parade with arms in our cities and towns, and the granting of this privilege to certain enumerated organizations does not carry with it the same privilege to all others. It is within the power of the legislature to determine, in reference to such independent organizations, which of them may, and which of them may not, associate together and organize for drill and parade with firearms. No decision has been cited to us which intimates the contrary. The granting to certain persons of special privileges of this kind, which do not interfere with the rights of others, is not open to objection on constitutional grounds.

It appeared in evidence that the defendant, with ten or twelve other men, formed one company in the parade, and that all the men in this company carried ordinary breech-loading Springfield rifles, which had been altered and bored in the barrel near the breech, and the firing pins had been filed down, so as to make them immovable; and in this condition they could not discharge a missile by means of gunpowder or any other explosive. The defendant contends that these weapons were not "firearms" within the meaning of the statute. The purpose for which these alterations were made is not disclosed. They would not be obvious to the ordinary observer, while the rifles were carried in the parade. So far as appearance went, it was a parade with firearms which were efficient for use. To the public eye, it was a parade in direct violation of the statute. The men who carried these weapons could not actually fire them, but it would be generally supposed that they could. With the exception of the danger of being actually shot down, all the evils which the statute was intended to remedy still exist in the parade in which the defendant took part. To hold that such a weapon is not a "firearm," within the meaning of the statute, would be to give too narrow and strict a construction to its words. It was originally a firearm which was effective for use. The fact that it was disabled for use did not change its name. It was for the court to determine whether the statute included the weapon which was produced and exhibited at the trial, and his instruction to the jury that it was a "firearm," within the meaning of the statute, was right. Williams v. State, 61 Ga. 417, 34 Am. v.
ABINGTON MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(.....Mass.....)

Damage to insured property by the burning of soot in a chimney accidentally ignited by the burning of waste paper in a stove is within the terms of a policy against all loss or damage by fire,—especially where there was an accidental obstruction of the flue contributing to the damage.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover for a loss alleged to have been covered by defendant's policy of fire insurance. Overruled.

Plaintiff operated a tobacco factory. His foreman emptied into the stove in one of the rooms the contents of a waste basket, intending to have the contents consumed. He subsequently closed the drafts of the stove and locked up the room and left. An hour afterwards the chimney was discovered to be on fire, and when the door was opened the rooms were found to be filled with a dense smoke which caused the damage for which this action was brought. An examination of the chimney disclosed that the soot in it had become ignited, and the heat caused accumulated soot and particles of mortar to fall down and choke the flue, which threw the smoke into the rooms.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. L. S. Dabney, for defendant:

The ignition of the soot in the chimney was not the intended or probable result of the fire in the stove.

Where fire is employed as an agent, either for the ordinary purposes of heating a building, for the purposes of manufacture, or as an

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded by the defendant that it is liable for damage caused by smoke, to the same extent as if the damage had been caused directly by the fire which produced the smoke. The question before us is whether the fire in the chimney was within the contract of insurance made by the defendant. The policy purports to cover all loss or damage by fire, but the defendant contends that in all such contracts there is an implied exception of such fires as this, from which the plaintiff suffered loss. The facts are not in dispute, and if defendant's witness had been permitted to testify as an expert, or if the jury had used their common experience and common knowledge to find the facts as the defendant's counsel, in his opening, contended that they should be found, there would have been no substantial conflict between the statement of the auditor and the facts relied upon by the defendant. A chimney is not intended to be used as a place in which to kindle fires, or to have fires for use or enjoyment in connection with the occupation of a building. It is intended to carry off the products of combustion. One of the products of combustion, in a stove or fire place connected with a chimney, is soot, which will accumulate more or less in the chimney, and will sometimes take fire from the flame in the stove or fireplace. Chimneys are constructed with a view to guard against accidents when such fires occur. Occasional fires in a chimney, from the ignition of soot, are to be expected. Such fires are not desired. They are not maintained for any useful purpose. In a sense, they are accidental; for they are not lighted intentionally, but they start, from time to time, without human agency, when a large quantity of soot has accumulated, and the circumstances chance to be favorable to ignition from the fire which is maintained in the place intended for it.

The defendant's counsel contends that the policy was not intended to apply to a fire which is lighted and maintained for the ordinary purposes for which fires are used in buildings, and which is confined within the place that is fitted for such fires. He argues that if a stove should be cracked and spoiled by a fire kindled in it to warm the house, or if a fire in a fireplace should crack the mantel, or scorch valuable furniture left too near it, or injure property by its smoke, which the chimney failed to carry off, or if a lamp should throw off soot or smoke in such quantities as to cause damage to property, in every such case, if the fire burned nothing but that which was intended to be burned for a useful purpose in connection with the occupation of the house, and if it did not pass beyond the limits assigned to it, the insurance company would not be liable. See Austin v. Drew, 4 Campb. 360, Holt, N. P. 126, 6 Taunt. 436; American Towing Co. v. German F. Ins. Co. 74 Md. 25; Scripture v. Lowell Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Cush. 356, 57 Am. Dec. 111. We are not disposed to question the soundness of the general principle on which this contention is founded, and we find it by no means easy to determine whether the principle should be extended far enough to cover an occasional fire in a chimney, incidental to the ordinary use of a stove, or whether such a fire should be held to be one for whose unexpected injurious consequences an insurance company should be liable. We are inclined to the opinion that a distinction should be made between a fire intentionally lighted and maintained for a useful purpose in connection with the occupation of a building, and a fire which starts from such a fire, without human agency, in a place where fires are never lighted nor maintained, although such ignition may naturally be expected to occur occasionally, as an incident to the maintenance of necessary fires, and although the place where it occurs is constructed with a view to prevent damage from such ignition. A fire in a chimney should be considered rather a hostile fire than a friendly fire; and as such, if it causes damage, it is within the provisions of ordinary contracts of fire insurance. It is doubtless true that in former years, in some parts of the country, straw and other combustible materials have sometimes been put in chimneys, and set on fire, to burn out the soot. But neither at the trial of this case before the jury, nor in the argument before us, was there any suggestion that such a practice prevails, or has ever prevailed, in Boston, or that this chimney was constructed with a view to kindling fires in it for such a purpose. What our decision would be if damage was done by smoke from a fire in a chimney, intentionally kindled to burn out the soot, it is unnecessary now to determine. It is also to be noted that there was an accidental obstruction of the flue, by the falling of the plaster lining of the chimney, which, in some aspects of the case, might be deemed an important fact in favor of the plaintiff's claim.

Exceptions overruled.

1. Judicial notice may be taken of a vote of a city at a special election, accepting a statute.
2. A vote by a city to accept a statute for the construction of a subway under its streets is virtually a vote to raise or to pay money, within the meaning of Pub. Stat. chap. 27, § 129, so as to give taxpayers a standing to contest the legality of the use of the public money for such purpose.
3. The consent of the city council is not necessary to authorize the legislature to impose a debt upon a city and to take away the control of its streets to some extent from the city officers by constructing a subway under the streets,—especially when the statute is accepted by a majority of the voters of the city.
4. The building of a subway under the streets of a city for the carriage of such passengers as pay the regular fare on a street railway to which it will be leased is for public use and within the constitutional power of the legislature to order or sanction taxation for it.
5. The unconstitutionality of a statute omitting to provide for compensation for property taken or injured is not a ground of objection to any person except those whose property is affected by it.
6. The combined action of the legislature in passing a statute, and of the inhabitants of a city in accepting it, is a sufficient answer to an objection that the statute authorizes the use of public grounds without compensation, in the construction of a subway for transportation of passengers.
7. Consent by the inhabitants of a city to a particular use of public grounds may constitute a waiver of the provisions of a statute prohibiting such use even if that constitutes a contract between the state and the city.
8. A statutory limitation on municipal indebtedness may be changed by the legislature by providing for additional indebtedness for a specified purpose.
9. Judicial notice is taken of the situation of the streets and squares and public grounds of Boston in determining the construction of a statute as to authorizing an entry upon the Public Garden in building a subway under Stat. 1894, chap. 548.
10. The right to enter upon the Public Garden in Boston so far as is necessary to make a suitable connection between surface tracks and the subway authorized by Stat. 1894, chap. 548, is implied from the right given to make such connection on or near Boylston street, together with other provisions of the statute.
11. The right to extend a subway upon the Public Garden in Boston under Stat. 1894, chap. 548, to that extent modifies Pub. Stat. chap. 54, § 13, restricting highways, street railways, etc., on public commons or parks.

(June 15, 1896.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the full bench after sustaining a demurrer to a bill filed to restrain defendants from proceeding to construct a subway under the streets of Boston. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. A. Brooks and John D. Bryant for complainants.

Mr. Solomon Lincoln for the Boston Transit Commission.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The general complaint of the plaintiffs, as stated in their bill, is that, if the transit commissioners are permitted to proceed in the execution of the enterprise committed to them by Stat. 1894, chap. 548, they will involve the city of Boston in an indebtedness or liability of many millions of dollars beyond the limit of indebtedness prescribed by the laws of the commonwealth, and will do this without the authority of the city council or the consent of the taxpaying citizens; and also that this statute would have the effect to deprive the city of many rights and privileges belonging to its inhabitants, and especially that it would infringe rights which relate to the control of the streets and highways of the city by the aldermen and street commissioners; all in violation of the right of the inhabitants of the city to govern themselves.

It is provided by § 40 of the statute that

NOTE.—The above case is believed to be entirely a case of first impression. Other cases about so-called subways have related to mere conduits for electric wires. One of these is the recent Missouri case of State, St. Louis U. S. Co., v. Murphy, which condemns an ordinance permitting the use of streets for an electrical subway of a private corporation. But this case is yet pending on rehearing.

the transit commission shall not "take any land or commence the construction of any subway or tunnel until this act shall be accepted by a majority of the voters of said city voting at some special election called by the mayor," etc. In the printed copy of the subway legislation furnished to us by mutual consent of counsel it is stated that this act was accepted at a special election held July 24, 1894. There is no averment in the bill that no such vote of acceptance had been passed, and, though the briefs on both sides say little or nothing on this point, yet it is implied in the briefs furnished by one of the counsel for the plaintiffs (Mr. Bryant) that there had been such an acceptance, and it is then contended that the people at the polls are not the tribunal to determine what debts shall be incurred by or in behalf of the city, because, by a law which stands unrepealed, that question is to be determined by both branches of the city government, and a two-thirds vote of each branch is required to authorize the incurring of a debt by the city. As the fact of the acceptance of the statute has significance in certain aspects of the questions presented, we will state at the outset that, in the absence of any averment to the contrary, we assume that such a vote of acceptance was duly passed. This is a fact of which the court should take judicial notice. Andrews v. Knox County Supers. 70 Ill. 65; State v. Swift, 69 Ind. 505; Rauch v. Com. 78 Pa. 490. Moreover, it is very doubtful, to say the least, whether the plaintiffs, as taxpaying inhabitants, have any standing to maintain the bill in their own names, except upon the assumption that the vote to accept the statute is virtually a vote to raise or to pay money, within the meaning of Pub. Stat. chap. 27, § 129. In this commonwealth, contrary to what has been held in some other jurisdictions, a suit like the present has been considered not to fall within the general jurisdiction of a court of equity. Baldwin v. Wilbraham, 140 Mass. 459; Steele v. Municipal Signal Co. 160 Mass. 36; Carlton v. Salem, 103 Mass. 141. By Pub. Stat. chap. 27, § 129, when a town votes to raise by taxation or pledge of its credit, or to pay from its treasury, any money for a purpose other than those for which it has the legal right and power, it may be restrained by this court upon the suit or petition of not less than ten taxable inhabitants. The case of Frost v. Belmont, 6 Allen, 152, was brought under Stat. 1847, chap. 37, which was like Pub. Stat. chap. 27, § 129. The case of Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39, was also brought under the similar provision found in Gen. Stat. chap. 18, § 79. No point was there made that under the statute the petitioners had no right to be heard.

It is contended, however, by the present defendants that the plaintiffs have no standing to maintain this bill, but in favor of affording a remedy against a use of public money which is supposed to be illegal we think a somewhat liberal construction should be given, and that the vote to accept the statute is sufficient to give the plaintiffs a standing in court under Pub. Stat. chap. 27, § 129.

The two principal grounds upon which the plaintiffs contend that Stat. 1894, chap. 548, as a whole, is invalid, are that it imposes a heavy debt upon the city, and to a certain extent takes away from the city the control of its streets. The plaintiffs deny the power of the legislature to do either of these things without the authority of the city council, or the consent of the taxpaying citizens of the city. It has, however, been established by a great weight of usage and authority that the legislature may impose such a duty and burden upon towns and cities without their own consent. We do not deem it necessary to go into an extended discussion of this subject, or to consider what objects may be so special or local in their character as not to come within the general rule. As to roads of all kinds and bridges and sewers the doctrine is well established in this commonwealth and elsewhere that the legislature may prescribe what shall be done, and requires cities and towns to bear the expense to such an extent and in such proportions as it may determine. The powers which had been given to cities and towns by the legislature by special or by general laws are in no sense a contract, and do not become vested rights as against the legislature. Coolidge v. Brookline, 114 Mass. 592, 596, 597; Agawam v. Hampden County, 130 Mass. 528, 530; Re Kingman, 153 Mass. 566, 573, 576, 12 L. R. A. 417; People v. Morris, 13 Wend. 325; Sloan v. State, 8 Blackf. 361; People, McLean, v. Flagg, 46 N. Y. 401; Philadelphia v. Field, 58 Pa. 320; Pumphrey v. Baltimore, 47 Md. 145, 28 Am. Rep. 446; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 54, 73, 74, 831, and other cases there cited. If this power were otherwise doubtful, in the present case the statute under consideration is not peremptory and absolute, but it remained inoperative until accepted by a majority of the voters of the city. The plaintiff's contend that the statute is to become operative without the authority of the city council or the consent of the taxpaying citizens; but, if a consent were necessary, we know of no authority or legal reason for requiring any other consent than that of qualified voters. In Merrick v. Amherst, 12 Allen, 500, 506, the court, while intimating that no consent at all was necessary, said: "To guard against all danger of mistake, and to obtain the highest evidence from those most interested that the imposition of the tax was not unequal or disproportionate to the expected benefits, the legislature required that it should not be laid on the inhabitants of the town, unless two thirds of the voters, at a meeting to be called for the purpose, should consent to its imposition." The instances where legislatures have provided that towns or cities or counties might or should bear the whole or a portion of the expense of local improvements in case the qualified voters should assent, and not otherwise, are numberless. In our own statutes, from early times, such legislation has been common. In the Public Statutes now in force many instances are found enacting that cities and towns may by vote accept the provisions of certain statutes, and thereupon shall be subject to certain duties and burdens. There have been many special laws to the same effect. It cannot be necessary to cite more than a few illustrative instances: Pub. Stat. chap. 27, §§ 10–13, 27, 29, 44, 65, 69, 74; Id. chap. 28, §§ 8, 22, 23; Id. chap. 35, § 4; Id.

chap. 45, §§ 44, 52; Id. chap. 50, §§ 20, 22, 25; Id. chap. 51, § 10; Id. chap. 80, §§ 8–13. By the 2d Amendment to the Constitution, city governments cannot be established except with the consent and on the application of a majority of the inhabitants of the town present and voting thereon at a meeting. All of the cities of the commonwealth have been incorporated under this amendment. Larcom v. Olin, 160 Mass. 102, 104, 108. When the legislature imposes such a condition in order to bind a city or town or county to assume a particular burden, it must be complied with; but an assent by vote will give full effect to the statute, and the city, town, or county will thereupon become bound. Hampshire County v. Franklin County, 16 Mass. 76, 87, 90; Stone v. Charlestown, 114 Mass. 214; Central Bridge Corp. v. Lowell, 15 Gray, 106, 116; St. Joseph Twp. v. Rogers, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 644, 662, 663, 21 L. ed. 328, 337, 338; Knox County Comrs. v. Aspinwall, 62 U. S. 21 How. 539, 16 L. ed. 208; Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 519, 526, 544, 551–553, and cases there cited. It is not material that the work is not put in charge of the street commissioners of the city. The legislature might provide for doing the work at the expense of the city, but through other agents than those regularly appointed by the city; it might impose liability on the city, incur the expense, and require payment by the city. The acceptance of the act by the city precludes objection on this score, even if such objection would otherwise have been open.

The foregoing considerations apply to the bridge over Charles river, provided for in § 30, as well as to the subway itself.

It is further contended that taxation can only be for a public use; that the term "public use," in reference to taxation, has a more restricted meaning than when applied to the taking of land by eminent domain; that the subway will not be a highway or open and free to be used by the public for driving or walking; that, when finished, the statute authorizes the transit commission virtually to grant a lease of it to any street-railway company for fifty years; and that the use of the subway which is contemplated is not a public use. That the legislature can authorize a city or town to tax its inhabitants only for public purposes is well settled and familiar. Opinion of the Justices, 155 Mass. 598, 601, and cases there cited. But railroads are always held to be built for public use, whether the right to take land or the right to grant pecuniary aid to them is considered. The legislature of this commonwealth has granted aid to railroad corporations from its own treasury. See instances cited in Re Kingman, 153 Mass. 570, 12 L. R. A. 417. It has also in a number of instances authorized cities and towns to furnish such aid by subscribing to stock or otherwise. For illustrations, see Stat. 1852, chap. 156; Stat. 1855, chaps. 394, 395; Stat. 1860, chaps. 34, 184; Stat. 1861, chap. 98; Stat. 1862, chaps. 56, 78; Stat. 1863, chaps. 96, 104, 105; Stat. 1864, chaps. 11, 242, 245, 246, 249, 260. Finally such municipal aid was authorized by general laws. Stat. 1870, chap. 325, § 3; Stat. 1874, chap. 372, § 35; Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 46. The constitutionality of such legislation has not been brought into direct controversy before this court, but indirectly it has been recognized. Kittredge v. North Brookfield, 138 Mass. 286; Com. v. Williamstown, 156 Mass. 70. And elsewhere it has been established by such a weight of judicial authority that we regard it as settled. Olcott v. Fond du Lac County Supers. 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 678, 694–696, 21 L. ed. 382, 388; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Otoe County, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 667, 21 L. ed. 375; Pine Grove Twp. v. Talcott, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 666, 22 L. ed. 227; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 153–158, 508. The building of the subway for the carriage of such passengers as pay the regular fare is therefore for a public use, and it is within the constitutional power of the legislature to order or sanction taxation for it.

The plaintiffs also contended that the statute is in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. This objection is not dwelt upon in argument, and it is enough to say that we think it is unfounded.

The plaintiffs further contended that the statute is unconstitutional because it omits to provide for compensation for property taken or injured, and especially for taking part of the Common and Public Garden. But the plaintiffs cannot be heard to object to the constitutionality of the statute on grounds which only affect others than themselves. Hingham & Q. B. & Turnp. Corp. v. Norfolk County, 6 Allen, 353; Davis v. Hampshire County Comrs. 153 Mass. 218, 228, 11 L. R. A. 750. So far as other private owners are concerned, the plaintiffs do not represent them, and have no standing to be heard in their behalf.

In respect to the matter of providing compensation, the stress of the argument of the plaintiffs rests on the contention that there is no provision for compensation for so much of the Common and Public Garden as may be taken. It is urged that these were dedicated to the use and enjoyment of the inhabitants of the town long before the city charter was granted, and that they are held by the city in trust to secure and promote such use; that the city, as trustee for these purposes, is entitled to compensation if any part of either is taken; and that the fact that the city is the party to pay, as well as to receive, does not affect this argument, because the city acts in two different capacities. If we assume that the plaintiffs are entitled to be heard on this branch of the argument, it is well settled that the land already appropriated to one public use may be taken by authority or direction of the legislature for another public use. Old Colony R. Co. v. Framingham Water Co. 153 Mass. 561, 13 L. R. A. 332. We do not need to go into any nice consideration of the precise capacity, interest, or duty of the city on caring for the Common and Public Garden, because both the legislature and the city have consented to such new use of both as may be included within the terms of the statute. If the right to their use is in the inhabitants of the city, their vote accepting the act binds them. If it is in the public at large, as distinguished from the inhabitants of the city, the interests of the public are under the protection of the legislature. The plaintiffs in their capacity of taxpaying citizens of Boston, or as voters, or as a constituted part of the public at large, can assert no right to the continued use of the Common or of the Public Garden as public parks, or to have compensation paid for the surrender of such use, against the combined action of the legislature in passing the statute and of the inhabitants of the city in accepting it. Brooklyn Park Comrs. v. Armstrong, 45 N. Y. 234, 6 Am. Rep. 70; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 598, 650–651*a*, notes, and cases there cited. Under these circumstances we need not pursue the questions relating to the title to and interest of the public in public parks,—questions somewhat discussed in Abbott v. Cottage City, 143 Mass. 521, 58 Am. Rep. 143, and Atty. Gen. v. Abbott, 154 Mass. 323, 13 L. R. A. 251.

It is also contended by the plaintiffs that if Stat. 1894, chap. 548, bears such a construction as to allow the transit commission to enter the Public Garden with the subway the statute is unconstitutional, because it impairs the obligation of a contract between the commonwealth and the city. This supposed contract is found in Stat. 1859, chap. 210, § 3, which provided that the commissioners on the Back Bay should fill up and complete at the expense of the commonwealth so much of Arlington street as remained to be completed, and the strip of land easterly of said street which had theretofore been released by the commonwealth to the city; and, further, that "no building shall hereafter be erected between Arlington and Charles streets, except such as are expedient for horticultural purposes." It is argued that this is a contract that the commonwealth would not erect a building there, and that the subway as constructed is a building, and, if it is authorized by Stat. 1894, chap. 548, then that the statute is a violation of said contract. The short answer to this argument is that the inhabitants of the city have accepted Stat. 1894, chap. 548, and so have consented to whatever is contained therein. Contracts may be waived by the parties to them. If this was a contract, the city was a party to it, and might waive it.

The plaintiffs also contend that the statute is invalid because work to be done under it will increase the debt of the city much beyond the limit of municipal indebtedness fixed by Stat. 1885, chap. 178, § 2. But the same authority which fixed that limit may change it, and § 17, which requires the treasurer of the city to issue bonds, also provides that this debt shall not be included in determining the limit of indebtedness. Similar exceptions have been very numerous in the legislation of the last ten years. See Blue Book for 1895, p. 805. There is no averment in the bill that the limit of indebtedness as thus extended will be exceeded by the issue of the bonds provided for by Stat. 1894, chap. 548.

It is also argued by the plaintiffs that the statute does not authorize any entry upon the Public Garden; that, at any rate it does not authorize the erection of a building thereon; and that the subway, as constructed there, is a building, which is in violation of Pub. Stat. chap. 54, §§ 16, 17. In determining whether an entry upon the public garden is authorized, the court will take notice of the situation of the streets and squares and public grounds. The Boylston street mall upon the southerly side of the common extends westerly along the line of Boylston street from Tremont street to Charles street, which last named street separates the Common from the Public Garden; and Park Square is a place open for travel south of Boylston street, and bounding thereon, and is in part opposite to the southerly end of Charles street, where it joins Boylston street at right angles. Columbus avenue opens into Park Square from the southwest. Stat. 1894, chap. 548, § 25, authorizes the transit commission to construct a subway or subways of sufficient size for four railway tracks, with approaches, entrances, sidings, stations, and connections therefor, and for the running of railway cars thereon through and under Tremont street and the adjoining mall of Boston Common, etc. Section 27 authorizes the commission also to "construct subways to be used for the same purposes as said other subways, but which may be made of sufficient width for two tracks only, as follows: From Tremont street through and under Boylston street and the adjoining mall of Boston Common, or other public or private lands adjoining said street, to a point on or near Boylston street where a suitable connection with surface tracks may be made; from Boylston street through and under Park Square and Columbus avenue or other lands adjoining said square and avenue, to a point on or near Columbus avenue where a suitable connection with surface tracks may be made; and from Tremont street through and under Park street," etc. Section 29 provides that "said commission may locate and construct said subways, tunnels, approaches, tracks, sidings, stations, entrances, and connections where it deems best within the limits aforesaid, . . . but shall not permanently occupy above the surface of the ground for any purpose any part of said Common, except so much of the Tremont and Boylston street malls as may be necessary for stairways to stations and coverings therefor." Section 35 provides that "said commission may, on or before the completion of such subways and tunnels, grant locations for tracks . . . shall order all surface tracks to be removed . . . from Boylston street between Park Square and Tremont street." By Stat. 1895, chap. 440, § 3, it is provided that "no portion of the Common with the exception of the malls on Boylston and Tremont streets shall be permanently occupied above the surface of the ground for any of the purposes of the subway, except so far as necessary for the suitable ventilation thereof, and no portion of said malls shall be permanently occupied above the surface of the ground except so far as necessary for suitable ventilation, and for shelter and other accommodations at the station entrances and exits." Having reference to the locality, it thus appears that it was probably contemplated that the subway should remain below the surface of the ground in Park Square, and on the Common at the corner of Boylston and Charles streets; that is, that in going west from Tremont street it should be underground till after leaving the Common, and that it should be built through and under Boylston street and the adjoining mall of Boston Common, or other public or private lands adjoining said street, to a point on or near Boylston street where a suitable connection with surface tracks might be made. Since a connection with surface tracks is to be made on or near Boylston street, and since no such connection can be made east of Charles street without getting above ground, a right is implied to emerge from underground west of Charles street, and to continue the subway for that purpose as far as is necessary in order to make a suitable connection with surface tracks, but no further; and, so far as is necessary for that purpose, to enter upon the Public Garden, that being public ground adjoining Boylston street. The plaintiffs do not aver that the present construction of the subway extends further upon the Public Garden than is necessary in order to emerge from underground immediately west of Charles street, and to make a suitable connection with surface tracks at a point as near as is practicable. If the fact is so, it should have been averred. It was stated in the argument for the plaintiffs that it had been agreed by counsel that the bill should not be treated as averring an intention to go further west on the Public Garden than the subway is now built, and the defendants had disclaimed any intention of doing so.

It is further argued for the plaintiffs that the subway as constructed on the Public Garden is a building, and that it is in violation of the provision of Pub. Stat. chap. 54, § 16, that "no building exceeding 600 square feet in area upon the ground shall be erected in or upon a common or park dedicated to the use of the public without leave of the general court." The manner of the construction of the subway is set forth, and it is averred that it is a building; but it is not averred in the bill, nor was it suggested in the arguments, that the subway as built is unnecessary or unsuitable or unreasonable in its form or structure, if a subway was to be built at all. The permission of the legislature to build a subway such as is adapted for the uses and purposes described in § 25 of the Statutes of 1894 by implication authorizes such a structure as is necessary and reasonable for those purposes, and, in the absence of any averment to the contrary, we must assume the present structure to be within this implied authority, and therefore, if the subway is a building, the leave of the general court which is required by Pub. Stat. chap. 54, § 16, is given by the giving of authority to enter with the subway upon the Public Garden for a short distance west of Charles street.

The suggestion is also made that the building of the subway in the Public Garden is in violation of Pub. Stat. chap. 54, § 13, providing that "no highway, townway, street, turnpike, canal railroad, or street railway shall be laid out or constructed over a common or park dedicated to the use of the public, or appropriated to such use without interruption for the period of twenty years . . . unless with the consent of the inhabitants of the city or town, after public notice, given in the manner provided in cases of the location and alteration of highways." But the legislature might, and by Stat. 1894, chap. 548, did, authorize the subway to extend upon the Public Garden as above explained; and in § 40 it was provided that the transit commission should not begin work until the act should be accepted by a majority of the voters of the city. This legislation was a substitute, so far as the subway on the Common and Public Garden is concerned, for Pub. Stat. chap. 54, § 13, and the acceptance of the statute furnished all the consent on the part of the inhabitants that is necessary.

According to the terms of the report, the entry must be, bill dismissed.

Field, Ch. J.:

I concur with the opinion of the court, except that I think it was not the intention of Stat. 1894, chap. 548, and of Stat. 1895, chap. 440, that any part of the subways should be constructed in the Public Garden. The use to be made of Boston Common in the construction of the subways is very carefully provided for in § 29 of the Statute of 1894, and in § 3 of the Statute of 1895, but not a word is said concerning the Public Garden in either statute. Considering the very careful provisions made in the statutes concerning the use of the Common for subways, it is improbable that the legislature would not have made equally careful provisions concerning the use of the Garden if it had supposed that the commissioners could use the Garden for the purposes of the subways, or could construct a subway in or under it. I think that the intention of the legislature was that the connection of the subway with the surface tracks of the railway on Boylston street should be made at or near the corner of the Common bounded by Charles and Boylston streets, and that the incline of the subway for these tracks should begin there. By § 25 of the Statute of 1894 the principal subway was to begin at "a point or points within 1,000 feet of the junction of Tremont street and Shawmut avenue," and was to continue "through and under Tremont street and the adjoining mall of Boston Common or other public or private lands adjoining or near said street" to Scollay's Square, etc. By § 27, Id., subways to be connected with the principal subway might be constructed for the use of the cars which run along Columbus avenue through Park Square and along Boylston street. At the time of the passage of these statutes, at the junction of Charles and Boylston streets and Park Square the surface tracks of the railways were connected with one another. No provision was made by the statutes whereby the surface tracks on Charles street should be connected with the subways, but provision was made whereby the surface tracks on Columbus avenue and on Boylston street might be so connected. The provision for the Boylston street tracks is that a subway may be constructed "from Tremont street through and under Boylston street and the adjoining mall of Boston Common or other public or private lands adjoining said street to a point on or near Boylston street where a suitable connection with surface tracks may be made." The provision for the Columbus avenue tracks is that a subway may be constructed "from Boylston street through and under Park Square and Columbus avenue or other lands adjoining said square and avenue to a point on or near Columbus avenue where a suitable connection with surface tracks may be made." The subsidiary subways must unite with the principal subway at or near the corner of Boylston and Tremont streets. The Columbus avenue subway, if one is built, must unite with the subway in Boylston street or the adjoining mall of Boston Common at or near the junction of Park Square and Boylston street. I see no authority in the statutes for carrying the subway in Boylston street or the adjoining mall of Boston Common beyond the junction of Park Square and Boylston street, or beyond the limits of the adjoining mall on the Common.

The report of the presiding justice states that "on the admission of the plaintiffs that they did not rely on the allegations in the bill as to extending the subway from opposite Church street to Arlington street, in view of the statement which was made by the respondents that there was no intention on their part to do so, I sustained the demurrer," etc. The work actually done by the commissioners in the Public Garden perhaps indicated an intention on their part, not of reaching the surface tracks on Boylston street by the nearest practicable approach to the subway as it was built under Charles street, but of deflecting the surface tracks on Boylston street at its junction with Arlington street to the southwesterly side of the Garden, and of laying tracks over the surface of the Garden until they reached the incline of the subway in the Garden. But such intention, if it ever existed, it seems has been abandoned. The opinion of the court justifies the construction of the subway in the Public Garden on the ground that it was necessary in order to comply with the provisions of § 29 of the Statutes of 1894, and § 3 of the Statutes of 1895, to the effect that no part "above the surface" of the Common should be occupied by railway tracks, or for any other purpose than for suitable ventilation, for shelter and stairways to stations, and for coverings therefor, and not on the ground that authority was given by the statutes to the commissioners to use the Garden in any such manner as they saw fit for the purpose of constructing the subways. Without laying much stress upon the employment of the word "tunnel," in the statutes, as distinguished from "subway," the use of an incline beneath the surface of the ground for tracks to reach a subway or tunnel is not, I think, an occupation "above the surface," within the meaning of the provisions of the statutes which have been cited. An incline is a necessary part of the subway, and is to be included within the limits of the subway. The phrase, "other public or private lands adjoining said street," found in § 27 of the Statutes of 1894, is found in other sections of the statute, and cannot be held to extend the termini of the subways as fixed by other provisions of the statutes. The phrase means that within the authorized termini the commissioners may construct the subways in the directions indicated through the land, whether the land be public or private. I do not dissent from the result reached by the court, because the subway had been substantially constructed in the Public Garden without any objection, so far as appears, on the part either of the commonwealth or of the city of Boston; and I should not feel justified, under such circumstances, in attempting to undo the work there done because I differed in opinion with the commissioners upon the construction to be given to the statutes, unless the construction acted on by them seemed to me impossible; but my opinion is that the statutes were not intended to authorize such a use as they have made of the Public Garden.

PALMER SAVINGS BANK
v.
INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A mortgagee is entitled to recover in his own name to the extent of his interest on a policy of insurance payable to him as his interest may appear, where the mortgagor is by the mortgage required to insure the property for the mortgagee's benefit.
2. The interest of a mortgagee in a policy payable to him as his interest may appear, does not extend to a subsequent mortgage executed by the wife of the insured who had in the meantime obtained a conveyance of the property and in which the husband is not named in the granting clause, although he joins in the instrument to release any marital rights he may have.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Hampden County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Stephen S. Taft, for plaintiff:

The right of the mortgagee to recover depends upon the condition of affairs and the situation of the parties at the time of the loss, and not at the time of the issuing of the policy.

Harrington v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co. 124 Mass. 126.

The mortgagee can maintain the suit in his own name.

Messrs. Robinson & Robinson, for defendant:

The plaintiff has no right to recover in his own name and in the form of its action. There was no privity of contract between these parties. No consideration moved from the plaintiff to the defendant. The contract was between the assured and the defendant.

See also 38 L. R. A. 397; 39 L. R. A. 148.

If the debt to the mortgagee were less than the amount of insurance, then the defendant is not to be subjected to two suits.

Or if there were two or more independent mortgagees, certainly each of them as well as the assured should not have the right to separate actions.

2 Wood, Fire Ins. 1124; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Davenport, 37 Mich. 609.

If above the mortgage claim there was a surplus of insurance money the mortgagee might recover in the name of the assured his whole claim, while the assured might not have any right to such surplus.

Pratt v. Sanger, 4 Gray, 84; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 2d ed. 688.

If James W. owned the property, then the plaintiff had no valid interest in it so far as the second mortgage is concerned, and can only recover at most on the first note.

In case Lucia E. became the owner then the defendant was not made liable for the second note collaterally and contingently to the plaintiff because the defendant had no notice or knowledge that any transfer of title to the mortgaged property had been made or attempted or that the said mortgage by Lucia E. had been made and the defendant did not consent thereto.

At most the plaintiff could have against the defendant under the policy and under the direction written on the policy at the date of the policy only security for the mortgage debt then, that is, at the date of the policy existing.

City Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. supra.

If it be held that the title shifted to Lucia E. without the defendant's consent, while it did not invalidate the plaintiff's claim against the defendant as to the first note, it did invalidate any claim in excess of that.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on a policy of fire insurance issued on March 12, 1890, by the defendant to James W. Calkins for $400, and made payable in case of loss to the plaintiff "mortgagee as its interest may appear." At the time when the policy was issued, James W. Calkins owned the real estate, and the barn on it, which was insured; and the plaintiff, the Palmer Savings Bank, held a mortgage on the property, given by James W. Calkins to the plaintiff to secure his note, payable on demand, for $200. Subsequently James W. Calkins made and delivered a deed of the premises to Inez B. Burleigh, who made and delivered a deed thereof to Lucia E. Calkins, the wife of James W. Calkins. The peculiarity of these deeds will be noticed hereafter. They were each subject to the mortgage which has been mentioned. Afterwards Lucia E. Calkins, for $400 received of the plaintiff, gave a note therefor, payable on demand, signed by herself and her husband and two other persons, and secured it by a power of sale mortgage on the property described in the deed to her as aforesaid, and on other property. In this mortgage her name alone appears in the granting clause, but in the proviso her husband's name appears, in the following manner: "And, for the consideration aforesaid, I, James W. Calkins, husband of the said Lucia E. Calkins, do hereby release unto the said grantee and its successors and assigns all right of or to, both curtesy and other rights, in the aforegranted premises, and in the proceeds thereof, in case of sale hereunder, and agree to join in any deed of confirmation or any sale or foreclosure made or affected as aforesaid." The in testimonium clause is as follows: "In witness whereof, we, the said Lucia E. Calkins and James W. Calkins, have hereunto set our hands and seals this 23d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1892;" and both signed and sealed the deed. At the time of the fire there was due on the first mortgage $200 and some interest, and on the second mortgage $400 and some interest, but after the fire the amount due on the second mortgage was somewhat reduced by partial payments. The amount due on both mortgages at the time of the trial was about $548, which is more than the amount of the insurance. The policy was a Massachusetts standard policy, under Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 60, and it was not under seal. The loss was total, and was more than the amount of the insurance.

At the conclusion of the trial the defendant asked the court to rule as follows: "(1) The plaintiff has no right of recovery in his own name, and in the form of the plaintiff's action. (2) If the defendant is liable at all to the plaintiff, no greater amount can be found against it than the principal of the first note signed by James W. Calkins, and the interest thereon. (3) The plaintiff cannot recover of this defendant in this action any sum in excess of the amount due on the said first note of James W. Calkins." These rulings the court refused to give, and, trying the case without a jury, found for the plaintiff in the sum of $432,—being the whole amount of the insurance, with interest,—and the presiding justice reported the case to this court. The report concludes as follows: "If the plaintiff is not entitled to recover at all in this action, judgment shall be entered for the defendant. If the plaintiff is entitled to recover of the defendant only the amount of the note of James W. Calkins, and interest thereon, there shall be judgment for the sum of $200 dollars, and the interest accrued thereon. If the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover the whole amount of said policy in this action, then the judgment of the superior court, as stated above, shall be affirmed."

The policy, being in the Massachusetts standard form, contained, among others, the following provision: "If this policy shall be made payable to a mortgagee of the insured real estate, no act or default of any person other than such mortgagee or his agent, or those claiming under him, shall affect such mortgagee's right to recover in case of loss on such real estate." Stat. 1887, chap. 214, § 60. If the policy became void as to James W. Calkins, by his conveyance of the premises, it still remained in force, for the benefit of the mortgagee, so far as its interest appears. City Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. 122 Mass. 165; Harrington v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co. 124 Mass. 126; Eliot Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 142 Mass. 142. The practice in this commonwealth has been, in a case of this kind, for the mortgagee to sue in his own name. Cases cited supra; Barrett v. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co. 7 Cush. 175; Foote v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 119 Mass. 259; Franklin Sav. Inst. v. Central Mut. F. Ins. Co. Id. 240; Wheeler v. Watertown F. Ins. Co. 131 Mass. 1; Fogg v. Middlesex Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Cush. 337; Hale v. Mechanics' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 6 Gray, 169, 66 Am. Dec. 410; Loring v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co. 8 Gray, 28; Macomber v. Cambridge Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Cush. 133; Smith v. Union Ins. Co. 120 Mass. 90; Fitchburg Sav. Bank v. Amazon Ins. Co. 125 Mass. 431; Eliot Five Cents Sav. Bank v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. supra. But it is said that in none of the foregoing cases was the right of the plaintiff to sue denied, although in some of them an opinion was expressed that the mortgagee could sue in his own name. It has also been held that the mortgagor can sue in his own name, with the assent of the mortgagee. Jackson v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 5 Gray, 52; Turner v. Quincy Mut. F. Ins. Co. 109 Mass. 568; Kyte v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 144 Mass. 43. In Jackson v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. it was held that, if the assent of the mortgagee was given before suit brought, the plaintiff, who was the mortgagor, would be entitled to recover costs, otherwise not. It is argued that these decisions permitting a mortgagee to sue in his own name are inconsistent with the decisions in Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317; Exchange Bank v. Rice, 107 Mass. 37, and other similar cases; with our decisions on life insurance policies, of which Wright v. Vermont L. Ins. Co. 164 Mass. 302, is an example; and with the decisions on benefit certificates, such as Rindge v. New England Mut. Aid Soc. 146 Mass. 286. It is the practice of the courts of the states of this country generally, although not universally, in such a case as the present, to permit the mortgagee to sue in his own name. In some of these states, it is true, a person for whose benefit a contract is made, although not a party to it, is permitted to sue upon it; in some states a joint action by the mortgagor and mortgagee is permitted, where the mortgage debt does not exhaust the insurance; in some a distinction is taken between a case where the loss is payable to a mortgagee without any limitation, and one where the loss is payable to a mortgagee according to his interest; and in some the mortgagor and mortgagee each can sue according to his interest. See Motley v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co. 29 Me. 337, 50 Am. Dec. 591; Chamberlain v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co. 55 N. H. 249; Meriden Sav. Bank v. Home Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Davenport, 37 Mich. 609; Minnock v. Eureka F. & M. Ins. Co. 90 Mich. 236; Mitchell v. City of London Assur. Co. 15 Ont. App. Rep. 262. In mortgages in this commonwealth it is customary for the mortgagor to covenant that he will keep the mortgage property insured for a certain amount, for the benefit of the mortgagee, in such form and in such insurance companies as the mortgagee shall approve. Although this does not expressly appear in the report, and we have not been furnished with full copies of the mortgages, we assume that they contained the usual provisions on the subject. A mortgagor and a mortgagee have each an insurable interest in the property. Each can insure for his own benefit,—the mortgagor for the full value of the property, and the mortgagee for the full value of his interest in the property,—and neither can avail himself in any way of the money recovered from insurance by the other unless there is some contract making it so available. But a form of insurance like that in the case at bar has become common, whereby a part or the whole of the insurance on the mortgagor's property is made payable to the mortgagee, and the money paid by the insurance company to the mortgagee operates, in whole or in part, as payment of the mortgage debt, and the mortgagor, after the mortgage debt is paid, is entitled to the remainder of the money due from the insurance company, if there is any. At first the policy usually was issued to the mortgagor in the common form, and was then assigned by him to the mortgagee, to the extent of his interest, and the insurance company assented to the assignment. Afterwards the provisions for the benefit of the mortgagee were inserted in the body of the policy. But such policies, unless there were stipulations to the contrary, were avoided, as against the mortgagee, by any act of the mortgagor which avoided the policy as to him. To make such policies a better security to the mortgagee, it has been provided in the Massachusetts standard policy that no act or default of any person other than the mortgagee or his agent, or those claiming under him, shall defeat such mortgagee's right to recover in case of loss; and the policy contains various other provisions with reference to the mortgagee which make the contract with him, or for his benefit, somewhat different from that with the mortgagor. When a mortgagor, under an obligation (expressed in the mortgage) to insure the property to a certain amount for the benefit of the mortgagee, in satisfaction of this obligation, procures insurance on the property, and makes the loss payable to the mortgagee to the extent of his interest, the mortgagor in fact acts both for himself and for the mortgagee. The mortgagee is not an entire stranger to the consideration, because the mortgagor, in effecting the insurance, has only performed a duty which he was under towards the mortgagee, and for the performance of which he was paid by the loan which was secured by the mortgage. In practice such policies are delivered to and retained by the mortgagee. The effect of such a policy is the same as if the mortgagor had taken out the insurance in his own name, and then assigned it to the mortgagee to the extent of his interest, and the insurance company had assented to the assignment, and had promised the mortgagee that no act or default of the mortgagor should defeat the right of the mortgagee to recover to the extent of his interest. Under such an assignment, assented to by the company, the mortgagor, in the event of a loss, could maintain an action in his own name to recover to the extent of his interest. In Fogg v. Middlesex Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Cush. 337, 346, the court says: "But there is another species of assignment, or transfer, it may be called, in the nature of an assignment of a chose in action; it is this: 'In case of loss, pay the amount to A B.' It is a contingent order or assignment of the money, should the event happen upon which money will become due on the contract. If the insurer assents to it, and the event happens, such assignee may maintain an action in his own name, because, upon notice of the assignment, the insurer has agreed to pay the assignee instead of the assignor. Mowry v. Todd, 12 Mass. 281." If the interest assigned equals or exceeds the amount of the insurance, it would be the common case of an assignment, and the promise of the debtor to pay the debt when it became payable to the assignee. A difficulty has been found by some courts when the assignment is of but a part of the debt, and in such a case, where there is a code regulating practice, the mortgagor and mortgagee sometimes have been permitted or required to join as plaintiffs in the action; but, as their interests are several, it is, to say the least, doubtful whether, at common law, they could be permitted to sue jointly. While there are objections against splitting a debt without the consent of the debtor, these objections never have prevailed where the debtor has consented to it. An assignment of a part of a debt is valid against the debtor, if he assents to it, and the assignee can sue for the part assigned, in his own name, if the debtor has promised to pay it. We think that the policy in the present case is in effect a policy for the benefit of the mortgagee as well as of the mortgagor, in which the insurance company has entered into a direct contract with the mortgagee, which is somewhat different from a contract with the mortgagor, and has promised the mortgagee to pay the loss to it, to the extent of its interest; and it differs materially from a policy for the benefit of B when there is no promise to pay B, and from a policy where B has no interest unless A chooses to give him an interest after he has procured the policy. The plaintiff had an interest from the beginning in the property insured, and in the policy, and the policy was issued to protect that interest from loss by fire. Calkins could not have canceled the policy without the consent of the plaintiff, and could not have adjusted the loss, so as to bind the plaintiff, without its consent. Harrington v. Fitchburg Mut. F. Ins. Co. ubi supra. While, in this commonwealth, the rule is held strictly that no one can sue or be sued on a simple contract who is not a party to it, either disclosed or undisclosed, yet it is not in all cases necessary that the consideration should move form the promisee to the promisor, in the ordinary sense of those words. In a novation no consideration moves from the promisee directly to the promisor. An assignee of a non-negotiable debt must sue in the name of the assignor unless the debtor has promised to pay it to the assignee, but if there is such a promise the assignee can sue in his own name, although no consideration for this promise moves directly from the promisee to the promisor. We think the rule in this commonwealth, in cases like the present, is that where the mortgage has been paid before the loss the mortgagor, in his own name, recovers the whole loss, to the extent of the insurance; that where the mortgage debt exceeds the loss the mortgagee can recover the whole in his own name; that where the loss exceeds the mortgage debt the mortgagor and mortgagee each can sue for his share, unless by the terms of the policy the whole loss is payable to the mortgagee, although it may exceed his interest, in which case perhaps the mortgagee may be taken as assignee of the whole; and that in any case the mortgagor may sue for the whole loss, if the mortgagee consents, although the separate rights of each must be preserved at the trial, as it often happens that there are defenses against the mortgagor which are not available against the mortgagee. The plaintiff therefore is entitled to recover in his own name.

The remaining question is, How much shall the plaintiff recover? It is manifest that the property has been alienated by James W. Calkins, if his deed to Inez B. Burleigh conveyed anything. That deed purports to grant the land to Inez B. Burleigh, but in the granting clause there is no mention of heirs or assigns. The habendum of the deed is in the usual form, except that it is "to the said J. W. Calkins, the grantor, and his heirs and assigns, to their own use and behoof, forever." The deed is executed by Calkins and his wife who signs in token of her release of dower and homestead in the premises. The deed of Inez B. Burleigh to Lucia E. Calkins is similar, and there is a similar mistake in the habendum. These deeds were without consideration, and the principal purpose was to convey the premises from James W. Calkins to his wife. If the habendum be rejected in the deed of Calkins to Burleigh, as inconsistent with the grant, then the deed conveyed the property to the grantee for her life, and this is true of the deed from Burleigh to Mrs. Calkins. It is possible, too, that the deeds might be reformed in equity so as to effect what was undoubtedly the intent of the parties, but that we cannot now consider. If there was an alienation of the property by Calkins, in fee, or for the life of any person, without the assent of the company, we understand that this avoids the policy as to him. But whether these deeds are void, or conveyed an interest for life, is not, we think, within the lines of the policy, and was not within the contemplation of the parties to the policy. It is a mortgage given by Mrs. Calkins on what was considered her property, with full covenants by her, and the husband is not named in the granting clause. It is plainly intended as a mortgage of the land and building of the wife, in which the husband joins to release any rights he may have as husband. Whatever its effect upon his rights may be, the policy was not intended to cover such a mortgage. Whether, if the title had remained in James W. Calkins, and he had made a second mortgage to the plaintiff after the policy was issued, the policy could be held to cover that, it is unnecessary to decide. This mortgage was intended to be a mortgage upon the land and building of the wife, and, at the time the mortgage was given, James W. Calkins could not insure as owner of the land and building of his wife.

The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to have judgment entered for the sum of $200 and interest. So ordered.

Adelard PHANEUF.

(.....Mass.....)

1. There is sufficient consideration for a promise to pay an expert witness a reasonable compensation in addition to the statutory fees when he is engaged in advance of the trial to testify as an expert.

2. An expert witness does not waive his right to the extra compensation which he is entitled to by contract by subsequently receiving statutory fees as a witness from the party who has engaged him and by testifying without making any claim for extra compensation, even if he is not in fact asked any questions which call for his opinion as an expert.

(May 21, 1896.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover compensation for services as a witness which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. W. Shea for defendant.

Mr. Herbert L. Baker, for plaintiff:

The request to rule that the action could not be maintained and to direct the jury to enter a verdict for the defendant is in effect asking for a nonsuit, and the refusal to grant it is not open to exceptions.

Cox v. Cook, 14 Allen, 166; Wentworth v. Leonard, 4 Cush. 414; Priest v. Wheeler, 101 Mass. 479.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The jury must have found, upon the evidence, that the defendant engaged the plaintiff to go into court at a future day and testify for him as an expert in regard to a matter which the plaintiff had examined as a civil engineer. From the dates given it would seem that this engagement was six weeks before the trial. The plaintiff agreed to do this, and talked over the matter, and went into court and testified, and during the progress of the trial advised the defendant's attorney in regard to the questions to be asked of himself and of the other witnesses. At some time after he had so agreed to appear and testify the plaintiff was regularly summoned by the defendant as a witness, and was paid the statutory fees, and made no objection thereto, and made no claim for extra compensation, and it would seem that, during his testimony, he was not, in fact, asked any questions which called for his opinion as an expert.

The defendant contends that, if there was an express promise to pay the plaintiff extra compensation, such promise was without consideration, and that the plaintiff did no more than he was legally required to do under his subpœna. In this commonwealth, every justice of the peace may issue summonses for witnesses in civil cases. Stat. 1885, chap. 141. This is usually done by the party's attorney, if he is a justice of the peace, or by a justice upon the mere request of a party or of his attorney, without any consideration of the materiality of the evidence or of other circumstances. No doubt, here, as in England, the court might interpose to prevent this privilege from being used oppressively. Raymond v. Tapson, L. R. 22 Ch. Div. 430. But usually no question arises unless a witness fails to attend, in which case the court may issue a warrant to bring him in. Pub. Stat. chap. 169, § 6. The issuing of this warrant is a matter of discretion, and before issuing it the court usually must be satisfied that the testimony is material, and that the failure to attend is without reasonable excuse. We should be slow to admit that the court would be without power to require the attendance of a professional or skilled witness, upon a summons duly served, and with payment of the statutory fees, although he was unacquainted with the facts, and could testify only to opinions; but such power would hardly be exercised unless, in the opinion of the court, it was necessary for the purposes of justice. Re Roelker, 1 Sprague, 276, Fed. Cas. No. 11,995; Webb v. Page, 1 Car. & K. 23; Parkinson v. Atkinson, 31 L. J. C. P. 199. Whart. Ev. §§ 380–383. Even in such case the court would probably be without the power to compel the witness to make a study of the case beforehand, or to pay attention to the body of evidence introduced by the parties with a view to forming an opinion thereon. It would seem that one who is summoned as an expert would perform all that the court would require of him if he should hold himself in readiness to be called upon to testify to such opinions as he might have when his turn should come. People v. Montgomery, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 207; Flinn v. Prairie County, 60 Ark. 204, 27 L. R. A. 669. If a party is content to rest upon his legal rights, and to summon the expert whose testimony he wishes to have, and to pay the statutory fees, without any previous engagement or understanding with him, and to take his chance of being able to get an attachment to bring the witness into court in case he should fail to appear, and if he thus succeeds in getting the testimony which he wishes, and afterwards refuses to pay any special compensation, the question might be directly presented whether the witness would be entitled to recover anything on a quantum meruit. That question does not arise here. The questions here are whether there was any sufficient consideration for an express or implied promise to pay, and whether there was sufficient evidence of an engagement by him to testify as an expert, upon request, which might imply a promise by the defendant to pay him as an expert.

Several cases have arisen in different courts, where a professional witness has taken the stand without objection, and afterwards has declined to give professional opinions without special compensation, and has been required by the court to answer. Such decisions do not strictly apply to the case before us, because in all such cases the court has judicially determined that the purposes of justice require the testimony of the witness. Ex parte Dement, 53 Ala. 389, 25 Am. Rep. 611; Wright v. People, 112 Ill. 540; State v. Teipner, 36 Minn. 535. In Indiana, however, the court has refused to require such a witness to answer under such circumstances. Buchman v. State, 59 Ind. 1, 26 Am. Rep. 75; Dills v. State, Id. 15. In Connecticut, in respect to an ordinary witness, not an expert, the court held that, ordinarily, an agreement to pay extra fees will not be sustained, but that it might be valid where the witness assumed a duty which the law would not impose on him, and the court added: "If a witness agrees with a party that he will attend and testify without being summoned, and he is not summoned and so not brought under the order or censure of the court, we suppose any reasonable promise for compensation is good and may be enforced, for the proceeding or service is not in pursuance with the statute." Dodge v. Stiles, 26 Conn. 463, 466, 467. A casual intimation that, ordinarily, a witness can recover only the fees allowed by law, is also found in Pool v. Boston, 5 Cush. 219, 221. In the present case, we are of opinion that, upon the facts in evidence, there was sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay a reasonable compensation, in addition to the statutory fees, and that the jury was warranted in finding a promise to that effect or a mutual understanding that the plaintiff was to be so paid. If such promise was made, or such understanding existed, the plaintiff's right to recover would not be taken away or lost by his omission to claim or demand extra compensation, or to notify the defendant that he should make such claim, or by his acceptance of the statutory fee without objection, or by the omission of the defendant at the trial to put any question to him as an expert witness, and the consequent omission of the plaintiff to testify as an expert. All these were merely matters for the consideration of the jury in determining whether any such promise was made, or such understanding existed.

Exceptions overruled.

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action to recover damages for breach of contract which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. N. Hill for defendants.

Messrs. John Woodbury and John M. Merriam for plaintiff.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of contract for refusing to employ the plaintiff a second year. The plaintiff had a verdict, and the case is here on exceptions. The original contract was in writing, and was made with two partners, Gross and Strauss, for one year from April 25, 1892, with a conditional right of renewal on the side of the plaintiff for one year more. On November 1, 1892, during the first year of the plaintiff's employment, Strauss died, and the business was carried on by Gross. The first question raised by the exceptions is whether Strauss's death ended the contract. At the end of December the plaintiff received a notice from Gross that she would not be employed beyond the first year, stating causes of dissatisfaction. There was an answer from the plaintiff, and a reply by Gross. Exceptions were taken to the admission of the plaintiff's letter in evidence, and to the exclusion of evidence of other causes of dissatisfaction besides those mentioned in the notice. On February 1, 1893, the defendant Sommers became a partner in the business with Gross, the new firm taking the assets and assuming the liabilities of the old one. Thereafter the plaintiff was paid out of the funds of the new firm, and, according to the plaintiff's testimony, was referred to Sommers for further discussion of her relations with the firm, and had several interviews with him, in which he wanted to terminate the contract. Another exception is to the refusal to direct a verdict for Sommers.

We are of opinion that it could not be ruled, as matter of law, that the contract of service was dissolved by the death of a partner. We have no occasion to criticise the decisions in some of our states and in England and Scotland, where an opposite result was reached by a majority of the judges with reference to different kinds of business from the present, except to remark that the argument put forward in Scotland and elsewhere, that the only contracting party was the firm, and that the firm had ceased to exist, does not agree with the common law. Tasker v. Shepherd, 6 Hurlst. & N. 575; Hoey v. MacEwan, 5 Ct. Sess. Cas. 3d series, 814, 815; Griggs v. Swift, 82 Ga. 392, 5 L. R. A. 405; Greenburg v. Early, 30 Abb. N. C. 300, 303. The common law does not know the firm as an entity. Hallowell v. Blackstone Nat. Bank, 154 Mass. 359, 363, 13 L. R. A. 315. A contract with a firm is a contract with the members who compose it. A joint contract to employ the plaintiff is not ended necessarily by the death of one of the contractors (Martin v. Hunt, 1 Allen, 418), and there is no universal necessity that death should have a greater effect when the joint contractors are partners (Fereira v. Sayres, 5 Watts & S. 210, 40 Am. Dec. 496). If the death naturally would put an end to the business, as it so frequently does, very possibly it might end the employment. We have no need to consider what would be the result if in fact no further business was done, except to wind up the affairs of the firm, as was the case in Griggs v. Swift, supra. But this business went on without a break, and both parties seemed to have assumed that the plaintiff's contract was not ended by the death of Strauss.

But the foregoing suggestions are not enough to lay a foundation for the liability of Sommers, even assuming that there was evidence warranting the inference that he was content to be bound unless Gross escaped, and that he made an oral contract on the terms of the written agreement. The declaration is on the written instrument, and the refusal to direct a verdict for Sommers must be taken as made either with reference to the pleadings, in which case Sommers must be shown to be a party to the instrument, or else on the evidence, irrespective of the pleadings, in which case, unless he is to be taken to have signed the writing, the statute of frauds would be a defense under our decisions. Hill v. Hooper, 1 Gray, 131; Freeman v. Foss, 145 Mass. 361. It appears to us that this difficulty cannot be answered, except by attributing an oversubtle meaning to the firm signature and to the acts of the new partners. We cannot read "Gross and Strauss" as not only meaning all those who then were members of the firm, but also as purporting to name in advance all persons who might become members pending the contract. It follows that a verdict for Sommers should have been directed. But there seems to be no reason why the superior court, if it sees fit, should not allow the plaintiff to discontinue as against Sommers, and to take a judgment against the other defendant, Gross. Ridley v. Knox, 138 Mass. 83, 86; Fifty Associates v. Howland, 5 Cush 214.

The plaintiff's letter, answering the reasons for dissatisfaction given in the notice that she would not be employed beyond the year, was admitted only for what light it might throw on the defendants' reply and subsequent conduct, not as evidence of admissions by the defendants, as in Sturtevant v. Wallack, 141 Mass. 119. The defendants' reply excluded any admission. Limited, as it was limited, the evidence was not improper, and can have done no harm, although not very instructive.

We assume that the plaintiff might have been discharged for any just cause during her employment. But the refusal to embark upon a second year was placed by the contract upon a special ground, and was restricted more than the implied right to discharge for cause.

The refusal to go on a second year could be justified only by "written notice . . . of any cause of dissatisfaction on or before January 1, 1893." "Any cause" plainly means "any existing cause," or "any cause relied on." The defendants therefore could not be allowed to prove other causes. The exceptions do not show that they offered to prove other causes arising after January 1, 1893, as distinct from other causes coexisting with those alleged in their notice. But we are not prepared to say that the contract would allow a refusal to begin the second year, for causes arising between January 1, and April 21, 1893.

Exceptions sustained.

AMOSKEAG MANUFACTURING COMPANY
v.
Town of CONCORD.

(66 N. H. 562.)

The value of a water power created by a dam in a river which forms the boundary between towns is to be apportioned to the lands under it in the different towns for the purpose of taxation, although the water power is used entirely for the operation of a mill in one of the towns.

PETITION by the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company to the Supreme Court in Merrimack County for relief from taxes which had been assessed against it for the town of Concord. Relief granted.

An opinion was originally handed down in this case reaching a result somewhat different from that now reached. That opinion, together with a statement of facts and an abstract of the arguments of counsel, will be found in 29 L. R. A. 57.

Mr. D. Cross for petitioner.

Mr. H. G. Sargent for defendant.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"Real estate must be taxed in the town where it is situated. Gen. Laws, chap. 53, § 2; Id. chap. 54, § 11. 'The words "land," "lands," or "real estate," shall include lands, tenements, hereditaments, and all rights thereto and interests therein.' Gen. Laws, chap. 1, § 20. . . . Water power or rights in a reservoir of water are an interest in the land upon and by which they are created, and, by the express terms of the statute, must be taxed in the town where the land of which they are a part is situated. Although they may be so far severed from that land and annexed to land situated in another town as to pass without special mention in a conveyance of the latter, their geographical location is not thereby changed." Winnipiseogee Lake Cotton & W. Mfg. Co. v. Gilford, 64 N. H. 337, 348. In that case the plaintiffs (citing Boston Mfg. Co. v. Newton, 22 Pick. 22, and other authorities) seem to have contended that New Hampshire water power, when used with mills situated in Massachusetts, becomes annexed to those mills, and is taxable in Massachusetts (with the mills to which it is incident), and not in New Hampshire. The decision established the opposite view, and left no open question in this case. In Bellows Falls Canal Co. v. Rockingham, 37 Vt. 622, there was no question of taxability in different towns.

The dam and the bed and banks of the river at Garvin's Falls are a basin from which water may be drawn to turn a wheel in Concord or in Bow, or to equalize the stream in Massachusetts by equalizing it in New Hampshire. The capacity of the basin to furnish water for such uses is evidence of its salable and taxable value. Its value may largely depend on the quantity and head of water constantly flowing through it. The pond is as high in Concord as in Bow, and if the referees did not regard the canal in Bow as a part of the water power, it does not appear, except from their estimate of values, that any of the elements of which the water power is composed are unequally divided by the thread of the river which is the municipal boundary. As a site for a canal and mill, the western side may be more valuable than the eastern. Aside from the canal and the referee's appraisal, the facts specifically found by them do not show that, in capacity to furnish power, the Concord portion of the basin is less valuable than the other, or is worth less than $12,000 (the amount at which they appraised it). There is no apparent error of law or fact in their report. If A, owning a farm in Bow and an adjoining farm in Dunbarton, sells to B the Dunbarton farm, and a perpetual right to carry to it, in acqueduct pipes or otherwise, the water flowing from a spring on the Bow farm, the easement thus created in Bow land, and, in some legal sense and for some legal purposes of title, annexed to Dunbarton land, is in Bow, and is taxable in Bow to its owner. If each farm, without the benefit or burden of the easement, would be worth $2,000, and if the easement is worth $100, and the creation of it by deed and the annexation of it to the Dunbarton farm make that farm (with the easement) worth $2,100, and takes $100 from the value of the whole title of the Bow farm, the Dunbarton farm is taxable to B, in Dunbarton at $2,000, the easement is taxable to him in Bow at $100, and the rest of the Bow farm is taxable to A, at $1,900 After the conveyance of the interest in the Bow farm from A to B, giving B a right to carry the water to the Dunbarton farm, and after he exercises that right, there is as much water-producing real estate in Bow as there was before. Whether the water is carried in buckets or in a canal, Bow is the town to which it is taken from the spring, and diverted from its natural course. B has no easement in his own land. His right to carry the water from the common boundary of the farms across his land in Dunbarton to his house and barn is not an interest in Bow land. The easement begins at the spring, and ends at the boundary of the Bow farm. No alteration in the value of the fountain, or in the place of its taxation, results from the mere division of the title of the Bow farm, or from the use of the water in Dunbarton. If the easement were terminated by a reconveyance, an increased demand for the water in adjoining towns might increase the value of the spring and of the Bow land of which the spring is a part. If a town line ran through the middle of the spring, and all the water was used on one side of the line, the land in each town, including its capacity to furnish water as well as its capacity to produce crops, would be taxable on its own side of the line. The statute of taxation applies the same geographical test to springs and mill ponds. When, for some purposes, in contemplation of law, a right of way, a right to take water from a spring, and a right to fill a natural or artificial pond, or raise the water in it above the natural level, and to draw water from it (or from the east or west half of it), are severed from the town in which they exist, and in which they must be exercised, and annexed to land in another town, a change in the place of taxation fixed by statute is not one of the purposes of the common-law severance and annexation.

On the question of the place of taxation, the plaintiff's right to sell the Bow part of their basin at Garvin's Falls, and with it an easement in the Concord part of the same basin, is as immaterial as a sale creating such an easement, and making such a division of the title of the Concord part; and by electing to use the Concord part of their water power in Concord or in Bow, they cannot determine in which town the power-producing capacity of their Concord land shall be taxed. In other words, they cannot, by any disposition of title or use of water, alter the statutory provision that real estate, including land and all rights thereto and interests therein, shall be taxed in the town in which it is situated. The Concord part of the basin cannot be a power-producing reservoir in Bow. Whether used or not, the plaintiffs' water power is an element of their salable and taxable land. The value of the Bow bank of the river may be diminished by destroying the canal. The value of the Concord bank may be increased by building a mill and digging a canal upon it. After such changes of value, and after a disuse of the water power or a transfer of its use from the Bow to the Concord bank, the Bow part of the dam, the Bow bank, the Bow portion of the bed of the river, including their capacity for valuable use as a part of the basin, and the water power furnished by that part, being in Bow, would be taxable in that town as land.

Judgment on the report.

1. To show the motive of the defendant in an action for alienating the affections of his son from the latter's wife, conversations after the offense charged against him may be admitted.

2. Evidence that a woman was arrested in a house of ill fame is not admissible to impeach her testimony.

3. To permit a witness on re-examination to go into an extended account of alleged machinations of a party against whom she testifies to entrap her into a house of ill fame and have her arrested is error, when the court has refused to permit cross-examination as to the fact of such arrest.

(May 4, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lee County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the alienation by defendant of the affections of plaintiff's husband from her and inducing him to leave her. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Allen & Robins and Sykes & Bristow for appellant.

Messrs. Blair & Anderson for appellee.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action of the court below is complained of by the appellant in twenty-one assignments of error. We notice such only as are necessary to the determination of this appeal.

The sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth assignments may be disposed of together, and briefly. The conversations had between appellant and appellee, which it is alleged were improperly permitted to go to the jury, because not given notice of in the bill of particulars, occurred long after Norman Tucker had deserted the appellee, and were inadmissible as evidence showing or tending to show the substantive offense charged in the declaration. That offense, if ever committed, was long past, and the subsequent conversations of appellant, if offered in evidence to show the independent fact of desertion by reason of appellant's wrongful persuasion and inducement thereto, were competent, in this aspect, only if they were in the nature of confessions. That they were not of the character of confessions is plain, and looked at as they are by complaining counsel, they were incompetent. But, looked at as evidence showing or tending to show the motive of appellant in his supposed wrongful action, they were competent; for, as counsel for appellant ably and correctly argue throughout their exhaustive brief, the motive of appellant was a question of the first importance. If these conversations are given their fair and legitimate construction, they should be found to be helpful to the defense; for, in one of them, the appellant, father of appellee's husband, expressed to appellee the opinion that it would be best for appellee and her husband to remain apart. But, however a jury may regard this, we think they were competent as tending to show motive in appellant.

The tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth assignments may be properly considered together. It was sought to show, by Imogene Hyatt, that she had, some time before the trial of the cause, been arrested, with a male companion, in a house of ill fame in Indianapolis, in the state of Indiana. This the court refused to permit to be done by appellant's counsel on their cross-examination of the witness, but, on re-examination, allowed the witness to make an extensive statement as to circumstances offered to show, and tending to show, that on that occasion, by the machinations of appellant and others nearly related to him, she was entrapped into that dishonorable position. After this re-examination, appellant's counsel proposed to cross-examine the witness on this new evidence, and their request was twice refused. That the course pursued by the court was unfair to the

The right in general to maintain an action for alienation of the husband's affections is sustained in Bennett v. Bennett (N. Y.) 6 L. R. A. 553, and note; Foot v. Card (Conn.) 6 L. R. appellant is manifest, and that it was essentially prejudicial to appellant is too clear for disputation. The witness was permitted to make quite a full statement of facts as to her being arrested in a house of prostitution, and as to her having been entrapped therein by the appellant's agency, as the necessary implication was; and then the door to all further inquiry on this line was closed, thus leaving the appellant to the mercy of the jury, branded by the witness as one who had wickedly had her entrapped into the horrible situation indicated, and whose mouth, as well as that of his accusatory witness, was absolutely shut to any defense he might have been able to make to this damning evidence against him. Now, the character of a witness for truth may not be impeached by showing her to be of probably unchaste character, and the evidence as to Mrs. Hyatt's having been arrested in the brothel was, in the first instance, properly excluded; but the court should have continued to exclude it. And assuredly, in common fairness, it should not have been permitted to be used by appellee to her heart's content, and any attempt to examine into it have been denied appellant. The effect of this action of the court was, we repeat, necessarily and immensely prejudicial to appellant.

Before proceeding, now, to consider the mistake of law which runs through the instructions generally, we desire to call attention to the ambiguity of the language of appellee's first charge. By it the jury were told that they were "the exclusive judges of the evidence, its weight and effect, and of the credibility of the witnesses." For appellant it is earnestly contended that, by this charge, the jury were told that they were judges of the weight of the evidence and of its legal effect; in other words, that they were made judges of the law as well as of the facts. Of course, the answer of appellee's counsel is that this is not the natural or reasonable interpretation of the charge, and that, by the use of the word "effect," the jury were intended to be informed, and, in fact, were only informed, that they were the judges of the weight of the evidence, and of its value as showing what facts might be said to be fairly established by it. That able and accomplished and upright counsel differ so widely as to the meaning of the language makes it at least not amiss to suggest the obviation of this objection by other and unambiguous language on another trial.

A few general observations on the law applicable to the conduct of a parent in counseling and advising a married child, in cases of this character, will suffice to show the erroneous view which prevailed in the trial below, without considering seriatim the charges given and refused, or modified by the court. In every suit of this character, the principal inquiry is, From what motive did the father act? Was it malicious, or was it inspired by a proper parental regard for the welfare and happiness of his child? The instinct and conscience unite to impose upon every parent the duty of watching over, caring for, and counseling and advising the child at every period of life, upon marriage and after marriage, whenever the necessities of the child's situation require or justify such action on the parent's part. The reciprocal obligations of parent and child last through life, and the duty of discharging these divinely implanted obligations is not and cannot be destroyed by the child's marriage. Multiplied instances will occur to the mind in which a failure of the father to speak and to act would be regarded with horror. A daughter who has recklessly contracted an undesirable marriage with a man utterly unworthy to be the husband of a virtuous woman, against the wish and over the vigorous protest of the father, and who has, by such illstarred union, been brought to wretchedness and humiliation and want of the ordinary comforts of life, may surely be advised, counseled, and cared for in the parental home, even against the will and expressed wish of the unfaithful husband. The question always must be, Was the father moved by malice, or was he moved by proper parental motives for the welfare and happiness of his child? In his advice and in his action he may have erred as to the wisest and best course to be taken in dealing with a question so delicate and so difficult, but he is entitled in every case to have twelve men pass upon the integrity of his intentions. The third, fourth, and seventh instructions given for the appellee ignore this rule of law, and put the father upon the footing of a stranger who intervenes between husband and wife, and they are therefore erroneous. For the same reason the first, ninth, eleventh, and twelfth instructions asked by appellant should have been given as asked, and without the modifications made by the court.

Cases of this character do not abound, and the present appeal presents the question of a father's liability for the first time in our courts. The learned court and able counsel for appellee misconceived the liability of the parent, and held him to the rigid accountability imposed upon strangers who invade the domestic circle and separate husband and wife. See Hutcheson v. Peck, 5 Johns. 196; White v. Ross, 47 Mich. 173; Burnett v. Burkhead, 21 Ark. 77, 76 Am. Dec. 358; Payne v. Williams, 4 Baxt. 583.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

Cornelius HADDEN, Exr., etc., of James H. Dandy, Deceased, et al., Appts.,
v.
METHODIST SOCIETY OF IRELAND et al., Respts.

(51 N. J. Eq. 154.)

* A bequest made, without limitation as to its use, directly to an unincorporated, but regularly organized and well-established, charitable association, is valid.

(April 14, 1893.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court in favor of the legatees under the will of James H. Dandy, deceased, in a proceeding to obtain construction of certain provisions in such will. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Vice Chancellor's opinion, which was as follows:

Pitney, V. C.:

The object of the bill is to obtain the direction of the court in the final execution of the will of James H. Dandy, deceased. The clause of the will upon which the executor is in doubt is as follows: "Third. All the rest and residue of my property, both real and personal, I give and devise to my executor, hereinafter named, in trust, nevertheless, to pay all the interest, income, and profits thereof to my wife during the term of her natural life, and upon her death to pay and dispose of said principal sums as follows, viz.: To my niece Sarah D. Huff the sum of $1,500; to my niece Charlotte Bush the sum of $1,000; to John Davis, of the town of Belturbet, Caven county, Ireland, the sum of $50 per year for and during the term of his natural life, my executor being hereby directed to retain in his hands and invest a principal sum sufficient to yield said income, and upon the death of the said John Davis the said principal sum is to be paid to the Wesleyan Methodist Society of Belturbet, Caven county, Ireland. All the remainder of the property is to be paid to the Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland." The question is whether the bequest to the Wesleyan Methodist Society of Belturbet and to the Wesleyan Society of Ireland are good.

Two several answers were filed by leave of the court, one by three gentlemen "on behalf of the Society of People called Methodists of Belturbet, Caven county, Ireland, which society is commonly known as the 'Methodist Society of Belturbet,'" and "was formerly known as the 'Wesleyan Methodist Society of Belturbet;'" and another by two gentlemen "on behalf of the Society of People called Methodists in Ireland, commonly known as the 'Methodist Society of Ireland,' and was for-

NOTE.—Validity of gift to unincorporated charity.

Owing largely to conflicting opinions as to the extent and origin of the power of courts of equity over charitable trusts, the different courts have reached quite diverse conclusions upon this question. There seems to be no conclusive rulings among the early English decisions, and the modern law upon the subject has been largely constructed by modern courts.

Early decisions.

In Pawlet v. Clark, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 292, 3 L. ed. 735, there is a quotation from the Year Books (11 Hen. IV. 84*b*), that if a grant be made to a church of such a place it shall be a fee in the parson and his successors. And in like manner if the gift be of chattels to parishioners who are no corporation, it is good and the church wardens shall take them in succession, for the gift is to the use of the church.

In Porter's Case, 1 Coke, 25, it seems to have been taken for granted that unincorporated associations were capable of being cestuis que trust in a charitable use.

In Adams' and Lambert's Case, 4 Coke, 104, colleges are mentioned as existing without incorporation, although it was necessary to sustain them by gifts.

In Burbank v. Whitney, 24 Pick. 146, it is said that prior to the statute Elizabeth it would seem that donations to charitable uses were good, although they were to be distributed by a society or body of men who were not incorporated, and that there can be no doubt that such bequests are good and valid under the statute of Elizabeth if not good without the aid of that statute.

In Burr v. Smith, 7 Vt. 241, it was said unincorporated associations could receive bequests to charitable uses prior to 23 Hen. VIII. chap. 10.

In Zane's Case (Magill v. Brown, Brightly (Pa.) 350, note), cited, inter alia, in 7 Vt. 241, Baldwin, J., says: The common law required no charter to enable a body of men to receive donations of chattel property by their name as a body, but that a charter was necessary to enable them to receive title to real estate in fee. Any opinion to the contrary arises in not discriminating between the right of holding an estate of inheritance with and without proper words to convey it, and between the effect of a deed which transmits from ancestor to heir, or a charter which passes it from predecessor to successor. They are capable of taking the fee by proper words of grant to themselves and their heirs, or to another in trust for their use. To decide that a charter was necessary to enable a religious society to enjoy the sites and buildings for worship, for charity, for education and sepulture, and funds for the maintenance and support of the poor, would be a declaration that the rights of conscience and worship would be made dependent upon the discretion of the legislature.

In the latter case a very large number of early cases were reviewed, and the conclusion was reached by following what was apparently involved in the cases and not passed upon, rather than by finding and following conclusive decisions.

Right to take real estate or permanent fund.

The objections at common law to a voluntary association's taking title to real estate or to a permanent fund are so nearly insurmountable that there is very great uniformity in the rulings that in the absence of some trust device a conveyance to such association of such property is void.

In Re Ticknor's Estate, 13 Mich. 44, the court states that it has been settled that a devise of land to an unincorporated society is not valid, and also that such society cannot take and manage a permanent fund.

merly known as the 'Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland.'" By these answers, whose allegations are not put in issue, it appears that the great John Wesley, the founder of Methodism in Christian religious worship, and of the Christian sect called "Methodist," about the middle of the last century founded in various parts of Great Britain and Ireland a number of religious societies, with preachers and chapels and houses of worship, all under the governmental control of an assembly of all the preachers, called a "conference." Such a conference was established in Ireland under the provisions of a deed executed by Wesley himself, and the organization under it has continued until the present time. The various societies whose preachers composed the conference acquired real property, which was vested in local trustees, and was transmitted from generation to generation, so that, although never legally incorporated, they had still, by means of the machinery of trustees, maintained and enjoyed perpetual succession both in their organization and in the title to their property. The aggregate of these several local societies was known as the "Society of People called Methodists." After the death of Wesley several secessions from the original society took place in Ireland, and, for distinction's sake, a practice arose of calling the original society founded by Wesley himself the "Wesleyan Methodist Society." In 1816–1818 a division occurred in the original or Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland, and a new society was formed, composed, of course, of numerous local societies, which adopted the name of the "Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland." It thus happened that from 1818 to 1878 there existed in Ireland two general societies, composed of numerous local societies, called respectively "The Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland" and "The Primitive Wesleyan Society of Ireland." In 1871 the British Parliament passed an act (34 & 35 Vict. chap. 40) entitled "An Act to Alter and Regulate the Proceedings and Powers of the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland, and for Other Purposes." This act is cited as the "Primitive Wesleyan Society of Ireland Act." This act recognizes the organization, discipline, and creed of the society by annexing it as a schedule to the act, and by referring to it in its body. It declares that all property held in trust for it shall continue to be held upon the trusts upon which it was then held until such trusts shall be changed by conference; that the design, discipline, laws, rules, etc., then prevailing shall continue until altered by vote of conference, and shall govern all members, and be capable of being enforced in the temporal courts in relation to property; that the society might by vote of conference unite or co-operate with any church or religious body or association in Ireland, and might appoint standing "trustees to hold real and personal property for the society, or for any district, circuit, or station thereof," and fill vacancies from time to time, each appointment of a trustee to be enrolled in the Irish chancery; and that all property once vested in said trustees shall con-

An unincorporated association cannot take real estate under a will, but it may take the use of real estate devised to trustees for its benefit. Stone v. Griffin, 3 Vt. 400.

A conveyance to an unincorporated association is void at law for want of a grantee capable of taking. Kirk v. King, 3 Pa. 436.

A devise to an unincorporated charitable association is void. White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144; Brewster v. McCall, 15 Conn. 274; Cobb v. Denton, 6 Baxt. 235; Green v. Allen, 5 Humph. 170.

A devise to a yearly meeting of Quakers and to their successors, which is not a corporation, is void. Greene v. Dennis, 6 Conn. 293, 16 Am. Dec. 58.

As a general rule a bequest or devise to an unincorporated association is void, and it is only by virtue of that peculiar jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity in regard to charitable uses that such bequests have ever been sustained. State, Methodist Episcopal Church, v. Warren, 28 Md. 338.

A bequest in trust of a fund to educate youths for the ministry, to a religious association which is unincorporated, cannot be taken by the association as such, nor by the individuals composing it. Philadelphia Bapt. Asso. v. Hart, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 1, 4 L. ed. 499; Gallego v. Atty. Gen. 3 Leigh, 450, 24 Am. Dec. 650; Brooke v. Shacklett, 13 Gratt. 301; Seaburn v. Seaburn, 15 Gratt. 423; Bible Soc. v. Pendleton, 7 W. Va. 79; Carskadon v. Torreyson, 17 W. Va. 43.

A bequest of money to an unincorporated charitable institution to be held in trust in perpetuity for the education of indigent youths is void since there is no trustee capable of acting. M'Cord v. Ochiltree, 8 Blackf. 15.

But in Pennsylvania religious societies are recognized as having an associate or quasi-corporate existence in law with power to hold land and build appropriate houses thereon. Phipps v. Jones, 20 Pa. 260, 59 Am. Dec. 708; Brown v. Lutheran Church, 23 Pa. 499; Thomas v. Ellmaker, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 98; Yard's Appeal, 64 Pa. 95.

And it has been held that an unincorporated charity which is in fact merely a department of the work of a municipal corporation may be the subject of a valid devise which may be taken and administered by the municipality. Vance's Succession, 39 La. Ann. 371.

So it has been held that if a grant is to an existing church the parson will immediately become seised of the freehold as a sole corporation capable of transmitting the inheritance to his successors. Pawlet v. Clark, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 292, 3 L. ed. 735.

And in Beatty v. Kurtz, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 566, 7 L. ed. 521, the court says that in Pawlet v. Clark the court considered cases of an appropriation or dedication of property to public or religious uses as an exception to the general rule requiring a particular grantee.

But although the conveyance is void at law courts of equity have been solicitous to preserve the charity, and many of them have gone to such lengths in doing so that the inability of the association to take at law has been of very little moment.

It is very generally held that the association may be cestui que trust. Guilfoil v. Arthur, 158 Ill. 600; Vandervolgen v. Yates, 3 Barb. Ch. 242; Mannix v. Purcell, 46 Ohio St. 102, 2 L. R. A. 753; Methodist Church v. Remington, 1 Watts, 218, 26 Am. Dec. 61.

An unincorporated aggregate body cannot be cestui que use under the statute of uses, because it has no capacity to take. Earle v. Wood, 8 Cush. 430; Dickson v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 248.

Although it has been held that a conveyance to trustees for the benefit of an unincorporated church is valid. Terrett v. Taylor, 13 U. S. 9 Cranch, 43, 3 L. ed. 650.

A deed in trust for an unincorporated charity may be given effect. Earle v. Wood, supra; King v. Parker, 9 Cush. 71.

tinue to be held by such trustees upon such trusts as conference may decide. It does not appear that any trustees were appointed by the Primitive Society under this act. Afterwards, in 1878, the two societies above named united in one society, in pursuance of the provisions of this act. One of the terms of the union was that the distinctive terms "Wesleyan" and "Primitive Wesleyan," by which they had previously been known, be dropped, and the term "Methodist" alone be used. At the date of the will there was no society in Ireland bearing either of the distinctive names used by the testator in his will.

The testator was, before coming to this country, a resident of Belturbet, and a member of the Primitive Methodist Society of Ireland. There was at that time at Belturbet both a "Primitive Methodist Society," forming part of the Newtown-Butler circuit of the Primitive Wesleyan Society of Ireland, and also a "Wesleyan Methodist Society," which formed a part of the Clone circuit of the Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland. At the union above mentioned these societies were also united, and became known as the "Belturbet Circuit." The testator was connected with the Primitive Wesleyan Society of Belturbet. His will was made in this country in 1882. In 1876 the conference of the Wesleyan Society appointed trustees to hold property in trust for the society and its component societies in the manner provided in the act of Parliament above set forth. Under what authority this was done does not appear, as the act above referred to did not apply to such society, and my attention was not called to any act which does. The trustees so appointed executed a declaration of trust, which has been enrolled in the Irish chancery, and have continued to act to the present time. A part of the constitution of the local societies or circuits is that there shall be "stewards," who look after the temporal affairs of the society, and receive and disburse its moneys. Of the three defendants who have answered on behalf of the Belturbet Society one is the superintendent minister of that circuit, and the other two are the stewards thereof.

I think there can be no doubt that the two societies named by the testator in his will are respectively the local Methodist Society of Belturbet and the general Methodist Society of Ireland. The addition by the testator of the word "Wesleyan" does not, in my judgment, throw the least doubt on his meaning. The previous existence there of two societies of one faith, and, in the main, of one discipline, with one of which he was connected, and their subsequent union into one society, of which union he was probably aware, seems to leave no room for doubt. The case, as to this part of it, is far within the range of authoritative decisions, too numerous and familiar to require citation.

It seems to be settled by what I conceive to be the weight of authority, and in accord with reason, that a voluntary unincorporated association may be a legatee of a legacy like this. It is to be observed—First, that there is here no

An unincorporated religious society cannot hold real property in the name which it assumes, nor can the directors and their successors in office appointed by the society hold it. But there may be a conveyance to an individual and his heirs in trust for the society, which will be valid. Goesele v. Bimeler, 5 McLean, 223.

A devise in trust for a definitely described charity is valid if made to a trustee capable of taking it. Halsey v. Protestant Episcopal Church Convention, 75 Md. 275.

A bequest in trust for the persons who at the time constitute a voluntary association is not void for uncertainty, but is available for the individuals then composing such association, and not to their successors. Bartlet v. King, 12 Mass. 537, 7 Am. Dec. 99; Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 591.

But an earlier case held that a devise to be expended for the use of schools among the inhabitants in the northwest parish in the town of Boxford, confining it to inhabitants of such town while the parish contains inhabitants of another town, so that the beneficiaries are not a corporation, is not valid. Barker v. Wood, 9 Mass. 419.

It being settled that the association may be beneficiary, and equity having power to effectuate charitable trusts, the question arises, How far will equity create and administer a trust in case of a simple gift to the association? Upon this question courts differ. The difference is founded in part upon whether or not the statute of Elizabeth has been adopted. But it also involves the further question as to the power of equity over trusts.

Under the statute of Elizabeth a charity may be given effect although the grantee is not incorporated. Missouri Historical Soc. v. Academy of Science, 94 Mo. 459.

Where the statute 43 Elizabeth is in force it is no objection that no person capable of taking is named as trustee. The devise will be upheld and executed although it is to an unincorporated association. Washburn v. Sewall, 9 Met. 280; Dexter v. Gardner, 7 Allen, 243.

A devise to an unincorporated charity will be regarded as a devise in trust under the statute of Elizabeth, and will be executed in favor of the society. Bartlett v. Nye, 4 Met. 379.

A voluntary association will not be permitted to take a permanent fund established for a particular purpose, but the court will create of it a proper and permanent trust. Wellbeloved v. Jones, 1 Sim. & Stu. 40, 1 L. J. Ch. 11.

In M'Girr v. Aaron, 1 Penr. & W. 49, 21 Am. Dec. 361, in which there was a devise for the benefit of an unincorporated church, the court says a gift to a charity should not fail for the want of a trustee.

Although the grantee is unincorporated a court of equity will not allow the gift on that account to fail, but will see to its effectuation. Schmidt v. Hess, 60 Mo. 595.

devise of real estate, requiring a person, natural or artificial, capable of holding the title; and, second, that there is no perpetual continuing trust, which can be administered only by such a person. The gift is of money, and is absolute and unlimited by any trust except such as is implied by its being given to a religious society. There is no limitation of the gift to the use of the annual income, nor to any particular purpose, such as is often found in such testamentary dispositions. In order to carry out the intention of the testator, we have only to see to it that the gift reaches the proper officer of the association. What shall afterwards become of it does not concern the court, as, so far as appears, it did not the testator. He appears to have been satisfied to give the money to the association without any direction as to how it was to be used, relying, as he might well do, upon the general and established character of the society. That an unincorporated association of this character is competent to receive a direct and unlimited gift of money was admitted to be settled law by Sir John Leach in Wellbeloved v. Jones, 1 Sim. & Stu. 40. There the bequest was to the officers of an unincorporated theological seminary, in trust to use the income and interest in certain specified charities. The suit was brought by the officers of the school against the executors, without bringing in the attorney general. It was held that the attorney general must be brought in, because the King, as parens patriæ, superintends the administration of all charities, and acts by the attorney general," and that a proper trust must be established, etc. Sir John Leach, however, adds these words: "It has been held not to be necessary that the attorney general should be a party where a legacy is given to the treasurer, or other officer of some established charitable institution, to become a part of the general funds of that institution; and this exception is reasonable; for the attorney general can have no interference with the distribution of their general funds." And Mr. Boyle in his treatise on Charities (p. 217), states this as the law in England. And this principle seems to have been acted upon without question in Johnstone v. Earl Harrowby, 29 L. J. Ch. 145, 1 De G. F. & J. 183, where I infer the bequests were to unincorporated societies. And Mr. Perry, in his treatise on Trusts, (§ 730), cites other English as well as American cases in support of the same rule. The case of Evangelical Asso.'s Appeal, 35 Pa. 316, was so much like the present as to be indistinguishable, and the subject there received full consideration by Justice Strong, who reviewed the authorities, and whose language and judgment apply here. The same rule is supported by the judgment of Mr. Justice Baldwin in Magill v. Brown, reported in Brightly (Pa.) 347, note, and Blenon's Estate, Brightly (Pa.) 339. To the same effect are the earlier cases in New York. Potter v. Chapin, 6 Paige, 639, where Chancellor Walworth (p. 649) says that the contrary decision of Philadelphia Baptist Asso. v. Hart, 17 U. While a devise to an unincorporated association is void at law equity will protect and perpetuate the charity, the legal title remaining in abeyance or vesting in the heirs of the testator as trustees for the persons beneficially interested. American Bible Soc. v. Wetmore, 17 Conn. 181.

If an unincorporated religious society takes possession of property donated to its use, and upon the faith of the donation builds a church thereon with the consent of the donor, a court of equity might compel him to convey to trustees in perpetuity for the use of the church, or execute a declaration of trust that he and his heirs should hold the property for its use. Beatty v. Kurtz, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 566, 7 L. ed. 521.

There are some courts which do not concur in these rulings, and which hold that if the trust is not made perfect by the creator the court cannot render any assistance. Those cases will be found under the next subdivision of this note.

Personal property.

In case of personal property the objections to the association taking it are not so strong, and conveyances of such property for use at the discretion of the association are quite generally upheld in accordance with the ruling in HADDEN V. METHODIST SOCIETY OF IRELAND.

In Witman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 88, 17 Am. Dec. 644, it is said that in Pennsylvania donations to unincorporated bodies were uniformly upheld.

An absolute bequest to an unincorporated society is good. Parker v. Cowell, 16 N. H. 149.

A bequest of money generally, and not upon permanent uses to an unincorporated association capable of clear identification, is valid. Re Ticknor's Estate, 13 Mich. 44.

A legacy to an unincorporated association with a direction that it shall go to the treasurer thereof for the time being is valid. Tucker v. Seaman's Aid. Soc. 7 Met. 188.

A bequest to a voluntary unincorporated association is valid. Carter v. Belfour, 19 Ala. 814; Williams v. Pearson, 38 Ala. 299.

And this was the view which was at first adopted in New York.

In an early case the chancellor said: "Although some doubt was thrown upon the question of charitable donations, for the benefit of a community or body not incorporated so as to be capable of taking and conveying the legal title to property, by Philadelphia Baptist Asso. v. Hart, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 1, 4 L. ed. 499, I believe it is generally admitted that the decision in that case was wrong. And it may now be considered as an established principle of American law that the court of chancery will sustain and protect such a gift, bequest, or dedication of property to public or charitable uses, . . . where the object of the gift or dedication is specific and capable of being carried into effect according to the intention of the donor. . . . A devise or conveyance of real estate . . . may perhaps form an exception to the general principle." Potter v. Chapin, 6 Paige, 639.

A voluntary unincorporated society may take a

Wright v. Methodist Episcopal Church, Hoffm. Ch. 202, at pages 239, 265; King v. Woodhull, 3 Edw. Ch. 79; Hornbeck v. American Bible Soc. 2 Sandf. Ch. 133; Banks v. Phelan, 4 Barb. 80. In that case there was a bequest of $3,000 "to the Roman Catholic Church of Petersburg, in the state of Virginia;" an unincorporated religious society. The learned Judge, in his opinion (p. 89), of this bequest says: "It appears, however, that this is an unincorporated institution, and it is contended that for that reason the legacy is void. The legality of bequests for pious and charitable uses, though for the benefit of unincorporated associations, is so well established in this state that it is barely necessary to refer to the authorities." He then cites some of the authorities above cited, and proceeds: "In this case, however, the will does not create a trust. It gives the legacy directly to the objects of the bounty of the testatrix," and he held the bequest good. The later New York cases lean the other way. In Owens v. Missionary Soc. 14 N. Y. 380, 67 Am. Dec. 160, an unlimited bequest to an unincorporated association was held void because the general objects of the association were not charitable, and on that ground it was distinguished from the cases just cited. In Sherwood v. American Bible Soc. 1 Keyes, 561, a bequest as follows: "I give and bequeath unto the Arcot Mission of the Reformed Dutch Church the sum of $3,000, to be used for the education of the heathen boy on whose account I have heretofore advanced money,"—was held void because the association was unincorporated, and therefore unable to act as a trustee of a special, continuing trust, as that was held to be. The opinion makes no mention of the cases earlier than Owens v. Missionary Soc., which it cites as holding the general proposition that a voluntary association cannot be a legatee. White v. Howard, 46 N. Y. 144, was a case of a devise of lands, and may well stand on that ground. Numerous other cases in accord with those first above cited are found in Mr. Randolph's learned note on the subject. 1 Jarman, Wills (Rand. & T. ed.) pp. 410–412. A review of these leads me to the conclusion first above stated, that a direct gift of money without limitation as to its future use, to an unincorporated charitable association, is good.
